

HENRY DARGER -

"THE REALMS OF THE UNREAL"

Microsystems, Inc.

VOLUME

7

Microsystems, Inc.

VOLUME SEVEN C

THE PROGRESS OF THE BLOODY WAR.

VOLUME ALSO CONTAINS OF UNSOL AD MOST THRILLING G

ADVENTURES.

FRIGHTFUL BATTLES AND THEIR RESULTS.

TOPICS OF THE ABANDONED DISASTER CONTINUE.

G BY. H.J.D. 1968.

THE AUTHOR.

intermittent
this indolence
one of those Albanian chief ling with him the great

He inquired

that ad, and then

ed start but of th clean:

"She began to be in knew the

on a to to a point of

itled
ed the way the ding.The

ry great root and olden me no one else stantly anger!"The a traitor! I

As long on the

that could to dictionary is information subject! That needed who ise in en he intended a report from ed down."

this neck

in the chair and apprehension the dangerous or my to did my is of the the Abbot once that purpose if it

AN UNUSUAL PILOT A DAY OF HARD WORK A NIGHT OF SWEET THE LITTLE HUMANS:

THEY WERE, GRABBERING THE HUMANS WITH THEM

after the airplane and John Bums were asking that the two troopers were just sent from their place of confinement, and that the two troopers were just the quiet-eyed fellows troopers had rode around the band, apparently without concern or interest of the two prisoners on horseback though now he alone did see them, though the soldiers did not. But after the two had for a while forty or fifty yards beyond the driver, John Bums suddenly got the best of her and she turned her head and looked back. The trooper to do this was something she said afterwards that it seemed very difficult to the impossibility of the impossible. It was for her to control the action. Her mind was not the same as old Mr. Bums's mind.
"Why not that was a foolish thing indeed for me to do," said she as she quickly found she should have said "I'll not that I should have or will do more damage than anything else and as started from the driver and to think that I should let others should have been the one to do it. I'm ashamed of myself."

"Did he see you?" Gertrude inquired.
"He was looking right at me even before I planned back," John replied hastily. "And that look was full of suspicion and a dangerous warning."
There was a moment's doubt he is on our trail or shadowing us and we suspect something of the nature of our mission.
"Oh don't let that bother you," Gertrude advised. "There's no reason why he or any other Ghendalinnian officer should jump to a conclusion just because you or anyone else may look back at him and that too doesn't necessarily mean anything unusual. But if you let it make you any degree uneasy you may give us away the next time you meet him."
"I believe he knows what our mission is going to be anyway," said Gertrude fatalistic answers.

"It's that in the case you had not worry any more about what you do or say in his presence," said the trooper who was with them. "We might as well go to him or his followers the next time, and make him prisoner."
"I don't agree with you," Gertrude replied. "I believe that in the most change we have to work against and that is the probability of suspicion on his or any other Ghendalinnian part. Don't you know how much anything positively. He probably has learned it or found it out in the past. For the reason of Abbie and I know that many things in the series are situated there began to put two and two together. First that he must have followed Violet and her sister on their last remarkable trip."

"And that his visit now to General Hanley here to day is to give them warning of our motives," John added.

"You're very likely," Gertrude agreed. "I'd give anything to hear the conversation that is about to take place among the Ghendalinnians and their hosts. But it would be very interesting to us."

"No doubt of it," said the other. "And it would surely prove useful to us to be in our position for the information we were sent to get."

"Don't you think it strange, John, that Violet and her sister should not select a bunch of girls and boys like us to do so important a piece of work at this time, and such work like that?" Gertrude inquired. "The had puzzled her a good deal from the moment the proposition had been put to her. All right she had received it originally from Violet and her sister even before the matter had been broached to an earlier scheme, she had not questioned the wisdom of the move but had accepted the role of advocate assigned to her as if the proceedings were ordinary and conspicuous."

"If you hadn't restricted your speech to a bunch of girls and boys us," she would answer. "You," John replied. "I say it was very important piece of work as this. But when you speak of the 'bunch of girls and boys like us,' I reply, 'No, it wasn't strange at all.'"
"It's all right," said John. "I wouldn't say it wasn't strange at all."
"I know you did do very remarkable work when you helped Jack and I in Paris, when you found my missing opera last year, but you shouldn't put yourself on the back with such a remarkable step."

only intermittents told his intention was one of those Ghendalinnian chief t dealing with him that the great playfully inquired

he habitually announced, and then starkly start out of though the Ghendalinnians of the "Gha" began

"What to be in that you know the

nothing on a to

as for the Ghendalinnians

as he parted and led the way acted the and standing the

it of very great with great and to welcome the pleasure no one else

ly, expectantly

as for the Ghendalinnians
as this as long politely on the voice that could the dictionary is this information the old subject. That the contemptuous who in, it other also in more than he intended not the report from he knows down a is in this book

ly from the chair
ness and apprehension

And more dangerous on me or my ly, and so did my servants of the

with the Abbie but at once that their purpose if it

"I wasn't referring to myself at all," Jean replied with a little suggestive of "something else coming." "I was referring principally to my very noticeable glaucous change in general Vivian army and of course it would look very foolish indeed for me to attempt to leave myself out of the compliment but I did nevertheleast suppose I shall have to admit that I am a very slippy glaucous "Harold" because if I wasn't Jack wouldn't be alive to day, I would not have been deserted by another Jack, and I couldn't be at all associated with such a slippy bunch of glaucous and either I have to be slippy or advise you other glaucous of being common like myself."

"I'm quite content to be called common, and that's where the very difficulty comes in."

"Well won't you be content to be generous enough to let me slippy, and I'll therefore admit I'm slippy to keep company with my slippy and good associates, and you can always do likewise and we can be all of us an uncommonly slippy bunch of common glaucous."

"If we could be talking a string of nonsense like this every time we meet the two professions at play, we could throw him off the hook in any way we wish," said Jean meditatively. "What do you say Gertrude? That's try it the next time they are around. We'll be regular appropriate nonsense. We'll even pretend we are bad children if necessary."

"We won't overdo it," Gertrude cautioned.

"Of course not. And why should we? We will do as we did this time--let one idea or other lead on to another in very rapid succession. Think it over and whenever you get any idea pass it around, and we'll be all primed for him and his Hutt. It'll be lots of fun if we get them Hutt and Jeff--spies, glaucous, and he to our advantage too. If we cannot catch them I am sure at least Hutt and his companions."

"Gertrude and Jean reached the spot in time to see the motor boat containing the other members of the glaucous approaching about a mile or so away. They however did not yet know who may be in the boat, and as it was deemed wise not to make any demonstrations, no one on either did any signaling, but they were not long in doubt as to who the passengers were. The ground led down in a slant to the water, and the two advanced glaucous spies, as they were walked down this slope and were waiting at the western edge when the boat beached itself.

In the meantime the "Jeff" fellow urged his horse and his heavily armed squadron up to the end of the drive near that cottage where the great Glendelinian generals were assembled. The main structure of the house was of white oak but the outer trappings were mainly of such rustic material as the railing of the porch. The front door of course was open, giving one who could have looked in a fairly good view of the interior. The front room was large and fairly well furnished with light expensive furniture, glass cases, and an assortment of very attractive art upon the walls. It once no doubt belonged to a good Glendelinian farmer, and he had been driven away by the sheer madness of the flood. The spy Naro Fania in who was who was indeed put at a slant a slippy slippy behavior was able to get a good view of the room before anyone had appeared to answer his knock for all the generals had by this time gone within. It was general Johnstone Jackline Manley who appeared, a handsome but sharp featured man with always that challenging eye. Perhaps no stranger or person out of the exclusive circle that he surely assumed to represent ever approached him without being met with the usual demand "who are you?"

"Naro Fania recognized this demand at once. He knew Manley knew he was a foreigner and if he had been of far less indolent character this unscrupulous man, who would have worked even if on the side of Abidemia, if that country would pay more than Glendelinia might have made a brilliant success as a glaucous in any sphere of criminal nature. He despite his Jeff feature. Perhaps, he was no Jeff, and if Hutt had mistook him for Jeff and beat him like he does that individual he wouldn't be able to even hit any one for the rest of his life after that. The fact that he was content with the limitations of a spy practices in any Glendelinian army he chose, with his companion was of itself indicative of his indolence. And yet when he took up his work he manifested gifts of enormous shrewdness that would have made many another spy jealous.

This Jeff man shrewdness and indolence were alternatively intermittent. When the nerve centers of his shrewdness were stimulated his indolence dropped and he was very much on the alert. The present one was one of those very instances. He knew something by reputation, of the Glendelinian chief of general who confronted him. He had had an indirect dealing with him before but he had never met him. However he was certain that the great Glendelinian chief would recognize General Manley. He inquired:

"Is this His Glorious Excellency General Johnstone Manley?" He inquired.

saluting though he scarcely needed to ask the question.

"I'm no one else sir," he replied with evident habitual precision.

"My name is Christian Naro Fania," Naro Fania announced, and then waited for the effect of this limited information.

"The Glendelinian general gave a start. It too was a startled start but of surprise. The challenge of his countenance did not waver, though the prediction of his manner became an attitude of caution nevertheless.

"Not, not Christian Naro Fania, the a leader of--of--of" He began the general began.

The man walked on one side of his mouth.

"The very one, none other," he answered stung indignantly. "Not to be in the least obscure, I am from the Glendelinian Government. You know the nearness of any of the Christian armies, I believe."

"I never did, and I hope to have the occasion of meeting on a to planes," the general returned rather savagely.

"Indeed?" The visitor commented with a rising inflection for the effect.

"By the way sir, my name is Naro Fania."

"Certainly the general answered recovering quickly from a partial leap of mindfulness of the situation. The general turned and led the way into the house and the visitor followed. The general directed the International spy to a big chair and he himself remained standing. The general retaining his challenging attitude inquired:

"Well Mr Naro Fania, what in the meaning of this visit?"

"Very much meaning general Manley," was the reply. "And of very great significance to you I know. I come here well primed with grant and most important information which I am sure will cause you to welcome me and by helper as perhaps you and all your staff would welcome no one else in the whole world."

The Glendelinian general leaned forward most eagerly, expectantly apprehensively.

"You come as a friend, I assume," he said.

"Have you any reason to doubt it even though I be a foreigner?" The man inquired. "If it were otherwise I must necessarily confess a traitor. I hope you will however not entertain any such opinion of me as that. As long as you treat me fairly, you'll find me and my helper, absolutely on the square for you, and the in interest of your cause."

"I hope so indeed," returned the general in a tone of voice that could hardly be said to convey any significance other than the dictionary meaning of the words. But let's get down to business. What is this information that you say you are here primed with? Has it to do with the old subject? That is about the Vivian girls, those dreaded, terrible little centipedes who are turning out to be the ruin of the cause of Glendelinia?"

"In the least way yes, very intimately, and with nothing else in the main."

"In what way?" The general asked with more eagerness than he intended to disclose.

"They for one reason are back in the Christian idiosyncrasy."

"That's no news to me," said the general. "I know it. I got the report from A quinine St. Claire whom that Christian dog of an Evans knocked down."

"But that's not a bit of it general. There are some spies in this neck of the woods."

"Christian spies?" The general exclaimed starting suddenly from the chair he had also used and betraying still more of the eagerness and apprehension he was still at. "Christian spies?"

"Yes spies, yes indeed. That is exactly what they are. And more dangerous than the Vivian girls too."

"Who are they?--how do you know they are here to spy on me or my army?"

"I overheard their plans. I put wind in a roundabout way, and so did my teller mention me as a result of talk on the part of the servants of the Princesses that there was going to be something doing, with the Abidman region as a central point of interest. I suspected that at once that the interests of Glendelinia were involved, that with their purpose if it is successful, Glandelinia will be doing the Horn Pipe dance for safety, so I stole slyly, while Hawkshaw like up to their rendezvous one night and listened to some of them as they discussed their plans and;

4

"Some of them." General Manley interrupted, his face turning white. "Who are they? The Vivian girls already after their terrible experience within the territory of John Manley?"

"Not yet, but they're leaders in the Conspiracy. But there's whole troupes of them."

"That's a funny story." The Glandelinian general commented dubiously, searching the face of his visitor for an explanation of his, to her, queer statement.

"Not at all funny when you hear it in detail." The Professional spy returned quietly.

"Well hurry up with the details. The impatient general demanded.

"There is no need of being in a hurry." The spy said with provoking calmness. "Business is business you see and full confidences should never be exchanged in a situation of this kind until a contract is drawn up, signed, sealed, witnessed, and recorded. In other words I ought to have a full understanding and a retainer before I go any farther."

General Manley had no reason whatever to have the slightest doubts that this was coming sooner or later.

"I hope you realize Mr. NeroFania that we generals are not exactly made of money." The general remarked tentatively by way of meeting the demand which he read between the spy's words. Moreover we are now under heavy expenses during the last year in the paying of the soldiers and officers, and you and your helper got a good deal of what our government has paid out to you."

"Not so very much." The spy corrected from his point of view. "You must remember that I and he and honest of the time has only had our agents working for you, and also through other men, and they handled the payroll on which he and we were only the payees, and naturally they took what they didn't absolutely have to give to me."

"Well how much do you want for this service?" The general demanded.

"I ought to have at least 234 dollars a day and my expenses until those spies are either frustrated or captured." the man answered.

"Absolutely out of the question. That's ten times the amount of the income I get from the Glandelinian government for my services as general especially from the source you are interested in, and my son John Manley pays me only thirteen hundred dollars a year. And a considerable part of that has to go for my uniforms, board, and education in generalship to perfection."

"That is one of the important points to which I am coming," the spy interrupted. "I come to inform you that since they returned violet, and those pretty sisters of hers, and that terrible wildcat girl-cut leader the highest girl-cut of all ranks of their nation are very much interested in how that disaster at Abhisann came about, the explosions especially you know, and also how and why it was, and they have decided to find these things out."

"It's a case of the nation's old suspicions being revived!" The general the general asked.

"I suppose so, anyway they are mighty suspicious. And it's the Princesses who thought of it first. It's that Angelina Aronburg."

"Who? Who's been paddling stories to her?"

"That's something I didn't find out. But I'll confess she's dangerous, she knows me and Pedro and we have to watch our guard. They'd shoot us on sight if they knew fully what we were up to."

"Don't you think a $234 day man spy ought to find out?"

"Perhaps and perhaps I could have discovered that very thing if I thought it wise to spend the time on it. After the mischief was done, it seemed hardly worth while to expend any effort to find the mischief maker. I decided it was best to get after the mischief and stop it."

"I suppose you're right," assented the general. "But it really would be a lot of satisfaction to know who is the one who informed that dangerous girl-cut."

"But general this is no time to waste any of your efforts on revenge. That may come later not now. She intends to make a general Aronburg start a Junction with the Vivian and move up to that spot and drive the enemy from the territory so they can start on the work. But how about my fee sir?"

"You ask too much."

"I don't agree with you. That's a very small fee compared with what some of your agencies get. Why I know professional spies who never take a job under eight hundred dollars a day or a thousand."

5
"That's in Myletrea Da Banyan armies, where the generals are under heavy expenses---costly uniforms and staff officials."

"Where do you get your information?"

"Oh I have received them from scouts." The general replied with emphasis on the last word. "And I know there are plenty of generals who get only $10 dollars a day, some less. Now what do you think of that? Do you think you, who are just a Professional spy, ought to get more than any of us generals?"

"Oh a fudge on the general." The spy exclaimed in affected disgust. "No big spy will take one of those leading army jobs. There are lots of your Glandelinian spies who could easily have made fifty thousand or a hundred thousand dollars a year, and there are few generals getting more than $20,000."

"Well I'm lucky Mr. Spy if I can allow you the payment of even $10 a day, and we can't pay that very long. We are under heavy expenses here and in Glandelinia because of the war, and besides your efforts to stop those child spies might be a failure. To stop those Vivian girls is to stop the lightning. I know them well. Capture them, and the way they get away again is like losing your jewels to a thief."

"You ought to end soon," said general Manley. "The spy advised. "Remember your own special income may be raised or maybe it can't last forever, and too you might get killed in battle. This war isn't no small affair you know, in fact it's bigger than any war ever on record and bel bloody beyond measure. The war is past one year now going nearly up to two, and if you are not able to command through the system because of the failure on your part your income might stop when the war is a year older. And those spies might take everything away from you."

"Take everything away." The general exclaimed in a startled manner indicating that his apprehension had not carried his imagination as far as this.

"Sure why not." The spy returned. "What do you think all this spy talk about christian child spies has been leading up to---A Fairy story for children---or a Christmas Present out of season? If violet, and her sisters received suspicion through Gertrude, and all are suspicious enough to send a lot of secret spies right here to get the goods on you and to transform the most important others to investigate the region of Abhisann and the explosion territory, don't you think those Vivian girls have some notion to taking some sort of drastic action to cause the downfall of Glandelinia?"

"What kind of gods do they expect to get on me?" The general asked.

"I'm not responsible for the disaster, never knew it was coming."

"Can't you guess?"

"I can't imagine, dream, or even suspect."

"Just hurry things along to an agreement between you or me, and I'll tell you. Or otherwise I'll try some other else."

"I'll give you fifteen dollars a day and reasonable expenses, including your board and carefare, and such incidentals when you are away from the army. That is all condition ed of, of course on your proving to my satisfaction that you have the information you say you have. There's no use of my fighting for this cause if you have to allow spies to frustrate my every move and then don't pay anything without getting my benefit from it."

"I'll try not to be so hard on you as all that." The spy assured the general. "I accept your offer, although it's the minimum I would consider. I supposed you are prepared to give me a check check to day."

"Yes I can give you something, your expenses thus far, and maybe a little besides. Now hurry up and tell your story."

"I can do it in a very few words. Angelina nichee the Angelinian Professional National Scout, equal head to the Vivian girls has sent half a hundred or more dangerous Angelinian girls out up here to find out the distance of general Vivian's army and they are going to cause it to make a Junction with general Aronburg so that they can first crush you, and then the ambush north so they can go up with the Vivian girls and find out what was the cause of the explosions and if they were created by the orders of your government or not. It has been circulated throughout the world that the disaster was a disturbance of Nature, but that one who is called Gertrude Angelina, but whose right name is Evangelina Aronburg has received word from some unknown source to the contrary, and is planning to investigate if she discovers that her suspicions are true. These spies are all the girl-cut Rangers. One of them Angelina nichee is the daughter of general Vivian. The proof of my statement that some of them even are here now to spy on you in is in their plan to go up there and they are just now trying to find means to cultivate a means to telegraph to general Aronburg with the instructions to crush through all obstacles and move northward to join general Aronburg that pretty Angelina Aronburgs uncle. That Angelina Aronburg, and another sweetfaced little brat of a scout were up here toolooking over the lay of the ground, rescued a child slave, took one of your men prisoners, and maybe they're here yet. Undoubtedly you'll see something of them to morrow or the next day."

The general's eyes flashed dangerously. The spy saw the menace in his look and manner.

"As I am now in your employ as counsel," he said, "I'll begin giving advice at once. Cut out this business of trying to capture the , for you won't be able to do it. It's your worse enemy to yourself to try it now. We must just try to frustrate their purpose. There's one particular boyscout well known by them but you know is a strange mystery to us, that Radcliffe who is known as the "Rattlesnake" for his dangerous qualities. He is also a chief leader of them and has long held their organization in the highest esteem. He has taken Angelina Aronburg, and that forlorn Penrod into his full confidence. They are going to play their part too, and play it well. But I have discovered who that Radcliffe is. It is not a boy but a girl in disguise and that Gertrude's sister. And the other girls, scouts and boys are so chummy that they treat each other as if they regarded each other as the dearest darling friends on earth. You know how good people like Abbieannians are among themselves. General Manley's face soured at this suggestion. "No one of that or you'll spoil the whole game. Violet, and her sisters, that Riches scout, and Angelina Aronburg sure mean business. I tell you, and all they need to go do is to prove the cause of the Abbieann calamity, and there will be a meeting then in the Highest Abbieann courts which will cause speedy mobilization of the whole of Abbieannia and your country is sunk. By the way where are your own girl and boyscouts and the other members of them."

"They are in general John Manley's command at St. Claire city," the general answered. "I intended to make a junction with him next week; his furlough begins then, and he'll take a few weeks vacation. My elder son Huebama Jr. a general too went up the country a bit with some of his armies but has not yet engaged any christian armies. All my scouts are therefore at Johns. The Child slaves of course are in my command but I had intended transferring them to elsewhere."

"By the way, general, how well are your slaves supplied with clothing?" the spy inquired.

"They have some good suits," the general replied slowly as if going over what they do wear.

"Dress them up like child scouts of your own side, and get more uniforms for special occasions. You might be having others work on some article of clothing for them also. That would indicate strongly that you only have a scouts and they won't try to take away by the slaves." Now general if you don't mind, I will take my check, and go back to the christian lines for further details. I'll be back again, and with my helper this time but don't think it advisable for me to come often. I have prepared a short telephone cipher code by which we can carry on a common place conversation over some secretly put up wire and let each other know if all is well or if trouble is brewing or has already broken. Here's a copy of it."

The general wrote the spy a check for 95 dollars, and he arose to depart.

"Remember," he said as he stood facing the general at the doorway. "The success of this little plan of ours rests in the ability of yourself and other members of the Glandelinian army to play the most spontaneously game the cleverest persons ever planned. Warn your son of the danger threatening him and advice him to retreat northward, and if you can strike general Aronburg a blow to morrow and break up his army if possible so you can get through and start for Abbieann. If you fall down on this undoubtedly Glandelinia will lose the war like a train crash."

Then he went out, mounted his horse, and rode away.

The twenty four girlscouts in the large motor boat landed and proceeded with Angelina Aronburg and Jean up the long slope to the top of the rise where a conference was held. The two advanced girlscouts reported developments in detail, much to the interest, surprise and some delight of the other girlscouts. Therefore they realized that so far the progress was good and so encouraging that everybody showed a disposition of some impatience at the very fast sign of activity. "We must go right back, and get general Aronburg to move back from this region a little ways," said Gertrude. "We ought to also move our own camps as possible, for we mustn't run any risks of allowing that new Glandelinian army from taking general Aronburg's army unawares."

"Don't you think it would help to allay their suspicions if we remained here a while and looked around as if interested in the scenery just as if we were tourists?" Mildred Maxwell suggested.

"No I don't think so its too dangerous now," said Gertrude quickly. "Either that 'Mr. Jeff' suspects us or he doesn't but he knows me just the same. If he suspects us he has grounds for his suspicions and any attempt to throw him and his companion off the track now would not only result in failure but would involve upon us a conflict we don't cherish just now. I think we had better assume that he and the other knows what we are up to and act accordingly, without appearing to admit it. If it is possible I'm going to try and capture or shoot those two scoundrels. I promised them I would when I met them at Delight's Junction if they ever dared show themselves to me again."

"But won't they try to cover up the evidence we are after?" Joy St. Claire reasoned.

"Of course they will," Gertrude answered.

"But that surely should be one of the most interesting features of this adventure," said Gladys Wentworth who already had a reputation wider than the girlscout force for natural shrewdness. "When they begin to do that, that'll prove to us absolutely that Glandelinia is guilty of the disasters, without our need to even make the investigation, though we'll do it anyhow."

"Can't you point out from the flood the place or places where you think it would be well for us to send some telegraph to the christian army at St. Claire?" Minnie Saunders inquired, addressing her sister and Gertrude.

"We can get a pretty good view of it from here sister dear," Jean replied. "It's right up the shore between those two half burned cottages which are about the same distance up from the water and have similar paths and flights of steps running down to their boat landings. I believe this shows the flood here is over some stream. Between those two places is a stretch of timber land that doesn't seem to be used by any one in particular and where we can keep hidden from the Glandelinians. We didn't explore it because we didn't have time, and because too of our rescue of this child with us, and the capture of this Glandelinian soldier. We saw also must contain some good place to fix up the telegraph station. We saw also several open spots near the road that could be used if nothing better is found, but it might expose us to the sight of the enemy and bring us under heavy fire. We must make a complete inspection of course before we select a site, but that won't take long and can be done when we bring our outfit up here."

"We ought to take a run in the boat along the shore and see if we can't find a good landing place," Gertrude suggested. "Wouldn't it be delightful if we could find a suitable place on the side of the hill and overlooking the flood. Let's take enough time for that."

"It's a good idea," said Angelina Riches warmly.

"Let's do that at once and then run back to general Aronburg's army. But remember girls don't say anything about our mission on the boat. You see we don't the gray, you didn't. And besides the boatman whom we hired would be sure to start some gossip that would probably reach the ears of the very Glandelinians whom we want to keep in the dark dark as much as possible."

They were soon back in the large canopied motor boat, and Angelina Riches gave advice to the pilot. The latter cranked his engine, took his place at the wheel and backed the vessel away from the landing. A few moments later the "Jane" as the owner named the boat to distinguish it from others was dashing along the wooded hillshore which extended nearly a mile to the north of the encampments of the enemy. They obtained a good view of the section of the shore just north of the rebel army and picked out several spots which appeared from the distant view to be very good sites for setting up the temporary signal station. The prow of the boat was just about turned to the northwest, and they were beginning to cut along at full speed toward the spot they left, when an eruption of water rose with terrific noise about fifteen feet from them the ensuing wave almost upsetting the boat.

"We are under fire" gasped Gertrude. "Hurry the boat faster" she ordered to the man. The run was quickly made, and eruptions occurred at dangerously frequent intervals, and once a terrific shower of water was thrown over every one of them, with debris and dirt and mud combined and the motor man was killed. Gertrude who knew how to operate the engine took charge, and landing at last to the spot, they all got out, and every one found their horses, and Gertrude and Jean hastened at once followed by the others now occasionally under fire on land to the Christian lines, and presented their information to general Aronburg. The latter was much surprised but not disturbed by the news, when he learned that general Johnston Manley was so close, and still more interested when he was informed that general Manley had intentions of making a junction with his son at Evangeline St. Claire. Gertrude to prove the state of things made a pen and ink drawing of the vicinity as hastily as she could indicating the approximate lines of the lands in possession, and the general decided it was back to form his armies into strong positions, stretch it out and watch every move of the enemy while Virginia now reinforced by him was ordered by army telegraphic communications to try and prevent Manley from advancing south, and if he attempted to do so to strike a blow.

An hour later into the Christian lines rode the equine Jeff eyed and faced men whose activities had already created much interest, but he had avoided contact with the girls, or not even was seen by them this time and he entered the headquarters of one of the Angelinian military Stations and inquired:

"Have you seen my tall companion?"

"I did."

"Where did he go?"

"He is still in general Aronburg's headquarters."

"Are you one of the Christian officers who takes charge for camping purposes of that landscape along the flood shore just north of the Glandelinian camps?"

"I am." The officer replied.

"Do you allow any one to camp there for pleasure purposes for a week or two at a time?"

"We don't object if they are all right. I always require some sort of a passport. But I wouldn't allow strangers to squat there without giving me some sort of notice or a pass. If you want to pitch any tents there though you'll have to get the granted permission of the girls, or under Angelina's permission."

"Is that so? Where is she to be located?"

"In general Aronburg's headquarters when they are not out, if you know where that is."

"I would like to have some of my friends camp there," said the spy in an affected tone of disappointment.

"I don't think they'd grant any more permits in that vicinity because there is peril of battle at any moment," the man announced rather meditatively. "Of course I feel rather a personal interest in those brave girls, and the boys too, and they too don't want any strangers whom they don't know to pitch any tents too near them, especially if you would not take the chance. They would resent it pretty severely. Your friend might perhaps locate half a mile farther up the shore."

"I'll tell them what you say." The spy lied, as he left the station.

"Five minutes later he was in an army telephone booth calling for the telephone number of Aronburg's headquarters. One of the girls, who was within the building answered the ring.

He told her he wanted and then hearing another answering call was attentive.

"Is this Francis Pedro?" He inquired in a quiet voice.

"Yes" was the reply.

"This is Nero Fenia. I just called to inform you that the parties we were talking about are on to us and our scheme and if we don't take precautionary measures we'll be captured. You'll probably see something of them tomorrow. Clear out of the building for safety. I'll meet you at the South Company Street."

"Thank you."

"I'll be there. You'll be meeting you at the South Company Street this afternoon between three and four o'clock."

"I'll expect you."

He ended the conversation.

Before dinner time Angelina Aronburg received the letter that Emperor Vivian had announced in his telegram addressed to her earlier in the morning would follow that communication.

She did not discuss the matter with any of the girls, but quietly passed it around until all her girls' scout officials had read it. In his letter Emperor Vivian stated little that had not been read between the lines of the telegram, although his views and comments on the circumstances were interesting if not startling. He had seen the two professional spies arrive at some station just as the wagon train arrived, hide themselves in some wagon just as the wagon train was pulling up out. Curiously stirred perhaps by the recollection that these two professional men may be Glandelinian spies and had recently represented in forests hostile to the Christian cause and to Gertrude in particular, and remember her story of her rescue of Penrod twice, and that these two might still represent those interests, caused him to attempt to have them apprehended but of no avail. But he had found out which point the wagon train was headed for, for when he demanded the information he got the answer: "To General Aronburg's army." That was sufficient. The Emperor then got his telegram pad and wrote a few lines. Then he gave the message to the operator with these directions: "I want that to reach Miss Angelina Aronburg as soon as possible. Keep it going from my signal station, to station until it is delivered. Send it by wireless. Nothing can interrupt that. Have the operator who succeeds in getting the message into Miss Aronburg's hands wire back 'Delivered' as soon as she receives it."

On the hour following dinner, the advanced excursion and inspection of the prospects of erecting a telegraph station was again thought of and the motor boat was again engaged to convey the girls' scout leaders to the prospective place. On this occasion the apparatus and other material were taken aboard and conveyed to the scene of the work. The boat skirted along the shore, and a careful examination was made to discover safe landing places that might prove access from the flood waters to such sites for the station as might later be found.

Several good landing places were found. The one they finally adopted tentatively as a mooring for the boat was a large flat rock projection a few hundred yards north of the Glandelinian position. And a comparatively level shore margin extended back nearly a thousand yards from the rock to the point where the incline began. The boatman who was engaged, and a boy scout of thirteen who had been engaged in assisting in handling the heavier material remained in the boat while the girls started off in pairs to explore the nearest territory for the most advantageous and available site. They then came together half an hour later and compared notes. The result was that the report made by Mary Stanek and Jane Melfort proved the most interesting and the most excellent. They had found a pretty rocky half way up the side of the hill shore, and sheltered by a bluff on the inland side and high trees and bushes at either end, so that the enemy could not see them, nor any fire stone of the forest blazes could seriously damage a well constructed camp in this place. The area was considerable quite sufficient for the pitching of tents for any size of a camp but their purpose was only to erect a temporary telegraph station.

After the girls had inspected this proposed site in a body, an unanimous vote was taken in favor of its adoption. This being their decision they returned without delay for the boat and the work of carrying their outfit for the erection of the station a distance of some fifteen hundred yards was begun. The pilot and the boy scout as a assistant took the heavier luggage, while the girls carried the lighter articles and supplies. In this manner everything was transported to the station site in about two hours. The pilot and the boy then assisted in the work of putting up the station and after this was finished, they were paid and dismissed.

Everything went along smoothly while all this was being done. Not a single Glandelinian soldier or any person appeared in sight except the occupants of several refugees in a boat that passed by. The Glandelinian army under the Johnston Manley was about a quarter of a mile to the southwest, and a part of it was further up the hill, but the screen of dense foliage shut it off from view at the telegraph station of the girls' scouts. All the rest of the afternoon was required to put everything together, and the wiring to be done.

Everything had been set up and made ready, and so eager were they to finish this work that they did not stop to think of the supper time or to prepare a lunch, and were through with their telegraphing, had taken down the instruments and were back in camp before they realized it was an hour since supper time. But they had nevertheless sent their message.

However they ate hurriedly prepared, sandwiches, olives, salmon, and cake, and drank lemonade, picnic style in front of General Archibald's tent, and kept at their camp preparations between bites as it were. In the evening however they had a good camp fire girls supper prepared by Gertrude Angeline, and three others. Then they sat around one of the camp fires of the vast army and chatted principally about how the scenery would be presented to them when the time came to reach Abbeism. But they were tired girls, and needed no urging to seek rest on their cots as it grew darker. The move "Bedward" was almost simultaneous and the drift toward slumberland not far behind. They had one complete day undisturbed with anything of a mysterious or very startling nature and it was quite a relief to find it quite possible for one to go to sleep at night after twenty hours of diligent work without being confronted with apprehensions of some impending danger or possible defeat of their plans.

The following morning August the 26th the little girlscoouts all awoke bright and cheerful, entirely refreshed by their long night's rest. Breakfast of bacon, flapjacks and thick maple syrup, bread and butter and chocolate invigorated them for a new day of camp life in a new place.

For this morning their program was already pretty well mapped out being practically the same as that followed while in camp in other armies. They still did some work on certain lines arranged under the honor lists of the craft but were giving particular attention to knitting and sewing for the Abbeismian Red Cross which they aided in an auxiliary capacity. The program regularly followed by these Ranger girl and boyscoouts always when not on particular military duty required three hours of routine work each day. This they usually performed between the hours of seven and ten, or eight and eleven, depending upon the time of their getting up and the speed with which they disposed of the early morning incidentals.

On this morning in spite of the fact that they had gone to bed very tired as a result of the exertions of the preceding day, the girl and boyscoouts awoke arose shortly after five o'clock, though their rising hour is eight, and by five thirty all were engaged in various record making occupations, including the washing of the breakfast dishes, and the making of the beds, and the general tidying up of the camp. After the routine had been attended to, the girlscoouts themselves took a hike for the purpose of exploring the country to the north of the christian lines this time. This exploration extended about two miles along the shore of the flood their route generally being a hard road that skirted the flood at varying distances of from a few rods to a quarter of a mile from the waters edge, depending upon the configuration of the shore line.

During much of this hike Angeline picked, Gertrude and Jean walked together and discussed plans for securing a condition of affairs that might be expected to produce results in harmony with the purpose of their coming mission. They were all at first, but after a short and fruitless discussion of what appeared to be next to nothing, Jean herself made a random suggestion which quickly threw a more hopeful light on affairs.

"It seems to me that we got to do something that will not attract too much attention," she said. "We must not do anything sensational or at least too lively, or any stunts that will cause any one we don't trust to know we are here, for otherwise all the glandonian army will be bent on trying to frustrate us. Why not send to some location by wireless and get a bunch of Abbeismian Camp fire girls to help us at our schemes?"

"That's the very idea," Gertrude said eagerly.

Jean was a little startled at this reception of her suggestion. When she spoke, she was merely grouping for an idea. But Gertrude's approval woke her up to a realization that she had unwittingly hit the nail on the head.

"Yes," she said picking up the thread of a real idea as she proceeded. "We got to be careful not to attract any attention. That's the only way we can cover up our scheme for those two spies are showing too much interest in us."

"What shall we do?" Angeline Riches inquired.

"Get the service of camp fire girls. And map out for our use a spectacular program of some sort," Jean replied. "We might build a big bonfire for one thing on the shore at night, and go through some of our military exercises including girlscoout and folk dances."

"Good," said Angeline Riches. "Let's start off with that. And tomorrow we can have some games while we are waiting for the reply of the Princesses games that will make it necessary for us to run all over the country--here and hounds, for instance."

"Say there's one thing we forgot in all this excitement," said Gertrude. "We haven't none of us had even so much as a good wash since our trip down on the raft. We ought to find a good safe swimming place near at hand in the lines and take a good bath."

"Let's look for one this morning," Angeline Riches suggested.

"But how will we test it?" Jean inquired.

"That's easy the Royal scout said. 'We will use long poles to try the depth, and then one of us will take the chances to swim out with one end of a strong rope attached to her and the other end in the hands of two of the boys ready to haul in if she needs assistance. In that way we will be able to locate a good place to go in for a swim and not run any risk of anybody's being drowned.'"

"We've got a good starter, anyway," Gertrude remarked in a tone of perfect satisfaction. By the time we have taken care of those at home something more of the same character ought to occur to us. Yes that's the very way to interest ourselves while we are waiting for the vivid girls to tell us when they're to begin."

The three now separated, and mingled with the other girlscoouts who were some distance ahead or behind, and communicated the new plan to all of them. It was received with general approval and was the main topic of conversation until they all returned to the camp for early morning luncheon.

After the luncheon, the girl and boyscoouts with two sharp hatchets among them began a search through the timber for some long thin saplings. After a search for about half an hour. After a half hour's search they were in possession of three or four straight cottonwood poles, and five crooked ones but all very strong, each ten or twenty feet long, and with these in their possession they began an examination of the water depth along the shore for a safe and suitable bathing place.

They might have used their fishing rods for this purpose, but these were not serviceable as they were of extremely light material, and more over were hardly long enough for this purpose. The saplings too appeared or proved to be the most excellent feelers and the work progressed rapidly from the start. About two hundred yards of the christian lines was a sandy beach which extended along the shore of the flood for a very great distance. It was here that the child scouts decided to start their first under water explorations and therefore they tied a rough stone near one end of each of the poles to increase its special weight and gravity and then proceeded to feel for depth along the waters edge. And good and careful examination with these poles failed to disclose as much depth as they expected to find, neither could they discover any sudden drop from the gradual downward slope of the land into the water so that after all despite the fury of the flood there was absolutely no treacherous places near the shore, no bogs quicksands or dangerous undertows. Satisfied in this respect they now arranged for a further test. Jane Mallfort who was an excellent swimmer, returned to the christian lines, donned a bathing suit, and then rejoined the other girl and boy scouts bringing with her along ropes of the clothline variety. One end of this was looped around her waist and Marion Stancklingburg had an opportunity to exhibit her skill at tying a bowline. While at their directions two of the boys held the rope and paid it out, Jane waded into the water stepping carefully ahead in order to avoid a surprise of any sort resorting to from some unseen danger of such things as sharp sunken ice a piece of wreckage under the surface of the water. To some all this caution might seem foolish, foolish in as much as Jane swam well but one rule of the girlscoouts prohibited even the best swimmers from going into water more than waist deep unless they were at a beach provided with expert life saving facilities.

The purpose of Jane's exploration was to wade over as large an area of the flood as possible and establish a certainty that it was free from deep set offs or stop offs, bottomless pockets, quicksands, and treacherous undertows which floods usually have. Soon it became evident that she had a bigger undertaking before her than she had reckoned on, for the bed of the flood sloped very gradually or hardly didn't slope at all for no matter how far out she went it remained of the same depth, and Gertrude and Mary Stancklingburg volunteered to assist her.

"All right," said Jane welcoming the suggestion. "Go and put on your bathing suits, and bring a few more hanks of rope. Better bring all there is there for a probably we will need a lot of it now."

Gertrude and Mary hastened back to the Christian lines and in a short time returned, clad in their bathing suits and carrying several hundred feet of "hang man's" rope. In a few minutes they too were in the water and taking part in the exploration protected against the unknown conditions, as Jane was protected. . . . In half an hour they had explored and pronounced safe as large a bathing place as their supply of rope would permit. "Fence in" and then began the "fencing" process. They cut several stout sticks or stakes six feet long and took them to the floods edge. Then the three girls in bathing suits assumed their new duty as water pile drivers. They took one of the stakes at a time to point along the proposed boundary line of the bathing place, also a heavy mallet that had been brought along for this purpose. A wooden mallet by the way, was much more of service than a hammer or stone or hatchet for such purpose, inasmuch as if dropped, it would not sink, and moreover it could be wielded by one with much less danger to any of those working together in the water. The first stake was taken to the northeast corner of the proposed enclosure. Gertrude who carried the mallet, gave it to Jane who was strong, and then climbed to a sitting posture on the latter's shoulders. Then Jane stood the stake on its sharpened end and Gertrude took hold of it with one hand and began to drive down on the upper end with the mallet, which Jane handed back to her. It however was very hard to work for several reasons, hard for Jane to maintain a steady and firm posture under the moving weight, hard for Gertrude who wielded the mallet with unerring strokes, hard to force the sharpened point into the well packed bed of the flood. Gertrude's right arm became very tired before she had driven the stake deep enough to insure a reasonable degree of firmness.

While this task was being performed, the girls were still being protected against the danger of being swept into much deeper water by the ropes looped around their waists and held at the other ends by some of the boys on the sandy beach while other boys were coming over to help in pounding the stakes. After this stake had been set firmly into the ground under the water the girls returned to the shore and got another. This they took to another position about the same distance from the land as the first one and one of the strong boys drove it into the hardened ground under the flood. The same process was continued, until nine such stakes had been driven.

Then they took up the work of extending rope from stake to stake and completing the enclosure. The rope was then supported by bouys of light wood tied to the rope, two at the two extreme ends of which were attached to stakes driven into the shore close to the water.

"There, that is what I call a pretty good job," declared Gertrude Angelina gazing with proud satisfaction upon the result of more than four hours steady work, done of course mostly by the boys for them. "Whenever you girls come and you too please come out here to go bathing. Your army is inactive, you will be well warranted in assuming that you and the boys too have earned your plun ges."

"All the girls come by this time had their bathing suits on, but most of them were loath to remain in the water long, and as it was nearly general Breakfast time, they by common consent adjourned to the camp to take some rest until breakfast time.

"Will it appear that our activities have not yet aroused any 'pious' talk among the boys or Christians either," Jane Mollfort observed as they began their march back to the sheltered group of tents.

"I'm not so certain of that," Gertrude Angelina replied.

"Why not?" Angelina inquired, or inquired, while a number of the girls who were near looked curiously at their main girl scout leader, Gertrude.

"Because I believe I have seen evidences of more than common interest."

"You have" exclaimed two or three unguardedly.

"Now all of you, girls and boys together, you are forgetting yourselves yourselves," said Gertrude warningly. "Remember that the first requisite of skill in your girl and boy scout work here is utmost caution. The reason I didn't say anything to you about what I and also Jean saw in that I was afraid some of you might be losing your interest in the fact that we were being watched or spied on. I saw a number of gray clad figures, soldiers at that on horseback half hidden in a large clump of bushes up near the top of that hill yonder. I am sure they were watching us, and might have attacked us too if we had not been too close to the Christian lines. But I am sure they were watching us nevertheless. They were there at least all the time we had been working. . . ."

Nearly all of the girls and boys were evidently present when Gertrude suddenly made this at a startling announcement that they had been watched secretly for four hours by Glandelinians savorily while rapping off the limits of their swimming place nearby the Christian lines. The other girls, all of them, had taken the lead back to the camp and were a considerable distance ahead.

Are the Glandelinians watching us yet?" Jane Mollfort asked.

"I do not see any now," Gertrude replied. "I have not seen any sign of them during the last twenty minutes."

"How do you know they are Glandelinians?" Angelina inquired or inquired.

"Oh they may be a column of Christian patrol in disguise, but I'll take a chance on a guess that they are not. The uniform millinery I caught a peep at looked too chic for anything else than those Glandelinians called Garrolyian Curdies or 'Whorlers'. I have a pretty good long distanced eyes I'll have you know," Gertrude concluded smartly.

There was no little excitement among the whole troop of girl and boy scouts when this bit of news was communicated to them, but nevertheless they had received good experienced training along the lines of self control and just a hint of the wisdom of loud and extravagant remarks put them on their guard. Some of the girl scout leaders proposed that the plan of building a bonfire in the evening be given up and no one objected to this suggestion. And besides all of the girls and boys who had been out working on the flood felt like resting in their tents than doing anything else and those who had performed the more arduous tasks in the work of the early morning were "too tired to eat breakfast" as one of them expressed it. So no one felt like hunting through the timber for a big supply of firewood. The atmosphere too was dreadfully warm with a southeasterly forest fire wind draught, but the girls had hardly noticed this condition until their work in the water was finished and they returned to camp, and too the sky was as dark with smoke as though from thunder clouds.

After they had rested a while some of the girls took to read books and wrote letters, but little more was done before breakfast.

Yet after breakfast some of the boys, who felt more vigorous than those who had performed the exhausting labor of the morning morning revived the idea of a big camp bonfire and were soon at work gathering a huge supply of wood. They busied themselves at this until nearly night o'clock and then called the whole regiment of girl and boy scouts down to the waters edge where on a rocky ledge of huge size arrangements for the fire had been made. All of the girl and boy scouts so congratulated themselves on the revival of the big bonfire idea for the whole army was taking campfires to cook breakfast. A good bonfire there was just the thing although it would make a smoke the closely surrounding atmosphere uncomfortably warm.

Even the girls who had performed the hardest tasks in the "Fencing in" of their swimming place were by this time considerably rested, and enjoyed watching the huge fire seize the wood and leap into the air accompanied by huge rolls of smoke of black and gray.

"Let's sing!" Proposed Miss Saunders after the fire had grown into a roaring crackling blaze of great proportions throwing a terrific heat to a great distance and driving it then some distance from it.

"What shall it be?" Asked Virginia Zimmerman or Jane Mollfort rather.

"Burn fire burn," Violet Lindy proposed.

"Vary you start it," Gertrude suggested, for Mary Stark was the "Star" soprano of all Abhiannian girl scout camp fire songs.

In a moment the well trained voices of all the girl and boy scouts in the whole army were sending the clear, childish operatic strains of a So special Abhiannian Camp fire song. The music had been composed by some great writer of songs. This song was succeeded by a chorus rendering of a familiar adaptation of the Fire Makers songs. Then followed an impromptu program of Rarilious Hymns Hymns such as "Mother Dear Remember Me, or too followed by Sweet Sacred Heart, and then afterwards a Forest fire song, and then though they were Abhiannians they finished in with such well known musical expressions of patriotism as "America," Star a grand old Banner---and then All Abhiannians forever ever in evidence of a mindfulness of the dreadful struggle between Abhiannia and Glandelinia.

Meanwhile something like dusk gathered heavier and heavier, but they did not pay any attention and the girls continued to sing songs and tell stories. At last however Gertrude announced that it was nine o'clock which was time for the drilling to go on, and there was a general move to quickly extinguish the fire which by this time had been allowed to burn low. Suddenly all were startled by an astonishing occurrence. A heavy object, something unseen but huge in size tore through the heap of embers scattering sparks and burning sticks in all directions. There was a chorus of screams, and a frantic examination, by every one closest to the fire of one another's clothes to see if any of them were afire. "Who in the world did that now?" Jane Melfort demanded angrily, as she gently examined her own clothes, and then quickly struck out a spark that clung to the skirt of Angelina Riches.

"Q uick girls, or you boys." Gried Gertrude "Did any of you throw something into the fire just for a lark?"

"There was a 'Storm' of indignant denials with emphasis. There was immediately no room for doubt now that the missile missile had been thrown by some one outside the semicircle near the bonfire, or perhaps it was a shell that failed to explode. All eyes were turned back toward the timber a short distance away to the east but not the aim of a single person, a not alone Glandelinians could they see in any direction except when looking on their own friends, in the camp, but the missile didn't come from there, but from the straight east.

"If we'd been on the other side of the bonfire we'd have got that storm of sparks and embers right in our faces and all over us, and maybe needed medical treatment for burns." Mary Stanek said indignantly.

"We ought to cover the trail of the missile and see what it is, and find out who hurled it." Jean Saunders declared. "It must have been that Mutt or that Jeffsy without the slightest doubt."

"If they did they ought to be taken care of immediately." Said Joy St. Claire.

"Yes and if that sort of thing is repeated many times, some of us probably will have to be taken care of, and I don't mean maybe" observed Gland Gladys's Wanthworth.

"Listen," Gertrude interrupted, and the occasion of her interruption did not call for explanation. All heard it. A moment later it was repeated. It was a distant weird sound but was pronounced into the "Watch word 2 of the girlscouts."

"No boy or girlsout ever made such a crazy noise as that." Said Mildred died infelibly.

"It is a sane voice." Jean Saunders remarked.

"I'll bet a new uniform that it is that Mutt Spy." Ventured Joice.

"Have you a new dress uniform." Asked Violet.

"I'm paying for one out of my allowance." Joice replied.

Just then the noise was repeated, a hoarse hollow vocal vocalization of the girlsout Watchword. This time it seemed to be farther away.

"I'll bet the person who gave that call, threw the missile into our bonfire." Said Gertrude in a tone of conviction. "If he bothers us any more we'll open fire on him. We ought to have done that when he made that cry."

A The girls now turned their attention again to the fire. It took about ten pails of fire carried from the lake and dashed into the embers to extinguish the blaze until not a spark remained. Then they returned to their tents undisturbed for the coming of dinner although no disturbance had before morning, but they heard nothing more of the intruder yet. Then after dinner the girls put on their bathing suits and went to the edge of the flood just for a short while. Mary Stanek and Gladys Wanthworth reached the water's edge first, and presently they were giving utterances to such unusual expressions indicative seemingly of anything but pleasure that the other girls hastened down to see what what was the matter. There was how or however no need of explanation. The evidence was right there before them. The stakes that had been driven into the bed of the flood to hold the ropes intended to indicate the safety limit had been pulled out and thrown upon the shore. The rope itself had disappeared.

"There surely are some malicious mischief makers in this camp or its immediate vicinity." Jane Melfort observed. "I suppose the person who did that was that P. C. professional spy or at least the one who threw that missile into our bonfire and hoisted our watchword so badly."

"What shall we do." Glandys Wanthworth questioned anxiously. "We surely can't let this sort of thing go on one minute longer."

"We must get the Christian officials on to them." Jean Saunders suggested.

"Do you suppose they would be able to do anything." Mildred asked. "I understand it's very hard to get any official on to any body when it's so difficult to trace them."

"Then we'll have to organize a series of relief watches, and take the law into our own hands." Gertrude proposed.

"Spoken like a true soldier." Commented Angelina Riches approvingly. "I was going to suggest something of the same sort, but remember if we catch any one meddling with us you know our penalty."

"Where do you suppose they hide our rope." Mary Stanek inquired.

"Maybe somebody needed a clotheline and took it."

"Why look, here comes somebody like Christian girlscouts but dressed unlike us." said Mary Stanek.

"I know what they are." said Mildred. "They are Abolitionist Camp Fire girls."

"Maybe they'll be able to throw some light on the situation." said Glandys.

All looked up and saw two uniformed girls, but dressed far differently than the girlscouts. The latter were descending the wooden hill shore and had just emerged from a thick arborial growth to a comparatively clear area a hundred yards away.

"Sh! Gertrude warned quickly. "Be careful of what you say or do. They are the Camp Fire Girls of this region. They might hear us, but you know they are far under us in their station. Be very good and respectful to them."

"They are, also, early risers; we must say that much for them," observed Angelina Riches in a low voice. "We must give them credit for coming toward us and—"

"Even if they do wear uniforms that make them appear as if they were dressed for a sort of outing." Glandys Wanthworth included.

"Isn't it strange." Said Joy with a suppressed titter. "I wonder if they are going in bathing."

"Kiss me still." Gertrude interposed. "They're getting pretty near. Let's not pay too much attention to them at the start. Let them seek our acquaintance, not we theirs, as you know the camp rules. The advantage will be on our side then."

At this suggestion of Gertrude the girls turned their attention again to the condition about their bathing beach on the edge of the flood. A moment later Jean Saunders made a discovery that centered all interest in unaffected earnest upon the latest degradation of their enemies. With a stick she fished out one end of a small rope, and as she couldn't stop stoop because of her injured shoulder another girl was soon hauling away at what appeared to be the "clothes line" they had used to indicate the safety limits of their bathing place.

"Well conditions are not as bad as they might be." Said Gertrude as she took hold to assist at hauling the line out of the water. "We have the stakes and the ropes and can put them back into place."

"Would you mind telling us what has happened girls?"

These words drew the sudden attention of the girlsout officials away from the object discovered in the water and to the speaker who was one of the older of the urbanely clad Camp Fire Girls.

"Some Glandelinian spies have been up to some very malicious mischief."

Gertrude Angelina replied. "We had roped in a bathing place after making careful examination of it and after finding it safe for those who are not good swimmers, and you can see right here what has been done with our work. Evidently the stakes were pulled up and the ropes hidden in the water, and it took four hours work to put them up this morning, and we got up miserably early to do it too. Fortunately we have just discovered the ropes."

"That sure is mean." said the younger Camp Fire girl.

"Mean is no name for it." The other of the girls declared vehemently. "Have you girls no idea what it is?"

"Not that is very terrible." Angelina Riches replied. "But we can suspect one or two professional persons whose opinion is our camp. And there was a very mysterious prowler near our camp very early this morning, but we didn't catch sight of them. One of them threw some heavy object through our bonfire early this morning and knocked the sparks and embers in every direct direction but nevertheless he kept himself hidden. A little later we heard a hideous call in the distant chest woods, which which we were pretty sure was intended to frighten us."

"That sure is strange." Commented the third of the six visitors.

"Maybe it's a professional spy." Suggested another girl who gave her name as O'ra.

"Sny." Repeated several of the girlsout officials in unison.

"Positively." The younger campfire girl exclaimed hurriedly. "Do you think she was joking when she said that." Your Christian lines are teeming with those dirty sneaking Glandelinian spies. I know it."

The utterance of the word "spy" together with the probability that such things always could be true forced upon the imagination of the girls an irrational explanation of the strange occurrence of the early morning.

"No one can understand anything by it," Olga reassured, but her words seemed to one with a slightly forced unnaturalness. "But there has been some talk among our own companions left behind in the camp about two strange professional spies around here, you, know, an imitation or something or other of the Natural appearance of our old comic friends Mitt and Jeff."

"Did any of you Camp fire girls ever see them?" Asked Joy St. Claire.

"Not that I know of," avowed Olga. "Of course I can't understand such things, but then you never can tell. They might be natural at any, or it might be a clever disguise. But if they are here I'd rather face a half witted person, or a ghost, than such spies. They'd torture you to get information out of you."

"Are you sure they are more dangerous than two crazy men running loose around here?" asked Gandy's Wenthworth with a shudder.

"They must be, and they'll do anything to win out their work," Olga declared with a suggestion of awe in her voice. "But I'll guarantee they are here, for even emperor Vivian knows of them. If they are look out for yourselves. It's a case of who shoots a first you know. I know your plans, for somehow it leaked out from the Glandelinians, and those spies are here to frustrate you if they can."

"I am afraid they are bothering us too for I saw something mysterious moving through the woods near our camp last night," said another Camp fire girl whose name was Jean Granen. "No body I also among all us Camp Fire Girls would believe me when I told them about it. It looked like some dark moving shadow in the moonlight, and I was looking out of my tent. Suddenly the stranger stopped near the edge of the timber. He was looking toward the camp and I suppose he saw us for he picked up a stone and threw it toward where I stood. It fell a few short feet of its mark and then whoever it was, spy, or professional Glandelinian Agent--- he hid him what you please turned and moved away."

"Jean told us about that the next morning, and we all laughed at her," said Olga continuing the account. "I told her to go out and find the stone, and she did so, and picked up a large stone just about where she said the stone that was thrown at her fell."

"Were there any other stones near there?" Mary Stanck inquired.

"Yes, but none half so large. The place was covered with its stones. We looked around especially to see if others lay near by of its size but didn't find any. Afterwards we asked for some soldiers to guard our camp at night, but we were not molested after that."

"Is your Camp anywhere over there," Mildred Maxwell inquired, pointing toward the northwest.

"Yes, about four miles from the army, close to another Christian troop," the smallest girl replied. "I guess you know us as the Camp Fire Girls and it would take us too long to give you all our names. But my name is Irene Janben. We were very much interested when we learned of how near you advanced Girl Scouts had camped."

"Don't you Camp fire girls go out adventuring any?" Angelina Richan asked with a view of possibly bringing out an explanation of the attire of the Camp fire girls which seemed suited more for promenading along a metropolitan boulevard than for any other purpose.

"Oh dear yes," Olga answered. "And we follow the army very close. You know we are armed too. We have to be."

"Is there any chance of you and some of your followers helping us in our investigation?" Asked Gertrude.

"Oh dear no," Jean answered somewhat deprecatingly. "We'd like to well enough, you know but we are kept busy by our officers and the army so much that we don't just have time. We can do if you get us the permit."

Gertrude wanted to ask the Camp Fire Girls if they were willing to a stylish reception before breakfast, but then the idea struck her and she who they came all the way from their own like this. They were not ordinarily dressed like this, it was some sort of deception to use the army so they wouldn't be recognized as Camp fire girls. Ruth Gertrude and Angelina Richan wondered, until the oldest girl Olga continued her discourse to them.

"I really wish the military authorities did not demand so much of our time, and I'm sure all of my followers feel the same way about it."

There's nothing we'd like better than to aid you Girl Scouts, for we too live close to nature, you know, just the way you girls live, and our adventures are just as rigorous, even not as exciting. Truly it would be delightful to go to Abilene and see the sights of the disastere there and help you solve the Blasts mysteries. But when you become an in tragical figure in the armies you are regarded as indispensable and the military won't let go of you. But as I said before if you really desire us to go with you you could get us a permit from the Princesses."

"That's impossible," said Gertrude.

"That's what I thought," said Olga. "Our training is needed for that."

None of the girls attempted to reply to this speech. They knew Camp fire girls, and they couldn't go if they wanted to because they are not trained long enough. They were willing enough, but to get permits was impossible without the individual showing their training multitudes, and Camp fire girls are too young. The oldest one there was only ten, the others nine to eight. However Gertrude hoped for plan was to bring about the appearance of communication between them and the Camp Fire girls in order that they might associate with their camps too and that would aid a good deal in bringing sure evidence against the army.

"We'd like however to do something for you in your unfortunate situation," Jean continued with a rush of real friendliness. "I'm sure my brothers, each eighteen, nineteen, and seventeen years old and strong too would be glad to assist you in any way they can. I'm going to send them down here, if you say the word to help you extend that rope around your swimming place. They are very handy boys and it would be much better for you to let them do the work than to perform such a laborous and probably dangerous task yourself. And besides you should place guards near there too so no one can meddle with the safety lines."

"Thank you ever so much," returned Gertrude with a warmth that showed she indicated acceptance of the offer. The truth was that anything which tended to increase friendly relations between them and the Glandelinian Camp fire girls was acceptable.

"I'll have them come around any hour to day," the older Camp fire girl faithfully promised. "We must hurry back now for dinner as I hear the dinner bugle calls. We come down here personally to you see thinking you should be warned of them two spies you know."

"Come and see us any time you wish," Gertrude urged. "You'll always be welcome. We haven't made the acquaintance of other Girl Scouts around here yet. Come over some time and help us eat some of our constitutional luncheons or suppers. We have real picnics every day, the jolliest kind of times during long recesses---except when the army marches, we go out scouting, and adventure and so forth. Maybe you can help us catch those two spies."

"Catch them humph. I'd like to shoot them. I know what they did to a boy in our own band," said Olga. "Well good bye. You Girl Scouts are and see us too. Our camp isn't far away."

"Thank you" was the acknowledgment uttered by nearly all of the members of the Girl Scout force, as the Camp fire girls remounted their horses and rode homeward along a diagonal course up the side of the hill.

All the members of the girl and boy scout camp especially the officers gathered close together on the flood shore after the departure of the six camp fire girls and held a long and serious discussion of the situation.

"There was one thing missing this morning from my tent," Jane Edwards observed. "That was a pack of writing paper and my bottle of ink. I suppose one of those professional spies took a look at it."

"I wonder why they came down here at this time of day," said Dolores. "They are good Camp fire girls. There is something probably in the air, and they came down to warn us."

"I bet they never get up early like this to travel to us that time far before us lose something was wrong before," Vivian in a whisper ventured.

"Do you suppose they know something about our disfigurement and wanted to be on hand to aid us and especially when they discovered what had happened to our swimming place," Jane asked.

"That would imply that they know what it is and may want to help us for you know they wished to be a party with us in our adventures," Gertrude reasoned.

"And why not?" Mildred returned. "They don't look to me, for a moment to be hoodwinked. They are shadowed as well as we are and the Camp Fire girls are tormented by the same person as I'll be bound."

"I feel like a miserable child slave," Angelina pined declared with a sarcastic smile. "I'm not used to extending warm expressions of friendship to wicked people and asking them to call and see me." "I'd give anything if those girls were experienced enough to become members of us. None of them can have high rank you know, and when there are officers over there, the officer is a woman."

"Remember but we are spies, they ain't," said Helen Anderson. "We are always engaged in praiseworthy spy work, and we have to now always remember our own mothers, and the pa'nty, and the fist in the line if you have any doubt as to the worthiness of your occupation."

"Enough said," Gertrude announced, "I'm convinced. The jam is well spiced and I smell it already. I shall expect to find it on somebody's fist." The girlscouts did not forego their morning or noonday slings because of the removal of the "salty line" but were careful to keep within the limit which they remembered far from well. After about fifteen minutes in the water they returned to the camp and donned their uniforms, then they had dinner. The dinner dishes had not long been washed and put away when another caller arrived at the camp. Although not unaccustomed to the appearance of the new arrival was a great surprise to the girls, to all of them for they had rested much importance upon the promise of the Camp Fire Girls to send their brothers to them to offer their assistance in repairing the damage done by the suspected spies. The young boys appeared so suddenly before the eyes of the girl campers or scouts that some of them afterwards expressed the suspicion that they walked tiptoes into the camp, probably from respect. Indeed all the members of the girl and boyscouts even for years could have made the decided impression that the sound of the voice of one of them was the first notice they had of their approach. Or whether this impression be a true one or not, that voice was enough to compel memory of it ahead of anything else for to them it was the most high pitched voice the whole camp of boy and girlscouts had ever heard.

"Excuse me girlscouts, but we are Campfire Boys," quipped the one in advance.

There was a general start throughout the camp. Most of the girlscouts officers and privates were seated upon a large grassy plot within the present arrangements of the many tents and answered in their own time routine and several of them actually dropped their craft work into their laps so great was their surprise. Jane Mallory uttered a little cry of astonishment in almost the same key as the announcement of one of the new campers.

The latter was almost as effusive in appearance as his voice. But he was slim and tall, his face was pale and his eyes were over-looked and downcast with expression. He wore a uniform in the form of a paunch and across two pince suit and carried a officers delicate hatbox case.

"My sister informed me that you girlscouts were in need of the assistance of my brothers, and we volunteered to offer our aid," continued the young boy. "Oh dear me," replied Gertrude "it would be a shame to put you to so much trouble. We thank you ever so much for your trouble, but we would much rather retain the friendship of you boys campers by urging you not to insist. In fact we won't be remaining here long, for to morrow the army moves. But if you really must be so good as you suggest, you might go back and send some of our men or soldiers. They might help us."

"You see besides we want a pile driver out in the flood to sink some posts into the hard earth," Angelina pined added. "But by the way, come to think of it you might help us wonderfully if you have a number of good strong rowboats and would lend it to us for a hour or two."

"Sure we have boats, plenty of them," replied the willow boy, but the tone of disappointment with which he now spoke was unmistakable for he really had looked forward to helping his friends and so did his brothers. "We'll go over and send them right over to you now."

"We won't wait it till about two o'clock," said Gertrude. "If you wish you can send them later."

"Oh we won't need all our boats at all," the boy said. "I'll send them right away."

"He sure is a good willow boy, but I can't help saying that I have heard a tin his boat over on his high ground," Jane Mallory said approvingly as the callers disappeared into the timber. "The poor boy might be drowned in the billows of his own voice."

"That ought to be his nickname," said "High C," declared Mildred Maxwell enthusiastically. "I refuse to recognize him by any other name. Dear me everybody did you ever in all your born live long days hear such a voice!"

"No," they all cried in chorus.

"Well just the same he's the dearest thing you ever saw," declared Gladys Wentworth. "He can't help that voice. It was given to him by His Maker, and he has to stand for it."

At this moment the discussion of "High C" was dropped as suddenly as it appeared on the scene. Another arrival or two of them claimed the interest of the girlscouts. It was a little boy, and girl, both half naked and not at all happy in appearance. Both were good looking long bobbed haired children, the bobbed hair of child slaves, and there was no sprightly cheerfulness in their faces. They seemed nervous and on the alert.

"My goodness," exclaimed Angelina Jennings. "They are child slaves or I'll be--"

Dolores her sister who was seated close to her at out her sisters utterance short by clapping her hand over the speakers mouth. They little the little boy and girl were excited, and evidently frightened. And also evidently they were looking under anything but normal conditions. They had appeared very suddenly around the north end of the bluff which sheltered the camp on the southeast. "High C" as the girls from now on referred to the boy camper had left the lines around the north extremity of the bluff. The boy and girl fairly rushed from the thicket north of the christian lines and directly toward the girlscouts all of whom jumped to their feet in astonishment. The new campers did not slacken their pace but ran up to the group of startled campers as if seeking their protection from the glances which to a more timid children were more horrible than even the worst "Bogymen". And he stopped in the midst of the large group of girl and boy scouts which circled around him and his little girl companion almost as excited as they, and indeed both children looked back as if expecting to behold some frightful looking object bearing down upon them. "Fiercely."

"I ran away war," were his first words, "I and the little girl with me--no--they couldn't kill me and she."

"Who wanted to kill you and the little girl?" inquired Gertrude sympathetically, leaning over and taking him and that little girl gently by the hands.

"The army coats coated soldiers, who are the enemies of Christians they all hit me, and she," he replied his eyes flashing with anger. "The soldier who they call Manley locked me in a room but I opened window and climbed out. She came along with me. She is my sister."

"Oh the Gladiolus lane what you tell to day?" Mildred Maxwell asked.

"No," replied the little boy with a puzzled look. "But they know you girlscouts. They don't want you to know anything about that place called Abbeville. They stopped all communications after he learned you came here, and after the men came and told him to look out for you, and especially a girlscout called Angelina Aronburg, and Miss Angelina in pines."

"Who is the man?" Mildred asked.

"I don't know. I heard their names but I forgot."

"Was it Christie More wunn is, and another man who looked like Mutt?"

"Yes, they're the ones, the others name is N. and something. The smaller one told the general and his staff to cut off all communications with that place, to warn other had armies there, and to have all means to free frustrate your work or your setting there. They thought I was asleep, but I was just pretending."

"Did that N. Cro. Finn say why everything must be done to stop our purposes, and to have every one keep an eye on us scouts while we and General Aronburg's army is here?" asked Angelina pined.

"He did," the boy replied slowly. "He said somebody'd ruin the Gladiolus nation that way and the war would be lost."

"That's just what we thought," Gladys declared.

"What did you ever hear of?" Gertrude inquired.

"They are going to have spies shadow your every move, spies that will be disguised and be awful nice to you in front of your face but try to kill you behind your backs."

"That's interesting," Gertrude said. "What do you mean by that?"

"They are going to send agents into the christian camps disguised as soldiers."

"Have they done anything yet?" Angelina pined interposed having in mind the depredations of the few hours before.

"No they did not eat the agents yet," the boy answered. "They were talking about doing something of that sort last night, and two men with went out together but didn't return."

"I don't know what they proposed to do!"

"No---just eat something, anything they could..."

An pallid pike went to her tent, took out a piece of paper and a pencil and wrote on a sheet--

"To General Aronburg,

Have learned from escaped child slave of enemy's intention of sending secret spies into our lines. Gertrude advises allow no stranger under any conditions to pass any of the anti-sentires and double the sentries. Arrest all who come in.

Signed .

Angelina

Robert."

Gertrude signed her name, and a boy was dispatched with it to General Aronburg.

"What is your name little boy?" Gladys asked in the meantime.

"Haven't got no name," was the answer.

"Haven't got no name, sure you have."

The boy looked doubtfully at his questioner.

"Surely you have a name."

"I don't know," he replied slowly. "I guess not."

"What was your father's name? Didn't you ever hear it or remember it?"

The boy's face brightened up suddenly.

"His name was James Graham."

"Now I want to ask you an important question," said Gertrude most impressively. "Try your best to tell us all you can. Don't be afraid about this Glandelinians they won't get you here. We are all armed, and if they come we'll shoot. But just the same be sure to keep this to yourself. Now here's the question I want you to answer: Did anybody outside of the Glandelinian army ever see two persons called The International Professional Spies?"

"Sure, indeed," the boy replied quickly. "Some Camp Fire Girls north of your army, about a few in number did, and died at them. I did some of your Girlscout a called Gertrude Angelina, and others. I wish I knew who Gertrude was. They say she's a great girlscout leader."

"I understand. Where are those Professional spies now?" "Was Gertrude's next question?"

"They are in the enemy's lines."

"Is the army under Henley planning to do anything to General Aronburg of this army here?"

"Yes attack him and make him fight."

"Good. Now my boy and girl, we are going to take you into the camp and get clothes for you. You'll never be in the enemy's lines again, and you and your sister won't be slaves either."

"Oh how good you are," exclaiming the little fellow, throwing his arms around the neck of the Girls Scout leader who had saved herself on the grass before him and his little sister. "But I don't want the Glandelinians to scare you with a phantom."

"Scare you with a phantom?" Gertrude repeated in the greatest astonishment. "What do you mean by that?"

They said he boy began, but his explanation was interrupted in a manner so confusing and surprising that the army of girl and boyscouts might easily have wondered if the word were again coming suddenly all the absurdities of a childish paradise in order to be sure of what was now taking place. One of the Camp Fire girls who had spoken to them showed the ultra style and colored uniform of a girl scout. In the clearing dashed into the deeply interested group of child scouts seized the boy and girl in a each arm with passionate fondness and addressed them with a rush of endowment that would have brought tears to the eyes of any listener.

"Oh you dear little brother, and sister, you dear darling children."

The little girl had never seen a boy like this. At first he only believed this Camp Fire Girl was her sister, but he then she shook him, or into a little number as he was able to escape from the "affectionate" attack. However, nevertheless it was somewhat alarming to him. The "Affectionate" attack did not come in response to his protest. The Camp Fire girl held onto her captive with all her strength, and at the same time trying to soothe his wrath of or fear, or both with as many kisses as she could force in between the boy's arms. However, at first thinking it was queer decided to take a hand and do what she could to soothe the boy and the girl. The little girl too before they were transformed into voracious wildcats. She had believed there might be good or not good causes for the girl to do this but expectation demanded that it be checked at once.

"Here let me take him," Gertrude urged as she laid her hands on his shoulders and attempted to draw him away. A few gentle words and an exhibition of a kind persuasiveness of manner brought success. She drew both the boy and the little girl back some distance and tried to reason with them, whereupon they burst into convulsive sobbing. His sobs were not a new expression of an outburst of passion. Gertrude was certain of this. The little child slaves were weeping, not because angry. Upon the flood gates of their soul a "Because of unsuspicious of dread in their past experience which they feared would be repeated in the future." But the Camp Fire girl was not equal to the occasion. She had a a spiteful nose of nature toward Glandelinians in general and as she observed a severe scar on one hand which seemed to her because of Glandelinians she yielded impulsively to her vengeance of spirit that was boiling within her and exclaimed:

"The miserable Glandelinian pests. Just wait till I see two two Professional and I'll---and I'll!"

She stopped right there much to the disappointment of the eagerly listening girlscouts who fully expected her to open an avenue to the very evidence for which they were looking. "Why?" she continued with a desperate effort to control her temper. "I never know I could ever see my little brother and sister again, and if they don't know me. He and his sister were usually such a sweet dispositioned little dears. I don't know what to make of it. It took me completely by surprise to see them again. I don't don't understand it. I don't know what to make of it---I can't understand the little dears."

"It's strange, very strange," Gertrude agreed pursuing for her sake, to help the Camp Fire girl out of her predicament.

"Come to sister Jessie dear, and little Nell." The Camp Fire girl continued. "Don't you know your sister and me, and that she loves you just like me? Did you remember to run away from the Glandelinians? Come back me with me to the Christian lines and sister will give you some candy, just like of it. Come on now, that is a good little boy, and girl."

"I don't believe you are my sister. You'll beat me, and the Glandelinians will beat me and everybody else who's working my will beat me. Don't let her take us with her, please don't let the boy conclude turning his face proudly to Gertrude."

"Oh but surely she's a Glandelinian, and she must be your sister." Gertrude replied reproachfully. "She'll take you home into camp where the Glandelinians are. Let her take you home. Where in the world will you go if you don't go with her into camp? Think of it Glandelinian patrols are ever where useful and no place in the world to go that's safe, no place in the world, there are floods, and forest fires and terrible things. You are safe here."

There was a tone in the young girlscout's voice that suggested the boy and came to him realizing his mistake. He cooled down considerably and looked satisfiedly at his own sister.

"The afraid she's a Glandelinian sister. In the line, all Camp Fire girls are," he protested meekly. "You'll take me to a train and strike me back with a whip."

freeze their veins and arteries. Well they pretty n early put ours in cold

CONTINUES PURSUATION.
MEN LOSE, AND A STAFFING HISTORY.
THEIR TEAM EXPLAINS A STORY ATTACK, AND STORY A STORY
BUT STORY, GAVE THE GIVE, RESULTS. SHOOTING TO THE GENTLEMAN FROM THE HEAVENLY SHOOTING, AND HITS THE MARK.

From all news heard and as much as they could be heard it was considered the Fourth Month of the War greatest horrors so far throughout the whole region of Galverinia, and other Abheennian southern States, and in all other portions of the war zone where the last week of the Month of August was ushered in. Forest fires were worse, the floods were increasing, throughout July and August so far horrible explosion disasters were by the score massacres were rampant, plagues were sweeping upon millions of refugees, a frightful and disastrous battle had raged at Hio-Wirthier Janet with the enemy victorious, and the war was growing in violence everywhere. It was emphatically the worst month of the year, "bloody" everywhere. It was emphatically the worst month of the year, "bloody" everywhere. It was emphatically the worst month of the year, "bloody" everywhere.

anywhere. It was emphatically the worst month of the year, extended everywhere, as recent chapters will show, occurs on the Feast of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, the very first bloodiest and frightfullest battle at Evangeline St Andre, and that has already passed. On this day being now the 26th of August there were more than 45,678 men, women and children refugees from some known spot ingeneral Aronburke army and bef because of the dread of the ene y, and the fiercest fury of forest fire, and flood there was a commo como politan rathering of all country and town folk and city folk into big refugees camps and the like, artisans, marchan ts, professional men, farmers laborers, rich persons, wives and children, sweethearts and the like, who weasle reports of having lost property, dearness, or all their life savings and so forth. It was as thick a gathering as if it had been a gala day for dress, millinery, chatter, peanuts, popcorn, lemonade, ice cream soda water, balloons and squeakers, and it was beyond measure of the suffering and so forth, while it was reported that so many conflicts were raging that throughout the war zone, the noise was as if all over the country the reports of explosions of shells were as frequent as fire crackers on the fourth of July.

The gathering place for one of these great concourses of refugees was a concourse of every kind and all description of humanity, which had inhabited the towns ruined by the flood or from the devastated country round about. Even refugees within general Aronburg's army represented business men, and capitalists who now were poorer than a beggar. Some among the crowd moved here and there but the more quietly disposed of the congregated populace of refugees however sought the nearest convenience of the fortified towns in front of general Aronburg's headquarters. Others especially the younger element moved hither and thither, but none with any spirit of gladness, but rather of appearance of fright, sorrow or illness and those who recently had any attire were the saddest, and some just to try and get a little cheer would stand around one of the military band stands and sometimes upon the army fortifications of works. This had been noticed for days. It was a country sunk to the lowest level of suffering, a real valley of tears, misery and horror and dread.

On a morrow which was now the 27th, thirteen of the Ahlennannian Girlcut officers in their own uniforms were among some of the refugees, giving them some rations, asking questions as to the character of the disasters that drove them from home. These girls were expecting again to hear from the "Princesses" but some how nothing more had come. They were expecting also a visit from the Camp wire girls who are known as Wood Gatherers, Wire Makers, Torch Bearers, general spies and so forth, whose own experiences also were sometimes as exciting as anyone else, and their losses sometimes in members have been too severe, and laws had been passed that Camp wire girls must use utmost caution, as they too were working against great odds and the enemy was not to be trifled with. Gertrude said to Angelina Riehon this morning that the Camp wire girls too are officers and so

"The experiences of these Campfire Girls too are of characters so remarkable, so thrilling, as to render these Campfires, as organizations of no slight distinction, not only among wearers of the emblems and badges of the craft and chanters of the Abbieanman Whohole Chér other but even with the active, standing and higher arms and even the public

Your friend and loving comrade Companion,
I am Francis Warner.

However this letter was telegraphed not sent by any mail as this was impossible.

at large, for nation wide publicity had been given to their adventures as well as to their own, where also their missions of charity had always brought good results. Indeed it is not too much to say that these adventures they usually have are the chief subject of discussion among all members of out many regiments of boy and girls. Though not in rank 1 like we, being a trifle lower, I believe they operate in more dangerous territory than we do, and so laws had to be passed to forbid it. As we ourselves are compelled this time to go on an adventure that is quite serious I doubt if Violet-land her sisters would permit any camp fire girls to accompany us."

"What should we do while waiting for next month. Asked Angelina Riches. "You know because of the adventure in store for us, we have been granted a sort of recess till that month. Yet we cannot remain idle."

This was the question that held the attention more and more as the evening before had drawn to a close. Ever since then after it had been broached, the problem remained unsolved, the Professional spies did not bother them now apparently, then Angelina Jennings created a buzz of interest by laying before her companion officers a proposition just received by her by her mother far at home.

"She advises us all to study maps of the Abhienan Region, or make such maps like models in the ground." Angelina announced. "We have dandy places to camp here, and if we solve some sort of mystery here before we start our adventure violet, and her sisters will be tickled to death. They are just that kind."

The proposition was taken up seriously. First all the entire force of girl and boyscouts who had parental living were allowed a time of correspondence with their parents by wireless telegraph. Gertrude Angelina however was more cautious than usual in her inquiry into the plans of her officers, and well she might be, for had not all her force in the months and days, and all her officers frequently been snatched at the eleventh hour right out of the jaws of tragedy by troops, by their own efforts, by her own leadership, by the works of Angelina Riches and so forth. The clandestine she knew were very dangerous. As far as they were in the safe confines of general Aronburg's vast army camps it contained no menace to human life and comfort, as open forest fairs, dangerous travels on flood, facing fierce and savage foes and so forth. This time in the morning while awaiting breakfast the majority of the girlscout privates could be found either doing mercy among the refugees of being in groups on the lawns and meadows and on the massive works chatting among themselves or with other scout acquaintances, while the sadder picture of human life among refugees moved round and round, and across, and betwixt, and between, and yet there was no general confusion of non-descript noises but a strange silence everywhere. And too the army was on the alert for general Aronburg kept himself on duty despite his wounded foot, and knew all of the plans of "Anley."

Gertrude Angelina being the leader was present on all occasions for meetings, and adventures and all sorts of war troubles, but she also not only attempted to be girls with the girls, but boys with the boys. One thing that Gertrude Angelina knew, if she didn't know anything else, so she said, and that was how to keep all her boy and girlscouts where they belonged. All other camp army girls and boys not known as scouts they knew were not allowed by military rules to seek the company of other girl and boyscouts although they could with good grace accept the society of all girl and boy scout societies of military and other things if it came to them graciously and with juvenile interests. In other words "she had said that the soldiers cannot draw the younger folks to them as objects of interests to them they'd better seek the company of dried up grown ups or live the lives of hermit hermits."

The girlscouts known as dancers, vivianites, "nansoniets" and so forth, though entirely different, were equal in ways to the Camp fire girlscouts but nevertheless the Camp fire girlscouts had to be kept separate, their uniforms were different, and their rules also. And instead of children being leaders of them, men and women were.

All new girl and boy scouts always did like Gertrude Angelina and all her leaders from the first day they ever had become acquainted with them. They liked especially the better leaders known as Gertrude, Yolande, the Jennings girls, and also Jean and Mildred, but at first had kept aloof from Jane and some others, until they had become used to them for the latter were inclined to be more severe and pretty proud.

What was liked about the Abhienan girlscout leaders and the girls scouts themselves by real good foreign members was that they did not force any of their own notions and habits upon them, were like them in ways, they gave them the same freedom as all others receive, told them to live and pitch their tents where wherever they chose and always permitted them to go their own way as it might please them. The result was that Gertrude and her comrade officials never forgot them nor they for most the comfort and ease and in trust in whatever they had a mind to do.

As we know trivial mistakes never are remembered, and also for a moment boys and girls becoming scouts had usually their wits astonished out of them by the goodness of the Abhienan children, the holiness of the soldiers and generals and the half heavenly appearance of everything despite the fact that such a war was going on. One of them had once remarked to his chum who was a little Irish lad: "This seems to me like Glandelinia fightin' a war to wrest heaven from Our Blessed Lord, and we composed the armies of Heaven."

Gertrude Angelina was with her Girl Scouts on this early morning. She was seated on the lawn with Angelina Riches, guardian of the girlscout troops, Mildred Maxwell, Jean Saunders, and many others, besides Jack and George Zimmerman while many of the boy and girlscout privates were as written before grouped among the sad refugees trying to cheer them up.

Suddenly the attention of everybody within view was directed to a terrific disturbance as existing as if the flood had broken loose upon the army and the confusion of crowds of soldiers rushing toward the scene. "A fight was" was the word passed along, and all soldiers were rushing toward the center of excitement, while the refugees were thrown in panicky fright, as a terrific roar of cannon and musketry broke loose. A Colonel just then passed, and many cavalry troops hastened to the scene of trouble. The girlscouts and officials on the courtyard lawn of the general's headquarters from their more elevated positions could see more distinctly than the rest of the crowd of half-frightened refugees what was going on. A wave of clandestine accompanied by two lines had suddenly burst upon a portion of general Aronburg's position, and though the assault was of exceedingly violence and fury, it was of no consequence. In its drive against the Christian position, and their generals were having their troubles in attempting to rally their shattered columns and make their assault effective. If the battle had been between Heaven and earth the crowds of refugees could not have been more terrified, and all other Christian officers had all they could do to keep them in order, and aid them to withdraw to a safer spot. From her place Gertrude saw the clandestine rush forward to the storming like enraged wild beasts, but they were torn up by the Christian fire in that location and they couldn't make any headway as they were shot down in any unbelievable numbers as fast as they rushed on to exposure.

"Did you ever see anything like it?" Gertrude commented for the edification of those near her. "The way refugees will be so panic stricken when we Christian troops get into a scrap with the enemy. I don't know of anything that might prove our finish better than that if they don't try to control themselves and be more settled. There's no doubt in my mind that all of those older children among the refugees ought to be in our scout or Camp fire girl forces by conscription and be trained to know what we really are like."

"Good for you Gertrude," exclaimed Jack Sanders who was one of the many that heard the girlscouts' criticism of the panic stricken foolish refugees. The battle was over a mile from them and they acted like that. "It does beat all how things like this do get impressed on peoples' minds," said Mildred. "We Catholic Abhienan never have any hold in that 'Monkey Theory' but I'll be swished if I don't believe half of those people are acting like that now and the battle a mile away and the enemy army getting the sound worst of it. It's just as plain as daylight; if people weren't sprung from monkeys they wouldn't be like this when a fight comes on."

Everybody in hearing distance of these two speeches laughed heartily. The girlscouts on the courthouse portico of general Aronburg's headquarters observing that the enemy line was wavering and recoiling like a broken wave and that the situation had become a center of interest that could not be depressed and unsavory effect of the fight left their position and joined the group of officers.

"That's the joke about the fight," inquired one of the privates whose name was "Harriet" Newton, as she and other girl and boyscouts with her distributed themselves here and there on unoccupied portions of the seating capacity of the lawn to see the battle better.

"That is an impertinent question for one thing," smiled Gertrude with mocked severity. "If some of you exclusive girlscoouts would drop your exclusiveness and seek the company of 'us bright folks' you'd be more likely to be on hand when something interesting turns up."

"Very well," said the girlscoout gravelly. "I'll sit right down with you 'linsies' and wait for something more brilliant than that silly charge to be destroyed. I do really hope it will come pretty soon for that kind of a petty assault by the navy and the way it ended so suddenly, and the way those refugees acted gets my goat."

"Why Harriet Newton," Gertrude exclaimed as if deeply shocked. "Are you not ashamed of yourself to use such slang in my presence before you know whether I the 'Queen of the Girlscoouts' approve of it."

"Don't you approve of slang," Miss Aronburg? "asked Jean Sanders. "Now since you think you're an officer, don't you try to put me to any such kind of test as that, cause I won't fall for it." The demure girlscoout officer answered, trying to hide a smile. "That is getting away from the issue. That is not a question of slang but of general diplomacy in the ranks. I am very fond of diplomats Harriet."

"Oh I knew you were not very friendly toward any kind of slang," Harriet replied positively. "But I don't believe in diplomacy when I am sure of my ground. The Glandelinians wouldn't alter after that just happened."

"You talk like an old head," Gertrude once commented admiringly. "I am only nine," Harriet flashed back with the dim dimity of a little girl's consciousness. "But I'm old enough to understand that diplomacy is made up chiefly of camouflage fibs, and that the Glandelinians in this war use it."

"What are camouflage fibs," inquired Jean. "You are forever spring strange foreign words on us Harriet. Now make good and explain this one to us 'most important officers' in the world."

"Camouflage," the challenged girlscoout began having in view a scholarly discourse on the Abbeismian use of the idea of warfare. "It's to cover every article to make them look like something else."

Then she stopped suddenly and fixed her attention on something that was taking place along a far extended line of christian works. Every other person in the group followed with their eyes in the direction of her gaze.

"The Glandelinians are making another, and a tremendous assault Gertrude," Harriet continued, changing her subject to fit the occasion. "I'm going to keep still and give some of the bright folks a chance to produce some thing interesting, that is if some noisy shells don't start kissing the ground at our feet."

Yes indeed, two extremely long lines of gray clad soldiers were moving forward with wild yells as if two colossal lines of men were going to be engaged in a pugilistic demonstration that looked like the beginning of another hell on earth. Christian guns were booming up all along the line, but this assault was unusually violent and it could be seen that at one spot the christian line was broken. Then everything hid from their view in smoke as a tremendous upsurge of fire arms and machine guns snote the air. The course of this assault was not apparent to many, but Gertrude knew, and so did her officials, and at the start it had the appearance of being about as ridiculously unequal as well as it could be. A cry of great indignation went up from thousands of throats as the Glandelinian wave was seen to be hurled forward suddenly with the wildest yells and drive back nearly half the christian line, while from elsewhere there was a roar of cannon that others stated could have been heard two hundred miles away.

Suddenly close to Jean the generals' band headquarters stood there was a mighty eruption as if a volcano suddenly burst into action and every one of the girlscoouts, and boys too, and all the refugees were showered heavily with dirt and debris of every description while a roar came as the loudest thunder crash in the sky ever heard.

"Gun for shelter girls and boys every one," shouted Gertrude. "The country is being shelled, and we're in for it." And as she spoke a greater eruption occurred at her fixed bathing beach and it rained torrents of water and dirt all over them as they ran. The combat was echoed in like manner from many other quarters.

However though they broke through a portion of the christian line the Glandelinians did not have everything their own way. After crashing through a portion of the christian line, there followed elsewhere a terrible roar of battle the like of which the fleeing child saw a never imagined of hearing before and which proved to be the liveliest thriller of the scene. Then something all happened so quickly that before a crowd of refugees could ascend in the boats of Glandelinians turned in upon them, and rushed for their boats well before any number of christian soldiers could hamper their movements. Set close by and marked was a christian machine gun battery which firing over the heads of the now terrified frightened refugees galled the Glandelinian troops bringing them down in droves, and these Glandelinians retreated with a speed which probably had never been witnessed by soldiers before.

Then a long column of Glandelinians rushed savagely upon the retreating christian line and the Glandelinians were driven down clear into and out of the line, across the water and back to their own line of battle with great loss. Elsewhere other christian columns had been hurried to the aid of the christian line that was being driven back, and as the generals in charge were most pitiful men the troops were soon back in possession of their own works. Crowds of refugees still safe observing a battle for the first time noticed that here was a rare exhibition of great skill as opposed to a vastly superior weight and strength of the fierce Glandelinian onslaught, and their column kept the Glandelinians back at a respectful distance, still the badly pressed christian line was heavily reinforced by general Blain. It kept pressing christian line was clearly a master of the art of spring to this line. The line itself was clearly a master of the art of spring to this point of threatened disaster, and of bringing aid here, and aid there. Now and then it was going to last no one knew, but it seemed as if it was going to turn out as a terrible battle, for the Glandelinians were fighting most desperately, and thousands of men were ad children among the frightened refugees, watched in hated breath as the fierce surges of Glandelinians again tried to cross forward, and indeed it was the first time that any of the old and boyscoouts had ever witnessed such an unusual scene so close. On a safe spot behind a high ledge of rock stood Gertrude, a line so close. On a safe spot behind a high ledge of rock stood Gertrude, a line so close. On a safe spot behind a high ledge of rock stood Gertrude, a line so close. On a safe spot behind a high ledge of rock stood Gertrude, a line so close.

Now the road christian guns were dashed a point to be brought into position, troops rushed past at the double time, and added with all the excitement was the wild uproar of the conflict and the dreadful howl yell the Glandelinians. The attack and spread of every christian commander seemed to create a popular demand that so novel a contest be permitted to go to the proper finish. The Glandelinians swung their line of attack viciously desperately, at various points again and again in union and against the christian positions, but in vain now. Their troops were moved down by lateral lines, and the tearing up of the main Glandelinian wave and recoilment brought cheer upon cheer from the throngs watching the scene. The Glandelinians then held some points but these were frustrated. This seemed to be the turning point of the "wall." The thoroughly whipped Glandelinian columns evidently for this time being had all they wanted, their losses were dreadful, and their generals who survived were looking for new means of getting their leadership back away from this moral and bloody embarrassment. While they were thus debating about for moments of safe retreat, the other christian batteries arrived, and fresh troops and a terrific and most murderous fire was opened upon the disheartened Glandelinians. The Glandelinian columns with howls of dismay broke away from the assault and ran, the christian troops rushing on in pursuit. The main column staggered, almost fell into dust and rolled altogether in full numbers and then fell back, while the victorious christians pressed on eager to get at the enemy for the punishment they had received from them. Finally the attack reached a climax when the retreat of the defeated Glandelinians became a rout, and then one cloud of smoke from the firing of the christians revealed no more to the thousands of still half frightened and yet curious refugees and here worshippers who looked for just one glimpse of the results of the christian counter charge.

All the old and boyscoouts held their breath during such of the performance. Jean was quite conscious of nothing naturally it should be that each of them was generally conscious of nothing all else in action or being rather than this grand and affair. They were all what up "Hail" by the exclamations remark from Gertrude. "Hail" followed by a pause for the drawing in of a long pant up breath. "That's the nearest I came to saying 'Goodbye' to the line here shot to pieces, and I know I never came any nearer."

"It won't be over," said Anselme. "That's only a sample of what's coming. I'll bet. Unless it's not beaten yet, and I'll bet it won't be either."

"I'm afraid so," said Gertrude. "Help you are still with us and can like any christian army if it's not on its guard."

"I bet that was part of to have your entertainment," declared Jean. "You were standing in a line, and one and all we such a thing as that could take place without being staged ahead of you. You mentioned 'unhappy' Gertrude." "The generals of the army wouldn't dare," Mildred returned positively. "But our armies won't stand for such a disgraceful put over as that was. I bet our losses of the army is terrible for that short time." "You can't tell what our armies will stand for till it's put to the test," retorted Jean. "It seems to me every one of those refugees were paid a stroke over the affair, judging from all the noise crying and screaming they made."

"Gertrude where's your map bag," Mary Stanek asked suddenly. Gertrude looked down at her hands, and then up again at an astonished at her girl scout officer.

"Why," she exclaimed, "there is it! I had it in my hand. Then she began an examination of the lawn near where she stood. "And my material carrying knapsack is gone," exclaimed Gladys Wentworth, "an missing that article also."

"Mine's gone too," was the startling announcement of Jane Wellfort. Then Joy St. Claire capped the climax of of consternation by declaring "Somebody has taken my letters I had in my waist pocket."

"Then there are Glandelinian spies, operating the same as our pickpockets in the crowd of refugees and soldiers," screamed one of the girls out a short distance away who had discovered that she too had lost her girl scout hand bag which she used to carry military girl scout gear. Presently another girl scout pickpocket picked up Gertrude's handbag, she turned it over to Gertrude who examined after examining it.

"Ninety the money is not missing, for it's here," then suddenly she began a nervous hurried search in the handbag as if moved by the recollection of something vastly more important than a million dollars. The look of despair that came over her face as she took out the last remaining article was sufficient evidence that her search was unsuccessful. With a gasp, she seized Mildred's arm, for support, exclaiming:

"Oh Mildred, its gone, its gone. What will I ever do. Oh I must find it, I must find it, I must find it, or our expedition to Abilene is ruined."

"Oh what's the matter Gertrude, tell me please! What have you lost." Angelina picked up Mildred with not only deep concern but great apprehension moved by her friends agitation.

But Gertrude's distress was even greater than at first. Believing, Fearing that she was about to faint, two of the girls took hold of her arms to support her. Evidently she was in need of this assistance for her weight rested heavily on them. "Somebody send for a horse and we'll take her to her headquarters," Jean suggested.

No further effort was made at this time to learn what was the strange and mysterious article whose loss had so unnerved the unhappy girl scout. It was not necessary to send for a horse for others of Gertrude's friends were numbered by the wholesale puling of the spite army not only by the girls and boys and a horse was immediately brought. Jean, Mildred, Mary Stanek, and Gladys accompanied her on their horses to her headquarters. Gertrude walked on a sidewalk soon after the horse left the crowded portion of the Christian camp and began a nervous half hysterical discussion of the developments of the day.

"I bet there was a regular army of Glandelinian spies in that crowd of soldiers acting like military pickpockets in this battle," she said. "I'll bet too you'll find that they were scattered all over the camp and worked like beavers during the excitement during the Glandelinian assault. You see if a very large number of soldiers and even our scouts were not robbed."

"And if the very thing happened that they needed found out their necks," Mary Stanek interrupted.

"I wonder if it really just happened," said Mildred dubiously. "I can't help feeling that there was something mighty funny in that Glandelinian onslaught. And besides, because of the scout and boys too had a good deal of military training at all scout schools, and while they didn't exactly make military generals and officers of us because we're not men we know something about it. Besides, our own under difficulties. Now I don't believe that attack was made for any other purpose but to take advantage of the general being wounded so they could crush through his lines unless—"

Mildred hesitated. All the other girls gazed at her expectantly. "On loss that," Jean asked. "When it was with that plan Gertrude discovered of 'Anley's' to frustrate our purpose of making that expedition to Abilene, and that is why she was also robbed."

"Exactly! Exactly and nothing else," Mildred replied, just a little relieved at the way I too her of the responsibility for the audacious Glandelinian assault that really was in her hand and making expression. "You see how Glandelinian generals can make all sorts of other plans upon us. To us," responded Mary Stanek, who was less inclined to suspicion. "You and they can do that only after long practice." Mildred answered quickly. "And what Glandelinian general, I don't care how he is trained or how much he knows his own geography can always follow his plan without it being frustrated, without a Christian general being able to throw him off his own guard? I don't believe she even any Glandelinian general can do that, and if he wins a planned assault it must be then only by sheer force of numbers."

"You mean that the whole performance was a ploy to rob us all?" Gertrude inquired.

"Just that, but it might have been done to an advantage. But I believe a part of the program was to frustrate our or the plan of 'Anley's' sisters to go to Abilene. I'll bet there'll be a terrible battle today. Listen to the firing will you! I never heard the like. As many cannon roaring and the yelling, and the explosions of shells. I believe we are in danger."

"I think you are right," said Jean, "but I'm afraid in other words that could not be allowed any more to be carried through than any other plan." Mary Stanek objected. "But I believe, and believe firmly in 'Anley's' plan. His other purpose in view more important, because you know 'Anley's' is close by. If 'Anley's' can lure Abraham's army from Abilene back here, 'Anley's' will be relieved."

"I think you are right at that," Mildred assented. "But what's the idea of putting a or such a gigantic stake in the plan then, and that every girl scout may be robbed of important papers?" Angelina picked up.

"It might be to give general 'Anley's' an opportunity to give aid to 'Anley's' and prevent general Abraham's move to make a junction with general 'Anley's' and endanger general 'Anley's' arm, and Federal." "Anley's" Glandelinian kidnapping. "Surely," 'Anley's' would not deliver an assault like that if that was not the purpose."

"I can hardly believe it and don't," 'Anley's' exclaimed. "I firmly believe our expedition in going to be frustrated unless our side comes off in the battle with Colored flying. If 'Anley's' joins in the attack I'll bet we'll be the ones flying."

"I'm not saying positively that any such audacious trick as that was planned but I won't dismiss the plan as until the thing is either fully explained or until the dreadful battle comes to one end or the other." Gertrude declared. "But I was shocked when it was necessary that for fifteen minutes straight, the enemy rushed headlong on even though so for those every simple minded thousands of their ranks were mowed down for every onward step of the onslaught I never saw the like. It was dreadful."

Through the excitement none of the girls could think of going to breakfast, for although they had tents pitched and everything in complete order, they now made arrangements for the time being for preparing for all duties that might be assigned to them should they be needed and the squabble grew worse and that nothing might hinder them from getting the most possible from the dreadful scene. Moreover to the fact they saw something as sublime as a grand display of fireworks, but the noise there was a terrific endeavor. It was evident 'Anley's' was preparing to try his utmost, and that the battle was no petty one like the first with 'Anley's'. Fought recently a few days before, Gertrude recovered rapidly from the nervous shock she had received following her return to her own headquarters. (Not Abraham's as every one had moved from there from word of exploding shells) in company with the four girl scout leaders.

"I think I'll stay here with you Gertrude," Mildred announced at the breakfast table. "But I do not feel like eating."

"You don't need to," Gertrude returned quickly. "It's best for you to be with the other girls, and have a good time watching the progress of the battle. I'll be all right, nothing as the water meter with me—only a little upset, and I have besides a good appetite now."

"But I don't like to leave you here all alone in such times as this," Mildred insisted.

"What do you think I'd do if you girls scouts weren't here? Jump into the flood, think I'm a fish?" Inquired the patient. "Don't I cut 'Anley's' Florida the best girl scout 'Anley's' on earth here with me always and couldn't she save any one from the effects of illness? It wasn't for her I would have really died when wounded in her mouth a neck. You

"Indeed it is not, Gertrude. They were ought to go as near as I can see and see the battle and follow its outcome without any doubt." I just naturally would like to go too but I must stay here with you alone when there's other others who could enjoy themselves."

"Now about you 'arty---wouldn't you like to go under the 41 bottle you self Josh asked."

"You sure make some funny props propositions," said Mary. "The very idea we are the battle. I should say not. It's too shocking."

Idol-We are the battle. I should say not. It's too monstrous. . . .

However the real divisions of the Protestant leaders at the prospect of leaving their spiritual home with the faithful "bright-eyed Mary" were now considerably alloyed. Gertrude took part in general appearances and in particular ones, although several times the rowdy girls wondered if this appearance were not produced with great efforts they observed Gertrude apparently lapse into momentary despondency. But if the girls were not mistaken as to appearances, Gertrude successfully dismissed suspicion each time by some light word or smile of manner sufficient to penetrate with depression of spirits.

to associate with depression of spirits. So the glad warriors and many who chosen to stay with their officers went to a high rise of ground near where a big branch of the flood rested comfortably in a plateau like depression between the south eastern edge of the town and a succession of wooded ground also occupied in the course of the events of the early morning they heard from others many references to the sensational affair of the battle and other incidents simultaneously, that the Glendellian generals were delivering addresses however blows upon the left wing, and learned that the number of persons all officers known to have been robbed of some important papers and the like had been growing pretty every minute until the stories that were being circulated had become almost unbelievable. Many important letters and papers had been taken, but watches, valuable necklaces worn by child girls and pocket hooks containing money were not taken. It was shown that the Glendellian 1st 2nd "pocketbooks" were not after valuables of that sort, but a after things which were to aid money in his purpose to break up general Franchises army. The evidence of this too was proven by the wild violence of the attack. The girls and all the officers who had heard of this returned to Cambridge headquarters immediately filled with awe at the grand scale on which the operation of the "military pocketbooks" had been conducted.

of the "Military Pickpockets" had been conducted. Gertrude had prepared sleeping quarters for the pirated officers for the coming night, before they arrived at her own headquarters and directed them to make use of these accommodations, whenever for any reason they desired to do so to avoid the probably dangerous outside, so on this occasion they were to know all the intricacies and to reach their several bedroom rooms without delay or confusion, and without disturbing the other occupants of the house. "Ildred and Jane together occupied an upstairs room at the east end of a long room.

While they had returned, "Liddy suddenly had a conscious sense of some kind of an alarm, she recalled the principal events of the battle just past a few days before and attempted to convince herself that the repulsive fight she had witnessed might after all have a nightmare but the delusion did not remain with her long.

but the delusion did not remain in her lungs. She looked toward the west win dow and observed the yellow fog thin for from distant forest fires streaming in like atmospheric acid. As the reality of things dawned upon her, she recalled the fact that now very distinct cracking noise, heard above the rum of distant battle, as of the creaking of a door, had aroused her. Almost at the same instant the noise was repeated and with a thrill of apprehension she secured herself, and almost sprang from her chair and hastened to the window and looked out. The first glimpse over the yard brought nothing remarkable to her view except the strange wild beauty of the mellow scene, which however she was in no frame of mind to recognize.

The kitchen was on the east side of the house, but a curved walk leading from this entrance wound around an old neglected flower bed to the north and out toward a broken down gate, near a road. "Crying" began from this view. "Childs" lay faced toward the north, and down stairs. Suddenly from the side of the house to the north appeared the form of an old man clad in a loose coat with nothing on his head. "Childs" was so startled for the moment that she retained only slight control of her senses and it was a small wonder that she did not give a sharp snap of astonishment. It was the "utterly" in German.

"...told what is the matter. What in the world are you doing?"

THis inquiry, coming from Lady, who had been aroused by Mildred's sawed examination, caused the latter to turn half round although she had retained her position at the window. Her friend had been sitting on the bed.

"Come here quick," uttered urged in a strange, almost hollow voice. Gladys was soon at her side, and following with her eyes the direction indicated by her companion's fingers. She saw the form what appeared to be a bent old man like a beggar, scarcely clothed for even an outdoor excursion even in this time of morning, and with his uncovered head covered thick with hair, but she certainly recognized the face even at that distance. "That's my father," Gladys exclaimed. "What is he doing here, where

"Why it's that our 'utt" Gladys exclaimed. "What is he is he going now?"

"I'll go with you, but you must see you're aimed as he's dangerous." The other girl acquiesced.

"We'll put on our tennis shoes, and kimonos and slip on our cravenettes and rain coats, that'll be enough to cover us from his sight so he'll not suspect who we are--and try and surprise and catch him before he gets away from the building and--" "Come on quick!"

in a second both witnesses were executing this dressing program with greater rapidity than they ever before had engaged in any proceeding of the like character. After it was complete they hastened down stairs and out the back way. The strange spy was through the west window and observed the dressing wildard had kept watch through the west window and observed the direction the spy was taking. taking.....he saw him slowly pass through a gate leading in to an orchard, look in three directions cautiously, and then lost sight of him as the form of a large apple tree obscured him from view. Wildard let in the spy's whereabouts inquired of him. As they passed through, Gladys said, "What are you doing around our place? What could suspect who we are?" "Come on quick!"

view." Childred left the car. "I don't know," said Gladys. "I don't know." They passed through it, Gladys's worthworth inquis ad!!!! "What could "What do you suppose that spy was doing around our place? What could have caused him to be here during this battle?" "It's a hard thing for me to figure out," Childred replied with as much deliberation as was consistent with her rapid movements. But one possible explanation had occurred to me.... "What?!" "That?"

"What's that?"
"I'm afraid he's been trying to get in something on us."
"Oh I hope not," G'sa Gladys or Mildred deplored sympathetically.
"So do I. But I'm afraid it's something of that kind."
"So do I. But I'm afraid it's something of that kind."

"Oh I hope not," a steady stream of words came from Gladys' mouth. "No I'm afraid it's something of that kind."

They were now running along a path that led them through the midst of the orchard toward a timber of twenty or thirty acres in extent directly toward the south. Near the far edge of this timber, the girls and boys' camp were located and the permit was leading them directly toward it. The woods here was beyond the campground measure in extent most of them risen pine. As the two girls were running through this place, paying no attention now to the roar of distant battle, Mildred inquired of Gladys "What is it?"

"Have you any idea what time it is?"

"Yes," was the reply. "It's twenty minutes after six. I slipped on my wrist watch as we were dressing and look at it when we got outside." Outside.

"Where do you think that spy has gone?" Mildred contrived to ask.

"That is pretty hard to say. About the best we can do is to follow this path but we must take care he does not see he's being shadowed, or he'll flee on us, and Gertrude says he's a crackshot. That spy was following me."

"I disagreed from my view."

"I was just thinking of that."

At the west edge of the road the girls found another smaller road which turned into the timber land. They passed through and continued their way along the same until they had been on the timber was thick with dead wood and under brush and there was considerable obstruction to their progress. Finally the followers of this spy came to the edge of a small clearing clearing which was crossed by the path, and were about to slip into the open, when Mildred stopped suddenly and seized her companion by the arm.

"He'd probably annoy everybody, and then there'd be a lot of explaining to do. Angeline or Polona - 'ichollaster' - I'm sure probably would be present clamoring more than the rest for an explanation and you know how severe in matters Polona is. That person could be nice that would sound plausible."

"I'll let her do it from now on," Gladys' maid, "It's not a matter of life and death, even no disturbance at all, only we don't wish no one yet to know we trailed or shadowed the spy from the house and back and its not for any body concerned just now but our own business. If she hauls in things up." "I'll

"Oh it's mine," Jean exclaimed eagerly.

The next instant she would have given a good deal to be able to know who had taken it as she had been one of the losers. But what was the use? Her next mental argument. No one could be captured yet who were doing all these things.

"Excuse me girls," she said, and with an announcement she retraced herself to the building and skipped on the portlier arch into the next room. The girls, waiting for her return grew impatient, the receding troupe were very close by, the firing of course was incessant, but the walls of the great hall and more exultant, but in a moment when across a year, she came back with the wrist watch in her hand. "Listen girls what I'll read she said." I found this light on the road as I came out. But wait till we get to the graveyard."

As noon as all were safely in the graveyard first behind a long stone wall Hazel read aloud so every one could hear as follows:

"SENSATIONAL FIGHT IS GENERAL. HAZEL'S TRICK TO 'SMASH' GENERAL ARONBURG'S BEFORE 'EVILIAN GEMS' CARRY THROUGH THEIR PLAN TO DISCOVER CAUSE OF ADIRANN DISASTER."

TAKING ADVANTAGE OF BATTLE TWO HUNDRED Glandelinian spies invade christian lines and carry off treasure amount of iron and weapons and army property. Many girls' scouts robbed. Spies escape through confusion of battle."

Everybody for a moment forgot what was going on outside while Hazel read the two columns of thrilling description of the affair that had enraged the whole army. The evidence was so clear that it was conclusive that an organization of Glandelinian professional spies, perhaps some of the smoothest in the Glandelinian army had plotted the whole performance of this assault with the smallest in the Glandelinian generals with a view of producing the very results that followed. The number of individual losses of military valuables suffered by officers had not yet been estimated but apparently it was about six several hundred persons judging from the number of complaints on every hand. But no money was stolen nor jewels. The report carried the names of all who had suffered losses, and among these were Gertrude, and the names of the girls' scouts who had suffered losses. The statement of what they had lost was accurate, except as to Gertrude who had said nothing to the officials about any loss sustained by her side.

From papers taken out of her hand box. Consequently no reference was made in the paper to this mysterious loss. Every one by now had come to their respective places of defense. This grave yard was near the beginning of a series of beautiful scenic depressions and elevation regions. West of the creek. West of the hilly expanse was covered with heavy forests. The stream called Glenor Creek was more than the average depth and width of country creeks and in some places flowed in fitful rapids and eddies along the uneven bed the entire length of the horror now raging. This stream was not much affected by the distant flood but was fed by numerous springs and spring water rivulets on three sides. The graveyard was a short distance up the timber covered hillside from Glenor Creek about a quarter of a mile from their own camp. This site was selected because of the best defense. The tombstones were reliable, and so were the arches and mounds and if the foe should come this way they would be exposed to the fire of all the girl and boyscouts who could see now then down to a man without being touched themselves. The retreating troops were coming up slowly past the road and toward the slopes of a fern decorated hillside. They were also retreating here and there across small meadows near the stream. Stream through the meadows where buttercups grew in such abundance variegated with a plentiful sprinkling of flowers known as shooting stars, anemones, cowslips, violets, and Sam's Whittier, and Unisyn. Here the disorganized troops tried to make a desperate stand, but the enemy fire mowed them down like sugar falling out of a sack in grain. The enemy were pouring on through the country where the stream was rushing on further on up the side of the creek where the bushes were larger and thicker and the growth more arborial and stronger. Here too the christian soldiers were trying to rally but just now it could not be done, and the reinforcements expected was not in sight. General Aronburg did not hear of the disaster yet.

A large number of girls' scouts were in a deserted hotel which was an object of no small interest. It was covered with vines and moss and surrounded with a dense growth of small trees and shrubbery. Over one end drooped a large old tree which had grown with a considerable lean toward the building. This tree was over one hundred feet tall and five or six feet wide at the base, and undoubtedly was no more than a young tree at the time the hotel had been constructed. One of the first object of the girls' scouts to take up defense here was the fascination of the love of the old tree. The tree was a relic of a revolution. They found the interior was in a remarkable state of preservation. Even the floors were fairly sound and the steps leading from the first story to the third were sound and strong and could be climbed with safety.

There was a large fireplace in the main room on the first floor and this fireplace and the entire chimney constituted one of the most substantial elements of the whole building being constructed of boulders of all sizes laid in Portland cement. Into these surroundings all the girl and boyscouts laid down following the danger caused in the serious break in the christian line. So far now there was nothing inspiring in these experiences, for though suddenly completely victorious the enemy was now at a standstill, and now every one of the child scouts hoped heartily that the enemy would not press on any farther. When child scouts are compelled to fight as a rule, about the best of the subject is safety of the sort. The future of all christian child scouts seemed always to be mapped out with promises of startling events, the one hopeful feature of which recognized their ability to pull through always with triumphant success, though some times with losses.

What the girl and boy scouts would have liked to enjoy would be a roof many days of delightful camp life to serve for the purpose of alleviating to a large extent the disturbing effects of their long and dangerous as well as mortal fatal trip down the raft on the flood, and Gertrude had aimed one of the worst experiences in her life, and that too the girls themselves could have become sufficiently annoyed and confident as to the future to congratulate themselves on the return of normal conditions. Now however their time of excitement still continued.

As the for seemed now at a standstill, under the main topic of the conversation was the shocking affair that interrupted their hunt for celebration of the morning. But the more they discussed it the more unsatisfactory were the results, until finally Gertrude herself saw the whole matter around for an entirely different view from a new angle.

"Girls, and you boys too," she said as they seated themselves in a large open square of the graveyard. "I have permitted this talk to go on as long as it has with a purpose in view. I could see plainly where it was leading to a too--no, no, confusion. Now I want to call your attention to what has been uppermost in your minds during all of your discussion of this affair. It is this of course: a sheer duty, and probably a little curiosity as to who lost plans, and other military valuables in this early morning unscheduled event, and the individual amounts of articles lost. This concern has popped up here and there along the line, and though in the majority of cases, the generals and other officers have been the main sufferers, it looks as if the blow was intended for us, and where you girls and boys too had the desired information, you turned it over, and over, and over and insist out to be certain that no feature of interest escaped your attention. Moreover this purposeless concern and apprehension has served to dissipate your days outing and smothered your hopes for adventure. It has unsettled all of us to such an extent that mostly all of us have wondered or wondered here and there with little idea of what you or I or others wished to do except to get out and fight the enemy."

"Now my suggestion is that henceforth you taboo that affair as a subject of discussion, at least except here and there incidentally, until third there is some real occasion for its coming up again. In other words train yourselves to throw off any sensation as soon as you see that you see it is leading you round in a circle all the time."

"In still other words," broke in Anneline, "you caught us in a vertigo of conversation, and thought you would let us go the limit so that we couldn't help looking foolish when you called our attention to what we were doing. Girls I'm ready to admit with all of you, and all you boys too that we have been foolish. But I'll stick up with all of ourselves just the same. If the enemy didn't sent in these spies to steal these things from the officers, with the main purpose of striking us, then I was a positively sure of the former, and no one or anything fight. But I'm positively sure of the latter, the subject is too even will change my subject. Therefore let's vote the subject is too even there does not appear to be a chance of its getting us anywhere. The enemy won't come this way now and for us the chance to fight is all over I believe. So let's vote it in."

"I second the motion," said Anneline Jennings.

"All in favor say aye," Proposed Mary Mary Stanek.

There was a loud chorus of ayes.

"Gon't say 'no'."

"Not a no was uttered."

"Carried unanimously," The subject is----- "Here comes a horseman," announced Dolores. And all eyes were turned in the direction indicated. A high way ran through the timber a quarter of anion mile down stream and the soldier had dismounted from his horse and walked into the clearing which extended almost up to the place where the girl and boy scouts were gathered. It was difficult for the man to find a passageway of anion around the avenues between the graves and the tombstones and undoubtably he would have found the task almost utterly impossible if he had tried to come on in on the horse. There was a girl scout with him and they had not come half the distance between the road and the gathering place of the child scouts before Mildred recognized them and exclaimed "Oh that's soldier Mike, and his Hettie, coming with her."

She was correct and she indeed the girls, the "an salutis g and going off again.

"What have you been doing in the graveyard?" she inquired.

"We thought the enemy was coming this way, but we were fooled and we were again holding a conversation, and and--" Mildred said and as she hesitated for a completion of her sentence, Jane Wellfort finished it for her thus:

"Ah And talking nonsense."

"Nonsense" demanded or repeated the girl about matron with a glance around of not very severe reproval. "I'm surprised. What were you talking about that seemed to be nonsense?"

"What happened this morning and who were the victims of the Glendale linen spies and of this strange and violent enemy attack which is so far so dangerously successful." Mildred replied.

"Why was that nonsense?"

"I don't suppose it was at first but finally we got to the end of our string, and there were only two things for us to do, stop or go over it all again. Well we didn't stop, and the first thing we knew we were going round and around in a circle."

"Yes, and did a lot of pushing over it, didn't we kids?" interposed interposed Mary Stanek. "I must have been one of the main offenders, I admit it. When we got worked up to a high pitch of feeling, some of us would cry out 'wasn't it awful, wasn't it terrible. Did you ever hear anything like it.'"

"Yes that's real nonsense and almost gossip." the girl scout child matron agreed settling herself as comfortably as possible on one of the grave yard benches, which two of the girls brought for her. "And that brings to my mind a very interesting subject. Did you ever ask yourself what your mission is that the Princess desire to send you on Gertrude, and you to 'Miss Angelina Michael'?"

"It's going to be full of excitement, its dangerous, and might turn out a perfect failure, but for the sake of country and cause its worth while to try it." Volunteered Jean Saunderson, who had made considerable study of the dictionary for a class work. "We had to study up on that when we were becoming scouts."

"All right then you are just the little girl I want to quiz." said Hettie Kornmann with a slight twin like in her eye. "By the way I used to be a child scout like you myself."

"Yes, and you used to teach us in the country, didn't you Hettie?" asked Dolores.

"That I did right on the outskirts of the village of Turne, although that town isn't its proper name" she replied. "and do you know girls and you boys with all due respect to the advanced character of the 'Camp Fire Girls' I believe I have learned some things in the middle around between here, and the forest that few people learn here. For instance I believe I acquired a broader understanding of the results of good adventure as than the average critic of all workers of adventure could ever boast of. I'll guarantee your adventure to Abba Abbaeann won't be a failure though it'll be full of dangers."

"Horrer, I believe Hettie is going to give us something new." Jane Wellfort, interposed leaning forward eagerly.

"Wait till you hear what I have to say," suggested Hettie. "I may have some questions to ask to find out if you get me. My experience has taught me that the more perilous an adventure is, the more you people wish to go in to that adventure."

"There what did I tell you." Jane explained. "Did anybody here ever hear anything like that before?"

Apparently nobody had.

"All right Miss Wellfort" Denton used Hettie, "Now I'm going to put some questions to you. Do you believe what I said is true?"

"Believe what?"

"That the mission proposed by Violent, and her sisters will be a success."

Mildred gazed thoughtfully a moment or two at her lieutenant then replied:

"I cannot say yes, and neither can I say no. I'm doubtful."

"Why?"

"Well" the girl scout said slowly, "the enemy had armed all duns if he is guilty, and such danger to the adventure. I'd dangerous because Glendale in an army won't even allow their own boy and girl scouts to go near the region, and therefore we can't take the tip in Glendale. In fact they won't let anybody there. Therefore it seems it hasn't any particular purpose in view. It's only hopeful that we can have General Aronburg make a junction with the two civilian generals, then get in with other armies, march for the region and clear the territory of the army. Otherwise our adventure is a wild goose chase, if you please."

"It seems a better plan as a rule, doesn't it?" Hettie inquired.

"Yes, but it's a little higher class of work unless you can offer some suggestion that will cut the generals busy on something that will bring all other plans to a crushing success."

"What do you mean?"

"A battle must be fought at Abbaeann in face of securing success for our mission."

"Very good. Now will you tell me how many kind of subjects there are in the world, that can carry through such a success as you propose if it has to be such a bloody one?"

"As many subjects as there are in the military class." Jane replied quickly. "The Glendale in an army up there are under five Tamarlins, Thomas Taddard and Philline Tamarlins being the main heads. I've heard officers talk about the effects of the war, and how the weather worked on both sides. That was just when they wanted to plan something but didn't know anything about their subject."

"How is it possible the weather can show a effects on the war?"

"Oh goodness I've done that lots of times by experience." Jane confessed smiling a bit mischievously. "But that was before I became a girl scout. I used to be complaining about the weather all the time, whenever it was stormy. It didn't get me anywhere. I did not know what to do to make me comfortable. But belonging to this organization had solved the problem of weather conditions for us. We realize now the conditions of weather is terribly hard on the enemy, especially on hot summers and cold winters, and with our exertions, our studies, our many little occupations that we work out are just the things we need to keep us from noticing the weather. Do you know really that these hot days and nights are not hot when you are deeply interested in something or have a lot of excitement."

"That is simply splendid." declared Hettie with deliberate emphasis on each word. "I surely didn't expect a lecture like that from so young a girl scout. If there are many others who can say such things I'll have to take back what I said about getting a broader understanding of the situation of your adventure. You even added something to my view of the matter when you introduced the subject of meteorological weather on the enemy."

"I didn't know that I--" began Jane. Then she stopped and admitted her bewilderment with a puzzled look on her face.

"What is meteorological weather on the foe?" Angelina Tanager Angelina Jane asked.

"A Can't any of you figure it out?" Gertrude herself inquired with a searching look in the face of every one of her young child scouts.

"I can't several of them admitted."

"If Jane can't tell what it means there's no hope for an explanation from us," said Gladys. "She knows more big words than all the rest of us put together."

"Don't be in too big a hurry to confess ignorance for us all." Angelina Riches interposed quickly. "If none of you girls and boys can answer that question, I think I can."

"Isn't all those disasters like a meteor from the infernal regions?" inquired one of the girl scouts so naively that nearly every one laughed heartily. The others still being in an attitude on the subject of meteorological weather failed to catch the joke.

"The trouble is, Jane," said Angelina Michael. "That you have a limited understanding of the word meteor. You I suppose little girl scout you are thinking of it as a ball of fire flying across the heaven at night. That is of course a specific meaning of the word. The word I mean is a general meaning not popularly understood or understood in any phenomena of the atmosphere, such as rain, snow hail, I win downpours great heat and terrible cold."

"If it rained shot and shell, and shrapnell, the shot, shell, and fragments would be mine." suggested Gladys's Worthworth.

"Surely Angeline niches rained with an amount of disappointment." "Providing it didn't come from guns fired off." However Gladys's by that suggestion you are getting the other girls off the track. Now can't somebody answer that question?"

"Oh I know what it is." suddenly exclaimed Joy at Claire clapping her hands eagerly. "I remember reading the other day that Jack Evans is one of the most skilled generals of the country and he knows lots of the means of that word. The weather is hard on the army, because their country is further south. They cannot endure so much as we Northerners can."

"Then what is meteorological conversation." Hattie Kornmann asked.

"Gossip of what is going to happen to general Aronburg's army." Jean replied, but the chorus of laughter that greeted her explanation proved she had missed her opportunity.

"It's conversation about the battle," cried several of the boys and girls together, and both Gertrude Angeline and Hattie looked very pleased.

"Now said Hattie Kornmann. 'I've delayed an important matter longer than I should have delayed it. I really came here on a mission, not for conversation. General Blain Nightfinger merely reported to general Aronburg that his staff report reported or predicted that the enemy cannot be held back, and the army is going to shift position. The attack of the enemy is a pretty severe one, with strong violent movements. I thought I had better come here and suggest that you girls and boys remain in your secure position till night, or at least I had intended to direct you here, but saw you were here already.'"

"Girl and boyscouts are soldiers and are not afraid of Glandelinian soldiers," said Gertrude Angeline warmly.

"Not much are the y." declared Miss Dolores. "Thank you very much Hattie but I am for one in favor of sticking to our positions. I like a good stiff fight with the enemy."

"So do I with lots of thrills in it - but not too much shell fire," said Miss Ruth McWhirther.

"Let's invite Hattie to stay with us." one of the girlscoouts suggested. "Just as you say children," said Hattie. "I'm not afraid if you're not only I thought it might be more comfortable if there was not so much disturbance."

"Girl and boyscouts don't always look for comfort fast," vouched Virginia Zimmermann.

"If there's going to be a storm attack we'd better remain here and be ready if the enemy come up here," Gertrude suggested.

Therefore preparations were made, each one assigned to some strong sheltered position. They got everything in condition for the expected attack upon them too if it should happen the storm attack would crush the christian line. Hattie said that the reports that came from the officers was - "The enemy is missing in everestronper numbers. Strong columns moving from the southeastward. Not a change in the situation. They are totally winning the battle. she told of hurricanes of attacks along general Aronburg's right wing, and heavy attacks hurled against the positions at the creek. Hope was expressed however, that the force of the attack would be pretty well broken before they got too far into the christian lines, or general Aronburg would lose his reputation as not "having ever lost a battle." Down below the enemy though fighting fiercely was still held in check now by those who had rallied and there was no indication as yet of any further disaster impending, but the noise proved the conflict had redoubled in fury. Hardly a breath of air was stirring and the sun was like a pall. The sun did not shine to day, and the day was also going to be a day of oppression.

Half an hour later every one was behind their own point of protection and the fast work of the girl and boyscouts on their ground behind tortoise walls, and mounds and the like, besides trees had to do with securing their positions against possible tearing losses by shrapnell fire by themselves with spears and shovels found in the cemetery making some sort of small small earthworks. Everything possible was tested, as well as the mounds in made behind trees in which they were to defend themselves.

So, some shrapnell were also placed in position for the boy and girlscoouts to protect themselves from the enemy's fire and rain of shrapnell.

After this work was completed three of the girls began the preparation for the scouting, for all the girl and boyscouts did duties in shifts in their regiments, and since there was so much excitement this was their day. Still there was no sign of the storm of snail prom-ised by the reports. The sun if it could have shined was already up two hours, and as nothing happened the boys themselves decided to gather a supply of wood with which to build a fire to smoke the enemy out if they should close on them in all directions. So everybody, known as Wood Gatherers, Fire Builders, and Torch bearers got busy. In half an hour Gertrude gave the orders that it was enough and the industrial gatherers of dead and dying tree limbs and much and dead leaves contemplated with satisfaction the abundant results of their labor.

"That ought to make things look pretty tough for the enemy when it makes plenty of smoke," said Angeline Riches. "Unless we have a regular 'Enemy Cloudburst of men against us' all the Glandelinian attackers that rush us ought to be like water going up in steam."

"The enemy will make it pretty hot around here if he comes to us," Jean Anders suggested.

"Maybe it won't be so bad if we could the enemy down a little," said Jane Nellfort. "We can make it hotter for the enemy than they can expect."

"But the report said 'The enemy are winning the battle so far'." Mildred reminded.

"Oh that has no reference to our calling the ardour of the enemy," said Mary Glank. "For instance maybe you could cool the enemy down a little by turning our little machine guns upon the attackers."

"Well we hope to drive the enemy away from our point and at least keep the Glandelinians at a distance till our armies either makes a retreat or win." George Zimmermann suggested.

At this juncture the conversation was interrupted by the sound of a horse galloping down the cemetery road. As it stopped a strange man dismounted and advanced toward the group of girls and boys. He was a middle aged man six feet tall, with a shaggy beard, wearing instead of a uniform a civilian garb and a slouched hat.

"I am looking for Miss Angeline Aronburg," he announced lifting his hat and bowing with an urbane ease that seemed to indicate a professional society practice. He waited for a reply, still in an attitude of great conventional politeness.

"I am Gertrude Angeline," said she rising from a camp chair on which she had been resting from her work, while the girls gathered firewood with the boys.

"I understand," said the man. "But I'm looking for Angeline Aronburg, not Gertrude Angeline, though I admire you very much little girl. Can you tell me maybe where she is located?"

"I happen to take that name too for I am she," repeated Gertrude. "Then I hope you will excuse this intrusion," said the man, advancing a few steps nearer, and still holding his hat in his hand. "But I came here from general Vivians headquarters on most important business and I was told at your headquarters that you might not return to the house until this squabble younger is over. I could not very well wait there with the enemy running crazy like this, so I mounted my horse and came here." The other members of the force of girlscoouts, realizing that the business interview sought by the man might require privacy withdrew to a respectful distance. Then suddenly Jane pointed off toward the south east and said:

"See girls, look there. That must be the storm attack coming toward the christian lines now."

The other girls looked in the direction indicated, and there was a chorus of concurrence in Jane's suggestion. Evidently the long Glandelinian wave was moving very rapidly forward, for even as the girls looked it was possible they could see the white fringe of heavy smoke along the rallied and reinforced christian lines growing denser every moment. "Those Glandelinians have a mighty strong support to their storm attack," said Angeline Riches. "If it should prove to be a very violent attack it might do some serious damage when it got to playing with the defensive lines of our comrades."

"While the other girls and boys were occupied in watching this 'Battle storm' Jane stole a glance at Gertrude and the unexpected visitor. For some reason that she could not explain she felt that the man was therefor some troublesome purpose, and her glance toward them in no wise tended to ally her suspicion, though by the mans visit was absolutely friendly. The two were engaged in earnest conversation, and the girlscoout leaders attitude even evidently was a physical reinforcement of a vigorous protest. With a little shudder of apprehension, Jane was about to turn about and rejoin the girls in their conversation about the storm attack, when Gertrude motionsed to her as if beckoning to her to approach the spot where the interview was taking place. The girl did as requested and as she came within a few feet of her guardian and the stranger she heard the former say to the man:

"That is absolutely all I can say on the subject. I hope you won't bother me about the matter again, nor the Princesses either, for it won't do you or me nor any other person any good. It's dangerous but I won't give up the mission. I'm sorry to refuse but I must. You mean good but duty is duty. If you think it is as dangerous as that you may shadow us to shield us from that danger. I must bid you good day now."

The man turned and left, a little sorrowfully it seemed but with at least an effort at his customary politeness. Then Gertrude turned to Jane and said:

Jane you stay by me, and gather all my officers to me. I've something very heavy weighing on my mind, and I must simply hold some council."

Jane promised to do as Gertrude requested.

After the first clear warning toward the southeast the "storm attack" came rapidly, driven onward by their determined leaders, and supported by a most furious cannon fire. Their advance upon the Christian lines in that locality coming wildly across the fields appeared as rapid as that of many racers moving across a prairie in the distance. The girl and boys, and their leaders, and every one else with them had remained behind their many objects of protection until the first tremendous uproar of firing told the attack had finally struck the Christian line. In accordance with Gertrude's suggestion it was decided not to do anything rash. Lest they too foolishly draw an overwhelming attack upon themselves. Gertrude and Angeline pitched occupied a wide tree, and Hattie Kornmann was behind them. The force of the attack of the Glandelinians rove on rapidly, but from their places of concealment it seemed evidently true that it was of no avail, because the Glandelinians were being shot down in whole droves as fast as they came on. Most of the battle settled rapidly over everything. Believing they were free for the time being the girls and boys seated themselves in a large ring in a clearing, and Gertrude Angeline introduced the subject that was weighing heavily on her mind her narrative being punctuated with flashes of fire from distant Glandelinian batteries and peals of cannon and thunders, the roar of musketry from the Christian lines and the yells of the surprised enemy, while it was seen that the enemy were being in danger of annihilation was wavering and portions falling back.

"You will remember this evening as I perhaps you will remember none other in your lives," she began, "and there is a peculiar reason for my strange prophecy. If I had been planning every detail ahead, I would not have selected a stormy battle scene in a graveyard as time and place for telling my story. And there is more in the action of a battle storm than most people suspect. I know this from many most severe and impressionable experiences I have had during many big battles which I too have seen. Many of things heard, seen, and done by me in the past days of this astonishing war I can recall now but I would not like to because of some of the awe associations of a battle storm like this in other dreadful conflicts. Therefore I would suggest that you girls and boys attempt to fix your mind calmly on the unromantic reality of things in order that you may recall this scene in after years as rationally as possible."

"I surely must look for something unusual and very interesting after an introduction of that kind," Jean interposed. "I suppose I am too young to get the full meaning of what you are saying, and yet I can't look for something very much out of the ordinary."

"Your expectations are well warranted," Gertrude replied. "And I'll leave it for you to decide as to whether I have overdone the thing in my introductory warning. I'll here go on. The trouble I'm in has a double cause. I have lost something and I have forgotten something. If I could remember, what I have forgotten, the loss probably would not be serious, and girls and boys if I had what I lost, the lapse of memory probably would probably of no consequence."

"That doesn't sound as if you overdid your warning," Jane said with a smile as she leaned forward in an attitude of deepened interest.

"All right. I'll go back to the beginning of my story," Gertrude then before continued. "General Curran who died of his wounds in a month ago or so at the battle of Delton was trustee of a number of mine plans consisting some thing of the country of Abilene or north of the city itself, all her railroads, and subways, including the subways that even went underground long ways beyond beyond the city northward scheduled nearly all railroad property, street car lines, and including including the munition plants of the city. Well at the death of the general the trustee of these plans passed to me. With them in my possession the investigation of the disaster could be very easily successful.

But before his death there was a period of several months during which it was evident that something strange was weighing heavily on his mind, and troubling him greatly. I tried out of course to find out what it was but was unsuccessful for some time. At last I learned that the Glandelin authorities knew about his plans, who to capture Abilene and secure the territory, was trying to make trouble, and the Glandelinian authorities were succeeding in annoying this general and his army far more than I had any idea. In fact although I did not realize it at the time the general's mental balance was wavering. His army had been defeated six times. The plan consisted chiefly of what I mentioned before. The general wanted to prevent them from getting into possession of the foe. The general to prevent them from getting into possession of the foe kept them at first in a vault in Angelina Agathia, but a few months before he died he brought them to Galverine and put them in a local vault. I did not know this at the time or I and all Christian generals would have suspected something wrong, for the small vaults there were hardly the best places for keeping a important plan of that kind which the enemy would give anything to secure. On his death bed he informed me of this act and also that he had moved the securities from the local vault. He told me where he put them, but I was in such a state of distress that it made no impression on my mind. It seemed to me that he said he buried the papers but for the life of me I can't recall where it was. I did remember however, that he said he had left a sealed letter addressed to me at one of the local banks, with instructions for its delivery to me in the event of his death. This letter he said, contained full information as to where I would find those important plans, and I suppose the fact that I knew he had left such information caused me to pay little attention to his oral statement as to where the papers were.

A day or two after his death the letter was delivered to me but I was in no condition of mind to pay any attention to business. I opened the letter, saw that it dealt with business pure and simple and laid it aside, intending to take the matter up when I felt better. But when I looked for it a few days later, I could not find it. For three months and a half I hunted that place high and low for that letter. Meanwhile officials of the Christian government and generals began to ask questions as the usual information did not come. I was in a quandary and I suppose foolishly evaded the issue, hoping to find the letter that would tell me where the missing papers were. They became more insistent and I began to send scouts to try and retrace the letter. But their suspicions were aroused, and a demand was made upon me for that letter. Realizing that the bond giving by Violet and her sisters and myself was ample security I refused, and got them to intercede for me. They then stopped bothering me. However if I had that plan our investigation of the disaster would be as easy as eating ice cream. But the strange thing is that just a few minutes ago by the famous Gemini Leader general Hendro Dargar came to see me on that subject. The nature of his mission do day was to ask me as well as he intends to ask them the princesses not to take a chance on such a dangerous adventure. He told me it was rank suicide but I refused to comply telling him that it was my duty, and that if I was afraid of the enemy I might as well go home. He threatened to start proceedings of which would prevent our going if I did not voluntarily give up such a mission into the hands of the proper soldiers or allow him and his men to make the attempt. I told him he couldn't do it, as the Vivian girls have the say in all matters, and it was their plan, and he couldn't stop them or it wouldn't do no good to tell them about it."

"And if you ever seen this great man before he called to day," Angeline Angeline nichon asked.

"No I haven't," Gertrude replied. "His warnings against our dangerous adventure have been conducted through by the telegraph, and through a local centre, the most scrupulous member of the Gemini in the world. He means good, he worries about our safety, and he doesn't like to see any thing happen to us. To him we are fairies and he'd give his very life to save us from the adventure if he could. But we can't shirk our duty when our country is at stake and he knows it."

"Haven't you any one who could advise you in this matter?" "To be sure I have, and he knows the whole situation. I've decided this man to come but he didn't. I've directed Dargar and his local representative to communicate with the Princesses or Empress Vivian and he is going to do it. I've been turning Dargar's letters over to Radcliffe, and now Dargar has come to see me personally."

"Didn't you ever find a missing letter?" Mildred inquired. "Oh yes I did," Gertrude said apologetically. "As if suddenly recovering from a lapse of memory." "And where do you think I found it?" "The simplest place on earth. It had slipped down behind the facing of the mantle of the fireplace. I found it on the 4th of July shortly before I left my home to rejoin the ranks. I was looking for a little gold medal that I had missed and got up on a chair to get a better view over the mantle. Like a flash the suggestion came to me that I could find the missing letter for I noticed that the mantle was sprung out slightly from the fireplace. I looked eagerly down into the crevice, and sure enough a white edge of some paper was in plain view. I got a hatpin and began to pick at it. Presently I drew out the missing letter written by my husband's friend General Curran.

I opened it, but quickly discovered something that my first glance months ago, had failed to impress my mind. The handwriting of the General, part of it particularly in the latter part of the letter was so nervous and nervous as to be almost impossible to read. It was but another indication of his mental condition during the last few months before he died.

I saw at once therefore that it would require considerable study to decipher it. So I put it in my handbag hoping to find an opportunity to study it over in the course of this evening, or possibly call for Glinglor and enlist his aid.

"And that very letter was the article stolen from your handbag which caused a you such distress," Angeline phoe exclaimed, unable longer to repress her excited suspicion.

"Exactly," Gertrude replied. "And with it went the General's secret, which he told to me, and which I so foolishly forgot."

"But there is a sequel to this secret," Gertrude continued continued, after a few moments pause. "I haven't told you the minor legatee was that tried so hard to make trouble for the General and his army over the attempt to get possession of the plans. He was a glandelinian spy, a spy of about twenty five years old, and a great one by profession. I had tried various means to capture him and his father who was a spy too, although I had seen them only a few times. One of those spies was killed in an encounter with a sentinel. The other in the disguise of a Christian officer visited at my home for a dozen times during the few months I stayed there in order to learn who I was, and he always came without being invited and remained only a short while.

But that isn't the sequel I referred to. It is something more interesting. When the glandelinian armies began this attack this morning I thought there was something familiar in the whole proceeding. I watched the action closely to determine if my suspicions were true or not. The longer I watched the more confident I became that I was not mistaken. My suspicions therefore were strongly reinforced as the evidence of the violence of the assault has increased. I looked carefully for a good view of the "Storm assault." Then when it sprang forward I needed no further evidence. No other reason for the Glandelinians to perform such a feat but for the purpose to break through the Christian line at this point and get at us. There is no doubt of it, the Glandelinians want to massacre us all if possible to prevent our mission being fulfilled. They'll be successful if we don't defend ourselves accordingly if they do break through in this locality. This is all caused by those two Professional Mutt, and Jeff spies."

"Why they must be professional military crooks," said Mildred, shocked at the idea of such a thing probably coming true.

"Of course they are," Gertrude replied. "And you don't know what humiliation I felt at this disgrace it must heap upon us all if the fact should come to be known that we failed in our mission because of the two international spies."

"What I can't understand," Mildred continued. "Is why these two spies who are foreigners, and of it, their ability and skill should throw away their opportunities for such wicked purposes, instead of trying to receive honorable success by devoting their times and energies for our own cause, even if our Government would not pay, as much as the glandelinians do."

"Ah," returned Gertrude slowly and with a sigh a significant accent. "Right there is where you have much to learn about the situation. Children unless older do not as a rule have the chance to learn much of his phase of affairs of glandelinian spies, or international spies or if they do the knowledge they receive is contrary to their younger ideas that the result is usually bewilderment and intolerant confusion. But as child scouts are not going to be so easily confused I hope. We are schooled in all kind of military as well as other educations we need besides, of which too the well known Camp Fire Girls and Boys organizations are also a worthy exponent, as well as ours, and all of us have so much strength and system of character and intelligence in all our works that---that---well it will be a cold day when we'll ever let any international crazy dirty, crooked spy aiding glandelinia get the best of us, or the Camp Fire Girls...."

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"The son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?" Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure that I see the connection," Gertrude said. "I don't see how the son's action is entirely abstract. What do you mean?"

"Not in the least," Gertrude Angelina replied. "I don't want to try to force you to believe anything, no matter what it might be, which you cannot see, but I want to say this; there is a reason for everything. You must assume this as invariably true if you would live the most satisfactory and satisfactory girlscout life. Often we can't see the reason of things but in so far as we are able to observe and analyze reason is at the very foundation of human existence. The idea of horrors of the works of spies is directly opposed to reason. There is no such thing as chance, accident or 'can't'. You may slip and fall, perhaps sprain your ankle or break a leg or arm. You call it an accident. No such thing. There was a little ice on the sidewalk. You didn't notice it. If you had seen it probably you would have avoided it, or properly measured your step on it. Many people would learn my experience this morning as a great misfortune. I would say it wasn't, and is if it can be such a thing as a misfortune its the nations not mine. Because of course it hit me so hard, so unexpectedly you yourself are disposed to look at it in this light. The trouble was I didn't use my head as vigorously as I should have used it. In the first place it was very foolish for me to carry that paper with me in my common handbag. That was really silly. Think of it. If I had carried a million dollars worth of jewels around my handbag for several hours in a big crowd, you would have not called me insane, but try to have me put in an insane asylum. And yet I carried around with me a paper that told the secrets of the whereabouts of unknown tunnels and subways running underground out from Abbeism going north. And if it had been a million dollars worth of jewels that had been stolen from my handbag, few persons would think of me as an unfortunate victim deserving of universal sympathy. People might say 'too bad' but they would also shake their heads as though they thought I must have the head of an ambidextrous."

Jean's eyes were now sparkling with interest in spite of the deep concern she felt at Gertrude's predicament.

"Why, Gertrude Angelina," she exclaimed, "I never heard anybody talk like that before. I can see readily enough that what you say is true, but I am all confusion. I can't understand why we should look so differently at two things which really amount to one and the same thing."

"The reason is this," the lecturer replied. "We girls look like Alice in Wonderland through either a looking glass or a magnifying glass at the ideas that dazzle our minds. I'm that Alice. Yet there is very little to dazzle the mind's eye in a scrap of paper telling where such underground passages are. It is very interesting but you could carry it around sewed up in the lining of your coat for a year with perfect propriety. But carry around a $100,000,000 mortgage bond in precisely the same place and condition and the person who finds it out is likely to report you to the authorities for a mental examination. I don't know Jean, if you will understand why I should talk this way to you but there are really several good reasons. First since my father died, there has been nobody to whom I could go except with my uncle with my troubles and my problems and get sympathy. About the only person with whom I have discussed these things is the Christian generals, and Violet, and her sisters but my talks with them of course are entirely of different character from this one. Matters had come almost to a crisis crisis before I found that letter behind the mantle. You don't know how it cheered me. And then to think that I now got the head and neck of a goose to let the whole thing slip through my hands by the most foolish conduct one could be guilty of, and I a supreme girlscout guardian. It is almost more than I can bear. It will probably mean Jean that Calvin in is will practically lose everything to the enemy it has in the world, and Abbeism is might not be able to retrieve the disaster, and we'll all go down to ruin and disaster with Glandelinia victorious in the war."

"No not that bad," Jean exclaimed in deep distress while "Wildride face turned white." "Didn't you report to the military police the fact that you reported those two professionals? They may find them and recover that letter for you."

"Yes I did, and to all the generals too," Gertrude replied. "I took the matter up with my Uncle also and we had an interview with all generals not in this action. It is my one hope but a very slim one I'm afraid."

Jean was silent for a minute or two. She was thinking hard. The rapid succession of events was racing back and forth in her mind more furiously than even the distant storm of battle outside. By this time the threatening of the elements of battle had increased considerably but the enemy was not succeeding. Gertrude sat quietly with her arms folded and leaning dependently into the opposite corner of a paravand.

Presently Jean spoke again, and the result of her utterance was indeed, no to speak very startling. She seemed to change the subject entirely and it may be that this change, together with the apparent irrelevance of her words contributed much to the weirdness of their effect. "Gertrude," she said, "do you ever believe we'll make a success of this mission, even with the loss of the letter?"

Gertrude started forward so suddenly that it seemed as if she would leap out of her chair.

"Why do you ask that question, Jean?" Gertrude inquired after she recovered from the shock which her friends question had given her.

"I cannot say exactly," the girlscout replied. "At least I don't want to ask your question until I get a little more information on the subject subject from you."

"Why not?"

"Because you might not see any connection between the loss of your letter and the matter of the plans of Violet, and her sisters. I don't believe the loss of the letter matters very well. I will ask you a question again. Was that letter written in Abbeismian?"

"No it wasn't."

"And you believe the loss of it will endanger the nation to a destructive defeat?" "I am REPATED!"

"I do not confirm that statement but I'm positive nevertheless," Gertrude replied. "But it seems positive nevertheless for if the enemy has any one in his midst that can read that German writing we are lost. I'm going to tell you a secret regarding that subject, which no doubt will interest you very much. There is no particular reason why it should be a secret I suppose but I'm not much of a girlscout to talk about National or my own affairs when it too might endanger our own service, and since I have probably not mentioned it before, I suppose all others have forgotten it. But I'll tell some things which I did before coming down on the raft, which has something to do with this also. The army then from which I came from had its headquarters on a farm in Anglinia State, north, and it was a large and picturesque old fashioned, grungy lime structure containing everything from an oil painting of the 'Roché Home' to an attic well populated with everything we needed. That place through the trick of Glandelinian spies seemed to us possessed, possessed with evil spirits worse than the fabled ghosts. That building actually was possessed. We child scouts of course did not know that but they were real creatures there all right. There were six of us, three girlscouts and three boys, and seeing the weird manifestations, we actually set fire to the place and burned the building to the ground. Though I am brave I'm slightly just the same and the slightest illness I would have or when ever I received some sort of wound I would have the most fantastic dreams. Many a time the wild manner in which I would sit up or stand up in bed in those days and utter the most ridiculous ideas in my sleep frightened the generals, and my followers into apprehensions of serious consequences for me. They and the army physician pronounced me abnormally nervous because of all my recent exciting and dangerous exploits in my scout career but I am gotten over that now. Nevertheless these peculiarities of mine developed to such an extent I had to be watched closely every time a little child illness came upon me, or I received a shot shock or some wound."

But this of course grew to be quite a joke with my brother, two sisters, and also the scouts who knew and were with me. My strange flighty words and actions in my sleep were about the funniest things they ever heard or saw. It became so common an affair that they would wait for it with great glee and expectation, and next day would tell me about the strange strange ridiculous things I did and say in my sleep."

For a few weeks matters continued this way, and then I seemed to outgrow my flighty tendency, or habit or whatever you choose to call it. I suppose three months went by without any further experience of this kind until one night I awoke to find myself thrown violently out of bed lying somewhere with a wall of darkness all about me except for a patch of faint starlight at a window several yards away. I got up stood very still and frightened for I knew not how long wondering whether I was awake or asleep. As the conviction crept over me stronger and stronger that I was really awake and that I had not been walking in my sleep as I believed I tried harder and harder to convince myself that I had been thrown roughly from my bed. Besides at last I realized that there was no use in trying to delude myself, and I began to study my surroundings to determine how I was to find my way back to my bed, for strange unseen forces seemed to hold me rooted to the spot. I must have spent fifteen minutes trying to find out where I was. I was sure it took half that time to convince me I was not in my own room. I made my way over to the window feeling every inch carefully lest I fall down a stairway, and even when I got there I had difficulty in determining in what part of that old house I was. I was will apprehensive of a strange foul smell in the place but finally I got my bearings, and where do you suppose I found myself was in an empty room at the end of the house farthest from my bedroom and I could now determine that when I awoke I was near the door that opened onto the stairway which led into that child scouts had always called the "Ghost attic." I got a good scare then after I awoke my way back to my room after I crept back into my room and into bed feeling foolish. I was glad indeed that nobody had seen me, and was about to try and sleep when my bed was violently jerked forward from the floor and turned bottom bottom upwards with me lying underneath, bruised and with a broken tooth.

"Well I studied a good deal over that incident, which of course I did not keep a secret, and all in the room finally decided that my incident on this occasion must have been a result of some strange unseen manifestation in the house, and not walking in my sleep as I supposed. One guard was placed to watch my room, and the rooms of others and one of them reported that twice something had been mysteriously thrown at him and struck him on the head. The officers valiantly invaded that "haunted house" after night with us advised to keep out, and none of them stayed there long.

The place was not haunted, but possessed, and that was how I had been so strangely afflicted those few months. I couldn't recall dreaming about anything or seeing any strange shades or beings, but after the unseen manifestations there were strange foul smells in the place enough to drive one into sudden sickness. I was there only two months when the worst thing occurred which drove us to set the place afire. After I was twice roughly put out of bed, and the same happened to others, I walked clear out of the house in the middle of the night and down to a creek following what I mistook to be some one playing spook spook. I don't know what it was that caused me to make this trip unless I wanted to see what the creature literally was. I was not ill on this occasion nor on the last proceeding, and I was wide awake, and actually saw it. But fortunately I was watched, or I probably would not be here to night or to day rather, though its dark as night almost now, for then I was unable to swim that low cold water. A soldier was on guard late that night and he saw me, followed me, I followed the dark shade directly to the creek. The soldier who was following me rushed forward to stop me, but it was too late, the shade swung round and made for me with a deafening scream that was like the cry of a possessed of the infernal regions. I was saved from it by the soldier who displayed a crucifix, and it disappeared.

After that we burned the house down and since then—

Gertrude Angelina got no further. Her story was interrupted in a manner that took the minds of both narrator and listeners off the subject. The violence of the distant "storm attack" had grown fiercer, and close by to the left of the cemetery almost simultaneously with the utterance of the word "since then" by Gertrude, came the sound of awful sudden firing that made a tremendous shock and which split the air two hundred yards away as if volcanoes had exploded. It was the explosions or discharges of many cannons and firearms combined mingled with shells and shrapnell and before a word of astonishment could escape the lips of the astonished and startled listeners, the sound was followed by a prolonged uproar of that firing folios followed by repeated chorus of yells screams and shouting, cursing and blasphemies in rapid succession. Then came a roar of yells in a perfect hurricane of tumults indicative of mingled pain, anger, terror, and derision. It was the discomfited devil yell of the Landelinians who had come up this far to meet a terrific fire from the Christian troops who had been posted unseen in a long line near the grave yard.

For fully a minute after the sound of the terrible battle a short distance from the graveyard had begun to recede and insured that the children were safe from attack, Jean Bauders and Gertrude Angelina sat gazing at each other with fair blanched countenances. Not that they were in great dread of the infliction of the personal harm upon them in their strong hold, for there was probably only a remote possibility of anything of that sort, but circumstances of such attacks usually compel witnesses a vague kind of awe and strike an inharmonious panic of chills that either the human soul or the bravest fire-eater known where the likely hood of attack and massacre is remote.

The same sounds of that terrible near-st part of the battle had no one very effective result in the minds of Gertrude and her listeners all thoughts of the conversation in which they were engaged engaged Gertrude Angelina's story remained unfinished at the critical point where it was interrupted and the only evidence furnished to her audience of one that that she was killed by the Legion shade was the fact that she was there to tell the story.

"My wasn't that terrible, I was sure of a whole wife of Landelinian soldiers in that one moment," Jean exclaimed at last as if she had been just than able to catch her breath. "It is as mysterious as it was no terrible," Gertrude replied. "I can't imagine that could be the occasion of such an affair coming so unexpectedly close to our refuge and receding again. That 'devil yell' of the enemy was simply blood curdling."

"I believe I can make a pretty good guess as to what it means," Jean said brightening. "Brightening a little. Probably the main Landelinian wave of attack was moving for this location with a purpose in view to flank General Aronburg, and a new force of Christian troops had been thrown into position to meet them."

"There's just no objection I have to that theory," Gertrude replied. "Landelinian troops couldn't flank General Aronburg in coming this way."

"How do you know that?" Jean asked Jean, not a little astonished at her friends shrug.

"Because it does not extend this way. I'm somewhat of an expert on such movements myself. The Landelinian generals must have seen us and sent a force to attack the cemetery. And a Christian force must have been placed in the way and destroyed the attack before it came here."

They lapsed into quiet for a few moments and listened intently for further sounds indicating the result of the battle. But none came except the more distant uproar, and elsewhere the only sounds they heard were the rattling of machine gun fire, rodman steady as falling rain and the conversation among the other child scouts within hearing undoubtedly concerning the wild and mysterious disturbance so close to their position.

"If it were not for the danger of revealing our presence to exposure to our Landelinian batteries, I'd call out to some of the other expert girls and boys and asked if everything were all right with them," Gertrude remarked presently.

"Oh Gertrude!" exclaimed Jean as an interesting idea came to her suddenly. "I believe I have some real explanation of that fierce attack and repulse so close to us. I bet anything a big force of Landelinians were as you say standing stalling toward our position, and were stopped by a big force of Christians who must have a position beyond us."

"Why Jean?" turned Gertrude eagerly. "I really believe you have struck the truth."

Jean was delighted at the hearty acceptance of her theory. In her eager way she was impelled to supplement her surmise with something more that was equally interesting.

"And maybe," she said. "Those Landelinian troops may sent forward a double force of troops to renew the attack. Don't you think some of us ought to get out of here as soon as this heavy firing slackens up a little and get to General Aronburg's headquarters and telephone for more Christian troops to reinforce us here? We ought to get some officers and lots of troops down here before another attack is massed against us. Those men are probably strong enough to capture us if we cannot do something. We cannot do anything ourselves without help. It's too dangerous, especially if they would surround us, and our army would not win the battle. Our only hope is if we win the full battle, then we'll be relieved."

"That's a good idea," Gertrude replied. "I'll tell you what we will do meanwhile. We'll watch in shifts till the firing goes further away. You better lie down and sleep for a while and I'll keep watch for a slackening of the battle close to us. If it doesn't slow up, say by ten thirty, I'll look a clock and call you and then lie down for a while myself. For I know we are tired, having had no sleep at all last night."

"No Gertrude," Jean replied in objection. "I'll take the first watch. I'm not the least bit sleepy. I have some sort of book here too which I brought with me that I'd like to read anyway."

Gertrude was really tried as a result of her exertions during the early morning and it was not hard to induce her to yield to this change of her plans. As she lay down on the mound Jean remarked: "I wish I could talk with the scouts yonder. They must have been alarmed at those terrible sounds of battle so near. If we could all get together and reassure each other that we are all right no doubt everybody in this camp or stronghold would rest better till we are sure we are all safe."

"We'll visit them all before we go back to General Aronburg's headquarters and telephone for reinforcements," Gertrude replied. "I have an idea for improving the efficiency of our story book. Do you of our camp. Jean said she turned the leaves of her story book. Do you know what made me think of it? It's a telegraph advertisement in this book. I shouldn't have installed a wireless telephone system in our camp which is better than a telegraph. It wouldn't cost much and I could have lots of fun with it, and besides that a convenience it would be right now in this grave yard. I didn't see over think of it before."

"Nonsense," is the mother of invention you know," Gertrude reminded with a smile. "Yes and sleep is a necessity of rest. Now Gertrude, you go right to sleep and forget about all these and everything else. I'll wake you when I get sleepy or when the battle recedes so far to be dangerous for us to go out."

Jean did not wake Gertrude because of any sleepy desire to be relieved of her watch. About ten o'clock she observed that the Christian line for this time was at least temporarily victorious, the battle had gone off toward the southwest, and the firing was not half so close as it had been an hour or two earlier, so she decided not to awaken the sleeping girl-scout leader as long as it seemed probable that the battle might even slacken in a short time. Fifteen minutes later she was able to hear no close sound of firing and she was about to go forth to inspect the condition along the Christian lines when Mildred and Mary Stanok came forward.

"Oh I'm so glad you came," Jean said softly. "Oh-h-h don't wake Gertrude. He's pretty tired and has had a lot to worry her. Sit down on this bench over here and I'll tell you what has happened, and then you can go and inform all the other girl-scout leaders who'll communicate it to every one."

Jean told her story in as few words as possible, closing with her suggestion, that she and Gertrude return to Gertrude's Uncle and telephone for a strong body of troops to defend the graveyard with them.

"But I'm wondering now if that is the best plan after all," she added. "Gertrude is very tired, and I'm afraid the trip afoot wouldn't do her any good. It's less than a mile, but because of the smoke of the forest-blazes it's getting so dark, and the weather is so hot that I'm afraid she couldn't safely walk that distance under those circumstances after the other exertions and troubles she has gone through. Now if one of you girls would go with me, we'd make the trip in no time. It's dangerous but we can take the chance."

"I'll go," volunteered Mildred and Mary in almost the same breath, then Mary added, "We can both go with you. That's be good company—three—is a crowd you know, and we'll need a crowd to chase the smoke gloom out of the hot dry woods."

"All right girls, that will be fine," Jean said gratefully. "Thank you ever so much. Will you go with me to the others to inform them that everybody is all right. Don't say anything about our going to the generals' headquarters because that will delay matters too much. We can do it by our signals and have it over with."

The three girls worked rapidly with their signals, and in fifteen minutes they were back to the spot occupied by Gertrude. The latter was still asleep. Jean woke her gently, and informed her what she and Mildred and Mary proposed to do. Gertrude did not protest for she realized that this plan was the best. She thanked the girls heartily and then gave them instructions as to how to get into the house and what general they should call up when they got in.

"I was thinking the matter over as I fell asleep and recalled our conversation, I am about asking aid from the officers," Gertrude said. "We were wrong in one respect. We cannot get hardly any officer in this locality for they might be in the battle. General Blain Nightlinger is the man you want to call. Call the operator and she'll get the general's location and he'll be brought on the wire for you."

"You are not afraid to stay here alone are you?" Jean asked anxiously as they prepared to leave.

"For answer Gertrude showed her weapons saying, "anybody in gray who gets the best of me will have to get his hands on me before I can get my hands on these."

These words sent a rather gruesome chill through the girl-scouts and Jean hastened to change the subject.

"It's too bad," she said, "that there isn't an extra bunch of boys to act as guards here. But we won't be gone long Gertrude. We ought to be back in an hour easily."

"Don't lose your way," Gertrude warned. "No longer of that," Jean replied. "I've been over that route a number of times and we've got some good flashlights to light our path if it gets as dark as night. We'll leave one for you Gertrude. It may come in handy and you won't need to keep the candles burning out here. Here's one."

Jean took an electric flashlight from her valise and gave it to Gertrude who had laid down again on her cot. These she took another from her satchel and announced that she was ready to start.

"Well by, by Gertrude," Jean said, pausing a moment before following the other two girls. "You better go to sleep again and get all the rest you can. There's no telling when we will be back. We may have to wait for the general unless we can give him all the information he wants over the phone."

Jean turned to go, then stopped with this addition to her good by remarks. "By the way perhaps we had better announce ourselves and not appear before you too suddenly on our return. If you should be awake you will know we are back when you hear us give our signal."

In a few moments the three girls were making their way Indian file down the hill toward the trail that led across country to general Aronburg's Headquarters.

The trip to general Aronburg's headquarters and under fire at that was quickly made, but Mary got wounded, and badly too. The difficulties too on the way were of a dreadful character and worse than they had expected. To meet it, however, the girl-scouts had been well equipped for all kinds of obstacles and inconveniences. To protect the selves against the shall fires they had ploughed through bushes and high grass. Their electric flashlights also very very were very serviceable in adding them topick their way through the dark woods. The trail they followed was a well worn path over a big hill and through a shall swept forest as far as a barnyard. Then a t saw a shall blow the barn to pieces they halted for a moment in consternation, and it was here that Mary received a wound in the arm from a shall splinter. Mildred hastily dug out the fragments, and bound up the bleeding wound, and then the three messengers followed the path through an orchard which recalled to the minds of Mildred and Gladys another journey of equally thrilling character a year before. But Wilfred said nothing about it. They wanted Mary to remain in some secluded spot, till they sent some one for her, as her arm pained dreadfully for every step she took but she refused to be left behind. They soon reached the general's headquarters, and proceeded at once to the front entrance, where the sentry at their request pushed the electric button. In a few moments a voice, which they easily recognized as the general's—aided-in-camp called through the door:

"Who's there?"
"It's Mildred Maxwell, and two of the other girl-scouts sir." The guard answered.

"Yes let us in. We want to tel phone," shouted Mildred. The orderly unlocked and opened the door which with such haste as to startle the three girl-scouts, or at least, to arouse a little curiosity in them. But the reason for the orderly's haste was soon explained. "Wonderful Heavens, children," the faithful aid-in-camp exclaimed with deep emotion as he swung the door wide open. "You don't mean to tell me Gertrude and all the others are in grave danger, and you're going to telephone for help?"

"Not in any danger sir, nothing of that sort," Mildred replied reassuringly. "We left her and all her followers perfectly well in the big grave yard over yonder. But there's been a had portion of the battle's raving there, and we want to have general Blain Nightlinger call troops to our protection in case we are attacked there."

"God have mercy on them," cried the orderly. "Are you sure the Glandelinians have not attacked them yet by this time while you went away to call for help. I hear firing in that direction."

"I do too but we hope not, sir," Mildred said with a smile that ought to have dispelled the fears of her inquisitor. "But if they have, we do not fear, as long as the enemy does not win the battle itself. Outside of that we can make sport of an enemy attack upon us."

Without further ado, she went to the general's telephone desk and after a hurried search found the general's location by means of the operator ringing her for her. The call was answered from general Blain Nightlinger's tent, but it was his dumb orderly.

"Who is calling?"
"This is Mildred Maxwell," she answered. "My comrades are in the grave yard."

"Hullo."
"Hullo," Mildred replied again. "Is this general Blain Nightlinger?"
"No," was the answer. "This is an orderly. I'm studying the beauties of nature and—"

"This is a most important urgent call I'm giving in to you," was Mildred's answer more sharp and short this time. "Not a time for you to start a sight seeing tour when a disastrous battle is raging and if you can't get your mind off the 'beautiful scenery' and concentrate on trying to beautify your own brains, and listen to what I'm trying to say our army is sunk and all my girl-scout friends will be playing the harp in the upper heavens. I'm Mildred Maxwell, and I want to speak to general Blain Nightlinger now."

This time it worked, and finally came another voice—
"What do you want?"

"This is Mildred Maxwell," Wilfred began to explain again a little out of patience when she was interrupted with:
"Oh Mildred Maxwell," excuse my abruptness but I guess I haven't been able to think things over yet. What can I do you for you?"

"The girl and boy-scouts are forced into a tight position at St Anna Cemetery east of the Christian lines," Mildred related rapidly for she had rehearsed her story to herself several times in order that might be able to make as speedy and effective an appeal to the general as possible. Gertrude Angelina and others are with us. Three of us came back through the shell swept timber to general Aronburg's headquarters to call you up, and one of us not wounded and in to be left here under care. The army has made a desperate attack near the cemetery and though he was repulsed he might do so again and win next time. We could hear the firing but though it was two hundred yards away, and there was an awful yelling of the army and we knew the attack was made with the purpose of coming at us. Can you send us troops right away? Gertrude Angelina thinks the glandelinian army who made the attack must belong to general Snyder's Corps. We do not worry so much if we are sure the army will come out victorious, but if it don't we need lots of help or we'll be massacred. We can't get away now from there till the battle is over."

"I'll get busy right away," Mildred said. "The general replied with business like energy, which indicated that he regarded the source of this summons as an extremely important one. How far is the graveyard?"

"Just a short distance east of where general Aronburg's headquarters is, say about one mile."

"Are you going back?"

"Yes right away, unless there's something to keep us here. We want to go back and tell Gertrude you're sending troops."

"Tell her I'll be there with them myself in an hour if possible or as soon as I can get general Bronk's men in place and I can get the troops necessary into formation. If there are to be attacks in your quarter the next ones may be of desperate character, and so we'll come in good force and well prepared."

"All right. Good by."

Mildred hung up the receiver and announced results to her companions. The orderly and some officers who had arrived on the scene in time to hear the principal part of the statement to the general stood by with anxious expressions on their faces.

"I think I'll call up general Viviania and tell him what has happened," Mildred said as the thought came to her. "That is his headquarters number orderly."

"Army Line, Superior four six one four city," the latter replied, and a few moments later this number was rung. General Viviania did not require as much time to be called for by his orderly as general Aronburg did. In about a few seconds he was answering the call quite cheerfully. After listening to Mildred's story he said:

"I'll send you troops in a jiffy. Just wait there at general Aronburg's headquarters, and I'll call myself and go back with you."

Fifteen minutes later the great general with a strong cavalry escort rode up, dismounted his horse, and was announced and the two girls, Mary remaining behind to have her arm taken care of, left the house, mounted horses brought to them and led him along the path through an orchard into the pitch dark timber, over the big hill, no wicket fortunately not under fire and down into the semi wilderness of fern hollow, and then toward the grave yard. Fifteen or twenty paces from the nearest gate of the cemetery, Mildred softly sounded the agreed signal of approach.

"Wh-o-he-lo."

And Gertrude Angelina answered back, "Wo-he-lo."

"Well here we are, Gertrude," Mildred announced as she walked up to where she lay. "We've brought help, and Blain might linger is going to take up a position here with us, and strengthen it with his main army which is inactive. General Viviania is here too to bring the lay of the land, and bring up his troops in this neighborhood."

"Good," Gertrude said. "That was very thoughtful of you. I never occurred to me to suggest that you call him up. I couldn't think of any one but general Blain might linger. Did you have any trouble making the trip?"

"Not in the least except Mary got wounded in the army arm when a splinter hit her. The shell shattered a burn. We too found our way almost as easily as we did going. There was no shelling then."

"We knocked down everything in our path however," said Jean. "Really I think outside of Mary's being wounded it was a delightful adventure especially so if we prove we have started a campaign that will result in capturing those spies who robbed us."

General Viviania did not wait for the arrival of any portions of general Blain's light infantry troops before bringing up his own, and his portion of his troops began to arrive, the general prepared to begin an investigation of the situation of the trouble Christian line of battle near the graveyard, and in and near the region where the creek was said to flow past in the neighborhood. At his request Jean loaned him the use of a number of the boy scouts, and she also handed him a flash flashlight in case it should get too dark, and he started off at once with a party of general officers, or at least his staff, through the trees and the bushes toward the region from which the sound of the nearest portion of the battle evidently had come so he could tell where it was best to place his own troops for defense. Scarcely had he departed when Jean proved her daring and adventurous spirit by suggestion to Gladys and Joy: "Let's say girls, let's get a party of the boys together armed plenty and let's follow general Viviania and see what he finds. We can keep at a safe distance and not expose ourselves to the view of the enemy, and not get into trouble where we can be of no service. But there might be developments where we ourselves can lend him considerable assistance."

"I'm game," Gladys announced, but how about taking one of them too?"

"I'm game," Gladys announced, but how about taking one of them too?"

"I'm game," Gladys announced, but how about taking one of them too?"

"I'm game," Gladys announced, but how about taking one of them too?"

"I'm game," Gladys announced, but how about taking one of them too?"

"I'm game," Gladys announced, but how about taking one of them too?"

"I'm game," Gladys announced, but how about taking one of them too?"

"I'm game," Gladys announced, but how about taking one of them too?"

"I'm game," Gladys announced, but how about taking one of them too?"

"I'm game," Gladys announced, but how about taking one of them too?"

"I'm game," Gladys announced, but how about taking one of them too?"

"I'm game," Gladys announced, but how about taking one of them too?"

"I'm game," Gladys announced, but how about taking one of them too?"

"I'm game," Gladys announced, but how about taking one of them too?"

"I'm game," Gladys announced, but how about taking one of them too?"

"I'm game," Gladys announced, but how about taking one of them too?"

"I'm game," Gladys announced, but how about taking one of them too?"

General Vivian and his staff were out of sight of the graveyard when the trio of Camp fire girls, with the three girlscouts left the region of the graveyard to reconnoiter. A nondescript of trees bushes and shrubbery and a "saw" of ferns superimposed this starting place from the region where the nearest of the battle had raged. Although it was twilight from so much forest fire smoke in the sky still it was comparatively light and this condition was gratefully observed by the young feminine scouts, for they regarded it as unwise to use their searchlights to aid them in finding their way during this reconnoitering excursion.

But in spite of the partial clearing of the atmosphere from the battle smoke they found it hard work to pick a passage through the confusion of vegetation. Hence their movements were slow, and it was fully ten or fifteen minutes before the region they were coming for loomed before their eyes.

Still they beheld nothing of special interest other than the saw and the recent carnage of the scene. They were still far from the battline, there was no sign of life where they were so far as they were able to see and hear. The awful noise of the battle had driven the birds and even insects into all shelter or hiding places and none had ventured out again following the "calm."

"Let's go around that glen at a safe distance and see what we can discover," Jean proposed.

The other girls voiced a whispered assent, and they began their encircling advance to the right. About half half way around they came within sight of a portion of the now inactive christian line in its positions, and here they stopped as all of them simultaneously observed the form of a human being bending over so over something on the ground.

"Barely almost fearfully they leaned forward as if such inclining of their bodies would enable them to obtain a clearer view of the object of their attention.

Suddenly there was a flash of light, like the striking of a match close to the overleaping human form, but it did not burn out.

"Why that's one of the Camp Fire Boy Scouts," Jean exclaimed. "He's found some thing."

"Yes, and here's a horse," Gladys announced, pointing around the edge of a large bush near which they were standing. The others looked in the direction indicated and beheld a horse about a foot beyond the foliage of the bush. Suddenly Jean laid a hand on each of her companions and pressed them back, explaining in a soft whisper:

"Keep keep under cover. It may belong to some Glandelinians or to one of them at least. Wait here a minute and I'll find out."

She turned and moved around the bush the other way. A minute later she returned with this announcement:

"There's nobody around. I don't believe it belongs to the enemy."

"Why not?" Gladys inquired.

"Because it would be foolish for them to stay so near the scene of such an attack with a strange unsaddled horse. There must be some other explanation to this affair."

"What shall we do now?" Mildred asked.

"I'm going to signal that Camp Fire Boy Scout," Jean replied. "I'm going to test his quickness of wit at the same time and see if he will recognize our call when it is given out in the woods where it might be mistaken for the call of some denizen of the wilds. He ought to know what it is though General Vivian once heard us give it and told me one day that it sounded like the combination of the hoot of an owl and the song of the whippoorwill."

"Are you sure he said that?" Gladys asked with a suggestion of a laugh. "He so great a general ought to be ashamed of himself to be so ignorant."

"Well it was the first time he had ever heard our signal," Jean continued. "Now I'm going to give the call just as near what the general said it sounded like as I can. Stand as close to this bush as you can so he can't see us. Now here goes!"

"Ho-ho-ho-ho-ho-lo-lo-lo-hoot."

Jean gave the call with a loud sort of plaintive hollowness that spoke well for her effort. No uninformed person would have suspected it to have been any utterance from a human person. Eagerly the girls watched for results. They seemed slow coming. For a few moments there was not a sign of life in the stooping figure of the boy. Presently however it stood erect and turned around, and looked closely and searchingly in different directions. Then came the answer as perfect as the girls had heard Jean do it, only he repeated it four times.

"There's no warning in that call," Jean said confidently. "Come on let's go and see what he has found."

They left their hiding place, and the seven seventeen girls in a few moments had reached the spot where the boy scout stood. There was no need of asking of what he had discovered. The girls were indeed shocked with the view of a lit man who appeared to be an officer lying apparently dead or unconscious on the ground.

"Is the man dead?" Gladys gasped in trembling tones. "He but he hasn't much life in him left," the boy scout replied in a husky voice. "At least he is terribly weak from loss of blood and exposure."

"Why that's Mr. Glandelin," Jean exclaimed as she threw the rays of her flash light on the injured man's face. "He's been shot by the enemy."

"And that must be his horse over there," Olga added.

"Where's the horse?" The boy inquired.

"Over by the bush where we were standing when I gave you the call," Jean answered.

"Then I'd better put him into his machine and hurry him away to the military station," said the Camp fire boy.

"We got to do something for him here first," Jean suggested.

"What will you do?"

"I ought not to have those wet clothing on any longer than absolutely necessary, though how he got them wet is a mystery. We can go up to the camp during the lull for some blankets to wrap him in."

"That isn't a bad idea," the boy said. "I wonder if two of you girls or four of you couldn't take hold of his feet and hands and help me carry him over to be along across his horse--I'll take him by the shoulders. Then you could go and get the blankets, while I'll get my own horse ready to start. You Olga can ride the horse. I'll walk."

Jean, Gladys, Olga, and Mildred took hold of the man's feet and hands or arms as suggested, and started. It was no easy matter for the wounded General's leader must have weighed at least one hundred and eighty pounds, but at last they reached the horse and with the united effort of other girls coming to the rescue, aided by the patient himself who revived considerably and put forth a fair degree of self helping energy they succeeded in getting him into or upon the horse. Then two of the girls returned to the camp and got two blankets, delaying long enough to inform General Aronburg of the discovery. The general gun general when he learned the identification of the victim.

"I thought he was far away from here," he said. "I suppose he came to inquire my notes, and then I suppose he thought the 'battle' storm was too near and decided to seek shelter in that locality and may have been struck down by a stray shell splinter. By the way you'd better take a flask of cordial back with you to help brace him up during the trip to this place."

"We were going to take him to the dressing station and--"

"Bring him here."

"Bring the station that's in the danger zone girl. Bring him here."

"All right sir."

The girls went to the kitchen tent and took a flask from the medicine kit and then on their swiftest horses hastened back to the patient.

The boy scout soon with the aid of others soon had the injured man scout bundled in a reclining position on the horse was mounted behind him to hold him up, while the girl attempted to reinvigorate him with a dose of the cordial. Thus far he had uttered a not a word but now a little were delighted when he spoke thus in a fairly strong voice:

"Won't you girls come along with me. I'm afraid something might happen. I'm shadowed, and besides the jolting of the horse as he goes might cause me to faint and fall off the seat. Perhaps this good Camp fire boy will come with you."

"Why yes we'll go," Jean volunteered. "What do you say girls?"

"We'll go, but one of us must go back and tell Gertrude of the find."

said Gladys.

This arrangement being favored by all, all went upon their own horses for those who went to get blankets brought the necessary horses along, and Gladys went back toward the girls' position. The latter was to give an agreed signal when she arrived to Gertrude, and then the party started along the road through the timber toward the main highway for General Aronburg's headquarters.

As the injured Scout appeared to have recovered considerable strength and seemed to desire to talk, Jean encouraged him to tell his story in a few words. The sixteen girls on each side or in front and back of him on their steeds.

"I suppose you know who I am," the man began, and when the girls said, they would not have if Jean hadn't told them, for she alone knew him, he continued: "Well I reached General Aronburg's lines this morning, and when the battle began the Glandelinian columns moving forward were so fierce and threatening that I did not like the poor prospects of things, and when the violence of the assault was carrying certain portions of the christian line along so rapidly before them, I thought I had not better risk being caught in the fronts or I would fall on the mission I came for.

So I turned my horse to go for that shed over there, but the horse where you found it, and got into the old barn just as the "Battle storm" broke. I don't know how long I must have waited but it didn't come this way any too close, and I was getting mighty tired and hungry. At last the noise of such heavy firing began to recede and I was beginning to hope that I would soon be able to leave the place when something unusual and unexpected happened. I was startled by a noise overhead and which I thought was caused by some animal or creature. I listened intently and I began to realize that the sounds were made by some one walking up there. The sounds of the footsteps reached the head of the stairway, and then proceeded carefully, cautiously, down the steps. I moved back into a dark corner and strained my eyes for a clear view as possible as it was very dark inside.

"Well the fellow, it was a man---would you believe it---I could have sworn it was "Jeff" of the punnies---After reaching the first floor, went directly to a table in the room and lit a large lamp with a dark black shade on it. I imagined he must have been asleep upstairs up to the time when the first sounds of his footsteps reached my ears. The lamp lighted up the room a considerable distance from the table so that I was certain I would be discovered if the man who wore a gray uniform like a "Gandolinian" King" should turn his eyes toward me. I was not particularly afraid of an encounter with him, as he was very small as tall as you Jean, and moreover I could see no reason why two such persons as we who had sought shelter from the enemy's attack in this out of the way place should have an occasion for trouble between us here unless he was a "Gandolinian" foe. Still his actions were so peculiar that my curiosity forced me to decide to watch him and see what he was up to. I was not long in finding out what he was up to. He cleared away a place on the table, and muttered something like this: "How long will it take that man to come" and then began to produce from various pockets such an assortment of papers, and parchments as to leave no doubt in my mind concerning the nature of his profession. I have of course never seen the man before, and thought at first he was an actor of those punnies. Evidently he made a haul somewhere, and then I recalled the circumstances of the raid of "Gandolinian" pickpocket spies in these camps early this morning, and decided at once that he must have been either a member of that gang, or a leader.

After he had made a complete examination of his stolen treasure, he made duplicate copies of them, sealed them into stamped envelopes, transferred them all into a big catchel, and then the envelopes he had stolen into the stove and set fire to them. Then he took from a pocket of his coat what appeared to be a private letter, drew from the envelope a bit of folded paper, unfolded it, held it close to the lamp, began to study its contents, and to whisper it.

At this point of the narrative, Jean could scarcely restrain an expression of excitement. He was certain that the little was the one Gertrude lost.

"He worked on it" the narrator continued "but so mad unable to get anything satisfactory out of it, and shocked me by blaspheming. In a while I grew very tired standing in an uncomfortable position and shifted my feet to relieve my aching legs. In doing so I made a slight noise that caused the Jeff faced man to spring up in alarm. I don't know what brought me to make the move that I next accomplished unless it feared he was a chery spy and must be desperately alarmed at my discovery of so much stolen goods in his possession. I did not have much time to think. It seemed that I must get him first or he would get me, so I made a dive for him, springing on first knocking him out before he could draw a gun, and getting out the door. He ran as quick as a cat. He did not see the pun I made at him, and hit me back so hard that I nearly fell over. The next thing I was conscious of was firing away at me with an automatic. He fired four shots at me inside the building, but missed each time. I ran out through the doorway and outside, but he rushed at after me and continued to pump his murderous machine gun at me. He fired eight shots in the open. One of them struck me in the leg when I fell my hand must have struck a stone or something hard that knocked me out. I want to thank you very much for what you have done for me. The man continued. "If there is any way in which I can turn the favor I am sure you won't make a mistake by letting me know."

"There is a way you can do me a great favor," Jean said quickly but calmly.

"Tell me how and it is as good as done," the man cried from the shed.

"Ask Hendro Durgar not to protest in our plans to go to Atliann with the Princess."

The wounded Caminit Camini chief then was silent for more than a minute.

"What makes you think he is doing that?" Ginepro asked inquired.

"Because she says he has been so ill without hesitation." The man says he thinks our mission is too dangerous, and he worries about our lot a good deal. But we are sure we will not attempt to do what we believe would be foolish and suicidal for us. He represents one of the Supreme Heads of our Society. They say he has his heart, but we do not think so."

The injured man was silent for a few minutes. He seemed to be suffering considerably as a result perhaps of the jolting of the horse and in mental exertion in the telling of his story.

"You'd better not talk any more now," Jean said feeling that quite as good results would be attained by dropping the subject now that he had impressed upon this great Gandini Scout the full force of his request. "Would you like a little more of this cordial? We will be at general Aronburg's headquarters pretty soon now where you'll be taken care of."

"Yes I believe I will take another taste," the man replied, reaching for the flask. "But let me reassure you. I will be at this point until I look through the help of my aids, into the affairs of Violat, and her sisters from their point of view; as well as from the point of view of my helper Durgar hereafter, and if I find it is not such a perilous adventure as it is feared I will stop his interference as far as I am concerned. But if it is a dangerous undertaking, I could not do it."

"Why?"

"Because first it would be suicidal. General Tar-silina is at Atliann or near that spot, and he knows the plans of the Princesses. He will and through you, if you succeed by having an army drive him from there. But that and all will be well. Otherwise your expedition is impracticable. Jean I can even prove that. Get general Violat to join with his brothers hereafter, and then you may be able to capture the Atliann territory and do your work as you wish. That is all I can suggest besides trying the other."

"He could ask nothing more than that from you," Jean said with a little sigh of relief.

The patient was taken to GSA general Aronburg's headquarters and left in charge of Alfred Cross. Jean, while general Aronburg said that his own surgeon should take care of the man's wound. Then the princess returned back to their graveyard position. It was almost twelve o'clock when Mildred, Gladys, and the others entered the graveyard. Then as there was still a full in the conflict, their topic of conversation was discussed thus:

"I wonder if general Durgar might have brought up his forces here yet, and if he had succeeded in getting all the men together of what the enemy is going to do next," Mildred said.

"Yes I wonder too," Jean answered. "But we'll find out before long. I want to go and see him and tell him what the Ginepro said in the old farm building before the enemy reaches here."

"Yes it might help him cause the capture of the whole camp of Gandolinian spies," Gladys suggested. "And to night or to morning morning we ought not to sleep very late, for if he wants us further information for our protection from the Gandolinians in case the battle comes to narrow too he probably will be here at the midnight camp soon after day break."

"We probably won't be able to sleep at all to night with all the noise that comes if the battle should continue through the night," Jean then said.

In the meantime general Durgar had arrived from his scouting tour with his officers. I to inquire if all had gone well as could be expected, and if he could be of further service than of concentrating a portion of his army at certain matters pertaining to how to defend the graveyard in case the enemy should force him back, all which required her attention, and she decided to return with Angelina Durgar and bring up all the resources possible from her camp. She said she wouldn't go long, and went. Presently, however, general night night Durgar appeared before general Durgar. He had a message to report that he and three of his staff generals had been scouring the region with evident success and that all was prepared for it was evident that any moment now the enemy would hurl his men again against the Christian line. He desired to ask some more questions of Mildred, and his more questions should soon brought out the sequel to Mildred's story that she had come to him over the military phone. Immediately general night night Durgar started back to camp to interview Ginepro at general Aronburg's headquarters.

Shirley's speaking it was contrary to the spirit of the Executive Rules of the organization, which are not friendly to the holding of noon day councils. Garbuda had often objected when the first inauguration of a noon day council was made. It was a bad precedent to an anti-christian like him said.

Then followed the chanting of the Wu Ji Wohale Chant, the roll call of the Olympic rings, the report of the Chinese Nationalism to which each person responded with a solemn call, the reading of the point Count, the making of individual reports, the awarding of honors and finally institutions, and then this was over, and the motion of the awards began. Angeline, who had recited the history of her own achievements and showed fine deportment and others had the qualifications of leaders were trustworthy and unselfish and that Gertrude herself was able to present fifteen thousand dollars in addition to those she presented for the man, run of the camp fire girls.

In conclusion Angelina Riches said:
"How strange! I call upon you to repeat the desire of Jane Hollfort."
"And Jane told her purpose and said:
"I desire desire that upon all here to pass as perfect."
"Oh girls and boys are there."

These words uttered at this juncture in tone and contents of a nature that are not associated with the quiet and composure of even girl scouts contain a thrill of apprehension through the words of girls and boys. And ended the meeting before it was finished. It was Joyce St. Claire who sprang out and with her utterance she pointed one finger off toward the south-east. Every eye turned in the direction indicated and beheld a slight light of them will ever forget. Just emerging into the open from beyond a clump of bushes and small trees was the form of a small purple-uniformed man of a little less than the height of a ten-year-old child, clad in a loose fitting garment, head bare and advancing toward one of the vaults in the graveyard on the corner.

"Hurry! Gertrude this is no time for any more ceremony." Jean exclaimed excitedly. "That man is that Jeff. By or I'll lose my hat, ah and he's up to something. This is the third time he has done this just recently to my way of thinking. Believing Hildred and I will see him leave the house a few days before last and we tried to follow him. Something too has been weighing heavily on my mind and therefore I must follow him and find out what he is up to. Come on Hildred, we'll lead the way. You other girls better hold behind a little and be careful not to do anything rash. But see that we remain in your sight and if he attacks us at us you open fire. If we do not catch him or prevent his efforts we'll see a disaster to our country's cause, and that would have a disastrous effect on our nation."

The next instant, after the close of this speech, Jean and Hildred were darting off through the bushes at considerable danger of stubbing their feet or scratching their faces and hands in their haste not to let the Glandelinian Professional spy get away from them. Gertrude and the others followed more or less circumspectly and with due respect with Jean's whisper the two girls scouts ahead found it quite unavoidable to lose sight of the spy for a minute or two. It appeared most probable that his place of destination was the abandoned shed or country barn and if so he undoubtedly would pass around the north side to get to the main entrance at the south. The two girls scouts realized that it would be impossible for them to follow him along the same course of which he was cautiously moving without there being a short period in the pursuit when the building could be between them and the spy which they did not want to lose sight of. Besides if he saw them he'd let them find it out. So they accepted the inevitable and made a short cut to the northwest and were soon in position to observe the spy as he came around the southwest corner of the building. The latter appeared almost as soon as Jean and Hildred reached their point of vantage which was in the shadow of a big pine tree and the southwest corner of the house.

He made direct for the entrance, watching for everything straight behind, forward and every direction meanwhile and appearing to be cautious for every foe that might surprise him.
"It's dangerous of course but we must fight the unknown and follow him inside." Said Jean resolutely. "Are you come, Hildred?"
"I am if you are" the other replied, certainly not with bravado, but with a sort of added resolution.

"And if you are careful, I don't believe he'll notice us." Jean said confidently, as he led the way as she led the way.
Into the gloomy miniature lobby they went and were near enough to the spy to see him pass into the room undoubtedly intended as a lounge place for the guest. Into this room the two girls scouts followed the man, and there they found it necessary to get within a few feet of him in order to determine what he was doing but hiding meanwhile where he wouldn't see them.

Four large paneled windows were in the north and south walls but the twilight outside was almost entirely shut off by a solid sheltered porch which ran around both of these sides of the building. Jean and Hildred managed to watch the actions of the spy as he advanced by standing close to the north wall. They felt that distance distanced by being discovered in this position as there they were not in danger of being discovered in this position as there they were only the slightest possibility of coming into physical contact with "Mr. Jeff" as he seemed to be using his eyes for nothing whatever now except to guide his cautious movements straight ahead.

With the least hesitation, the man went toward the fireplace too grabbed hold of the top of one of the boulders of which the enclosure of the hearth was constructed, and moved it from side to side. It required all his strength to do this, but presently he succeeded in lifting the stone out of its place and putting it down on the floor but not without a "bang," that made the building tremble. Then he put his hand into the opening thus made and drew out something which the little watchers could see no indistinctly that they were unable to form any idea as to what it was. With this in his hands he strode over to one of the windows, stood there for a few minutes, then returned, replaced the object into its hole, and put the stone where he had found it. This done he faced about, and fairly ran out of the building.

"Hurry!" Jean whispered to her companion. "Follow the spy. Try and get him captured if you can. I'll be with you in a moment. I must see what he was so interested in here."

Hildred did as requested, while Jean rushed the switch of her flashlight and threw the rays upon the spot of greatest interest over the fireplace. The loose boulder was rather large and heavy, and the girl who fortunately was strong (or she couldn't have carried her friend) had nevertheless some difficulty in removing it but finally she succeeded in dislodging it on the floor. Then she reached her hand into the hole as the spy had done, and drew out a metal box about nineteen inches long and six inches square in the cross section.

"I bet $100,000,000 I suspect what this box contains," she mused as she turned to follow Hildred, but she had advanced only a few steps when she was seized from behind and roughly on her wounded shoulder by a pair of strong hands and thrown violently to the floor. "he screamed from the pain, and to catch herself she dropped the box. This was immediately seized by her assailant, but another man this time, who then made a dash for the entrance. But he did not get far. The pain was little less than fire in her wound from his rough hand, and enraged to the fury of a panther. Jean immediately drew her pistol and shot him dead. Then another man rushed in and drew a pistol to shoot her and had only fired one shot when he was seized or jumped upon by three other girls who threw him down upon the porch floor almost as violently as the dead man had thrown Jean.

"Oh my shoulder," pined Jean's "how he hurt me the beast."
"Come on Jean!" cried a voice that the half scared and injured girl recognized as that of George the German boy. "I've got him."

The girl ran out and snatched up the precious box, which had been dropped by the dead man. As George was searching the fallen assailant for a weapon, two other Glandelinians rushed him, and one again made for Jean at hitting at her with a pistol butt, but two shots rang out and others followed from elsewhere as these Glandelinians with a scream fell dead. Jean then aided George to search the fallen man with her flashlight, and as she observed the features of the man and his small physique a "mystery suspicion" she demanded addressing the prisoner, who was no longer struggling.

"Find out yourself you little wisp!" he growled, and at this moment six other girls appeared on the porch followed by others.
"Here's that Jeff fellow!" Jean inquired.

"He's gone," was the girls surprising answer. "But Gertrude outside. She wants to find out if everything is all right."

Gertrude was not surprised at all when she saw the result of the affray. Perhaps the mild manner in which she accepted the novel situation was due to the fact that she had expected such a violent violent experience for Jean in the course of her activities of following the spy. Jean was still rubbing her aching shoulder, and then she saw Hildred and Jane Hollfort too coming toward her, and also Angelina Jennings and a few moments later about a hundred boys and girls scouts approaching. They had heard the shooting. Jean was not slow in recognizing the narrow escape she had had.

"What happened here girls?" Angelina Riches who also came inquired of Jean and Hildred. "Tell me what has happened. Who shot those Glandelinians?"

Angelina Riches appeared to be almost amazed at the situation. "I shot that one on the lawn near the door," said Jean, whose face she showed she still suffered pain from the rough handling of her wounded shoulder. This is the third time we trailed that "Jeff" spy. He appeared to be interested in something in the building. He went in there a few minutes ago, removed a stone from the fireplace and examined something that seemed to be hidden there."

"or the first time Angelina Jones was excited. "What's that you say?" she exclaimed.

"Jean repeated her statement. "Where you here? Did you see him? Come on and show me what he hid." Jean led the way, and many of the others followed. They had no gone far when evidences of a struggle on the porch reached their ears and eyes. This did not stop Angelina Jones however, and the child scouts continued to follow her. They found George and several other strong boyscots holding their prisoner down, and examining his clothes for a weapon, while Jean aided them with her flash light.

"Just does this mean?" Angelina Jones inquired. "What that man is 'The Mutt' follow the Professional spy. What were you doing here?" she addressed?

"I can tell you," Jean answered for the prisoner, who refused to say a word on any subject. He was a man who had after something in a box or at least his smaller companion was. The smaller man was Gertrude's mysterious letter in his possession and I believe he had deciphered enough of it at last to inform him that he could find something that means no more of us want him to have. It was he who shot Mr. Glingore early this morning, while we were looking for the plane."

"Why Jean?" Gertrude exclaimed excitedly. "Do you realize what you are telling Angelina? I remember everything now—where the dead general hid the plans of the territory of Abbeinn. If we secure those papers no Glandelinian army can remain here long. I can put my hand right on the spot. Come on. I must get them at once. I can't wait an instant."

"It's unnecessary," Gertrude said. "I have them here in my hand. I got them after he went away. The man who I shot dead, assaulted me and grabbed the box away."

"How did you happen to be here George?" Gertrude inquired, addressing the German boy.

"I saw the man too and I followed him too. The boy replied. "I am well acquainted with him. He murdered my youngest sister."

"Let me prove to you that I remember now the secret that the general gave me on his death bed and which I so foolishly forgot," Gertrude proposed. Let me have your light Jean."

She led the way into the parlor, and went direct to the fireplace. After a short examination of the stones she laid her hands on the loose boulder which the spy had removed a short time before and lifted it out of its fire place. The entire camp fire too was present by this time, and a period of explanations followed. Then all returned to the graveyard, while George placed a watch over the prisoner. Gertrude Angelina of course too brought the box along with her and insisted on examining its contents before she reached the grave yard again as no assault was coming on yet. The examination proved satisfactory so far as she was able to determine. The metal case contained a dozen or more military bonds and property bonds of large denomination and a number of important papers about the mysterious northern tunnels running north from Abbeinn. After assuring herself that she had indeed discovered the long missing papers of which she was the bonded trustee and upon whom the mystery of the Abbeinn disaster now rested on she placed every paper carefully back into the box and closed it, and returned with the others into the cemetery bringing the treasure with her and placing it under the ground near her mound position.

Jean had to sit up against a tree and allow some one to see whether the man had done any damage to her wounded shoulder, and then she was told to lie down and try and sleep off the effects of her experience and she would forget the pain. He was tired and sleepy however despite it being day having had little sleep during the night, and it was all quite natural for her to be under the circumstances and moreover she had strong nerves and was capable of speedy recovery from her thrilling experience.

However when she was suddenly aroused it could not have been more suddenly. Her first conscious awareness was the realization that she was sitting up on the ground with the sound of a sharp explosion ringing in her ears. Even though the explosion seemed to have occurred right beside her she was not frightened, though her first thought was that someone must have thrown a grenade into the grave yard nearby. A moment later she decided this idea was foolish but she was unable to memorize a more reasonable substitute. It was very gloomy in the grave yard now. The smoke cloud in the sky was heavier and while Jean was attempting to drive away the slight surprise that had seized her and get a view of her obscured surroundings there came several explosions in rapid succession, and at once she realized the nature of these noises was out of the bud and besides Gertrude's bench. It was empty.

In a moment she had arisen to her feet for a great dread of some direful event held Jean in a rigid position besides Gertrude's bench, she was unable to tell what. She was afraid to move, and yet duty told her that she ought not to be idle in this crisis, that if she were active and resourceful, she might be of important service to Gertrude. But what could she do? With an effort she answered this question by proving that she could do something. She moved, and this moving was a great relief. She reached for her pistol which she always kept in her holster in her belt, and was still further relieved. What could she do now? was her next question. She could not see what was going on, nor where Gertrude went, but with a resolution in her mind she went forward toward the opening gate of the cemetery and looked around. She saw nothing of interest, and was about to venture cautiously a little further when Gertrude appeared suddenly before her, approaching through the open gate.

"Oh Jean!" she exclaimed in great distress. "I've been robbed again by spies. Two strange men crept up to the bench on which I was sitting from behind, and while one held me tightly around the neck with his arm so I couldn't move or scream out, the other dug in to the ground in front of me and took the box. I just aroused myself after they were getting away with it, and drew my pistol and fired at them. Then I ran after them a distance followed by a number of my scouts who were aroused by the shouting and pursued them for a distance of fifteen yards. I could see them disappear behind a clump of high bushes and stopped and emptied all the rest of my cartridges at them. I think I hit one of the spies for he uttered an unmistakable curse of pain. Isn't this the worst piece of luck you ever heard of?"

Jean recalled the lecture Gertrude had given her early that morning on the subtle subject of luck and would have smiled and rebuked the lecturer if the present situation had not been so serious.

"What were they?—have you any idea?" she inquired excitedly.

"One of them was that 'Jeff' spy I feel certain, Gertrude replied. "At any rate one of them was a small man about that ones size."

"But how did he get away. I thought you could have shot him easily."

"I can't figure it out," Gertrude said dubiously. "It sure is a puzzle to me. Something serious must also have happened. We really ought to go and find out. George may be seriously wounded and suffering. If his prisoner escaped, George must have got hurt. He certainly is earning his effort to become a boyscout. He and his helpers wouldn't have let the man go without a fight if he was in a position where he could fight."

As she finished speaking Mildred Maxwell and Minnie Saunders Jones sister and some others came up to learn what had taken place. They were quickly informed and then they all gave their signals to acquaint the whole force with developments so all would be on their guard. All of them were ready in a moment well informed that Gertrude was organizing a relief excursion to the barn where George and others had been left in charge of the prisoner. In a few minutes about forty were ready to accompany them and the start was made. Realizing that one or more or a score or probably a hundred of the desperado soldiers might be in or near the building, they proceeded cautiously and with all rifles at the ready. As they neared the front entrance they heard a loud groan which sent such a chill through the girls' scouts that every one of them halted in awed apprehension of a vision of something dreadful. They all were courageous in this crisis, and their fright was only for the one in whom they were concerned.

"Don't be too careless girls and you boys too," Gertrude said. "The enemy might be around. That is also no doubt was made by poor George and he's probably injured and we've got to steel ourselves to go to his rescue at once."

"We are not reckless," said Mildred, stepping ahead cautiously. "I don't see no one around through."

"Nor I," said Jane, whereupon this expression became a sort of slogan and everybody repeated it, and a general movement was made. They were not long in finding the object of their search. George lay bound and gagged and so did his helpers all right in front of the entrance of the building. Apparently they were not seriously injured. If at all and George's eyes gazed up at them strongly and clearly. Gertrude at once began a search through his pockets and soon produced a large jackknife, which she opened with her fingers. Then she cut his bonds and those of the others and removed the gags from their mouths. George sat up, moved his stiffened legs with difficulty a few moments then managed to get onto his feet with the assistance of some of the girls.

"What happened George?" Gertrude inquired. "How in the world did you ever get into such a predicament?"

"Not through any of my choosing you can be dead certain," he said with a kind of vindictive bitterness. "But I met more than my match that time. I've never before in my life been licked by any boy but I was sure licked that time. He handled me as if I was a football."

"Why George, who did he do? Tell me quick. We haven't any time to loose."

"Why that small fellow of course," George replied fiercely.

"Do you mean to say that, that small Jeff fellow was here again to night?" Gertrude gasped.

"That is what I do mean to say," George replied with energy. "He was here all right. I guess I ought to know, for I felt his bone and muscle. He gripped me like steel and he handled me just like a muscular washerwoman would handle her four year old child. I could see his face plain enough. I got a good view of it. He came up behind me while I was watching my prisoner and he sure took hold of me with a grip that would have crushed a granite tombstone. He threw me on my back, and with one knee on my chest so pressed the life out of me that I couldn't utter a sound, while he cut the ropes that bound my prisoner. Then they tied my hands and feet with the ropes that had been around 'tut' and shoved a gag into my mouth. My helpers were seized as they tried to come to my rescue and tied up too. They did not wait a moment after that but went over to the grave yard and tried to rob you I suppose. I heard the shooting and was pretty sure who was doing it. Did you hit either of them Gertrude? Did they get away with anything?"

"I should say they did," Gertrude replied desperately. "They got away with just what they came after---the box of securities that was recovered early to day. I don't suppose now I shall ever see them to day. They were rigidly pursued by soldiers but I do not know what success they made."

"You don't tell me," George exclaimed. "That's too bad. But I could have helped it if I had seen that fellow come and had an over-catch with him. I being only a kid. I tell you he's the most powerful fellow that ever struck these parts, though he's no bigger than I am. Why he could have done up his bigger companion with a single touch of his hand."

"Well let's go back to the graveyard, and try and organize a search to follow their trail," Gertrude suggested. "There's no use in letting things go if we can help it."

So they returned to the graveyard. There was little spirit among them all now. Every one of even the Camp fire girls who were yet with them felt as if they had lost out in the battle of life, and there was nothing more ahead of them but gloom. There was not one of the girls scouts who did not love Gertrude Angeline as if she had been a child rather than a woman. The burden of their loss was felt by the whole company as if it was their own personal loss, and perhaps it was the awfulness of this new blow and the suffering that it must inflict upon Gertrude Angeline that caused the two Regiments of Girl and Boy scouts to realize how great their affection for her had become since they had known her.

All were in a hurry however to trail the spies though not one of them suggested a possibility that anything might turn up which would throw a more hopeful light on the actual resulting conditions. What was the use. The dangerous men had got possession of the treasure they had sought, and the lookout for its recovery was poor indeed.

George himself had rode on his horse back to General Aronburg. Aronburg's headquarters and telephoned to the generals information of the latest robbery by the spies, and begged that they will not be able to get out of the christian lines. This seemed to be about all that could be done and was the only hopeful feature of the conversation that followed his return. They examined the trail left by the two Professional Professional spies in their hasty departure. The suggestion arose as a result of a remark by Gladys's Wenthworth.

"If you shot one of those men," she said "I'd like to have the satisfaction of knowing it. I wonder if we couldn't find a trail of blood on the ground. That might be worth something. The officials might like to know about it, if such a trail exists."

"I'm afraid it wouldn't run very far," Gertrude said. "They no doubt stopped the flow of blood if one of them was wounded, before they got very far. However let's satisfy our curiosity and see what we can find."

Gertrude indicated the direction the two men had taken, and about forty of them started out on a search. The ground was examined a distance of fifty yards from the cemetery gate, and sure enough was found the beginning of a trail of foreign spots on the grass and weed leaves. These spots were almost of a dull brown now as a result of their exposure and chemical action between them and the vegetation on which they rested.

All the girls and boys rushed to the spot as Jane Melfort excitedly announced her discovery of the trail. As they were examining the spots to see in what direction they led, Jean herself announced a new and more startling discovery in a manner that thrilled all present as nothing else could have done.

"Oh I've found it, I've found it," she exclaimed, and the way she began to leap down the steep descent close to a spring rivulet which sprang up the rocky steep toward the main stream in the form of a cascade was a sight to make one's heart throb in expectant union.

No body else saw the object of her interest until she reached it. Fifty yards from the point where she began her descent she stopped and leaned over and picked up what appeared to be the long metal box that had been taken from the first place in the abandoned farm house in the course of the thrilling adventures of the morning just passed.

"You shot the man who carried the box, and he dropped it, and it evidently fell down here," Jane explained in shrill tones. "The bullet must have hit him in the arm and made him drop the box and they didn't dare to stop to hunt for it because the soldiers were after them and might shoot them down instead of trying to capture them alive."

That really was the only solution for they had been pursued so closely they didn't dare try to recover the box. However the treasured papers were not all in the box for as it tumbled down the hill the lid had been knocked open and most of the papers were scattered in all directions.

Now began a diligent search for the tumbling box. Most of them were scattered along the course taken by the tumbling box. Most of them were soon discovered but the search was continued for several hours in order that none might not be missed, as Gertrude had no list against which to make a check and determined just what the box had contained.

But at last they decided there was no good reason for hunting longer and returned to the grave yard, for the roar of battle was on again and more severely than before. It was dinner time yes, long past dinner time---after two o'clock. Hungry they sure were and had a right to be.

There was no system about the preparation for the dinner. Everybody got busy, and when they sat at last at dinner it would have been hard in deed to find a more deserving happy company of tired and famished girl and boys. During the dinner, in spite of the sound of distant battle Jean and Mildred had a talk with Gertrude over the events. In the course of the conversation she said:

"Do you remember, Gertrude, that early this morning, when our conversation was interrupted by that terrific noise of battle, you were telling me how you trailed the strange creature, and you were at the place in your story where the creature turned on you just as your rescuer fired. Who was the young man who rescued you?"

"That man was Walter Starring," Gertrude replied. Near the end of their conversation, Mildred commented at length on the remarkable adventures they all had had, on the trip down the water in the raft, and expressed a wonder if they would ever go through other experiences as thrilling as recent ones had been. Doubtless her wonder would have been calmed very much if she could have looked ahead and caught but the faintest idea of new adventures in store for them this very afternoon and other days to follow before August was out. This was to be a stirring day indeed.

From the grave yard the girl and boys watched the dreadful battle indeed. The glendelinians fell dead and wounded in fast crowded ranks before the most murderous christian fire on record. General Hector crossed the fields near the right of the Graveyard and hurled his troops forward to the defense before the foe would break the christian line. General Apollo of the glendelinians was killed. The attack upon general Vivianias left, and the christian troops outnumbered fall back. Their officers shouted to the retreating troops, and after desperate work managed to stop the rout. Meanwhile general Hector on the christian side fell mortally wounded. Polydamus was killed, and general Otus C. Crasmus were wounded. General Hector was also wounded but the christian line reinforced at this spot held firm and the battle raged with redoubled fury. The glendelinians rushed forward in terrific array against the christian line like herds of starved beasts but could not pierce in anywhere. The losses were really terrible. The christians then turned forwardly to the counter charge and it was for several minutes a desperate fight to the death. Gertrude saw a glendelinian officer killed by a glendelinian with a bayonet. Another drove his bayonet through the jaw of a glendelinian jerking the man to the ground, but he too is killed by the bayonet in the hands of another. It was a desperate hand to had fight with the christian again becoming victorious. However there was no need of reminding any of the child scouts what was happening then along other portions of the dreadful battle front. Official reports were however astonishingly lacking in real information. The enemy artillery to cover the retreat of the shattered columns was active in all sections, and as all christian was replied vigorously the noise was simply ear splitting without ceasing. A thousand cannon or more were roaring and far as the eye could see the air was thick with explosions, either in the sky or on the ground. High explosives tore gaps in the fields, and among the christian breastworks and trenches and the awful din and devilishness were not surpassed at any time during the war. More than six million men on each side singly were at dreadful grips, and either had been able to force the other back. Again at three o'clock the Glandelinian forces rushed forward to the attack like heavy sand clouds driving by a northwest wind, and hurled itself like a tidal wave not far to the south of Blain night line of works and heading also for Liviania. Simultaneously battery challenged battery in belching forth fire. Heavy long range guns sought targets beyond the intervening hills, and nearer the front shrapnell drenched the space between the battling lines. A hail of iron mingled with all the horror and if there had been the wildest thunderstorm on record, the thunders of the heaven would have been inaudible in the more murderous thunders of the guns, the firing of rifle or the roar of the yelling combatants. It was battle not magnificent but horrible this time. Manley was trying his utmost and was hurling forces upon all northern portions of Arobus line and no inferno of poets pen could ever tell the horrible results and rampant death, and destruction claimed this part of the country as its own. It was a world war in this territory the culmination of devastation and frightfulness. Twice Manley's troops won, driving the christians back a mile in places, twice they in turn were slaughtered and driven back. It raged dreadfully until evening, when in last leading one of the frightful onslaught of the battle general Manley himself fell from his horse badly wounded and ten of his staff were killed. This threw the Glandelinians into confusion, the Abhisennians receiving the signal moved forward to the counter charge, and toward night along a battle front of fifty miles the tumult gradually quelled, and to the enemy a thousand Waterloo routes seemed to occur. A thousand Nopalgens seemed to have been outwitted, and a thousand times as many Glandelinians fell as at Waterloo in that one day. The battle was over, the Glandelinian army was shattered and the darkness made harmless the wilfulness of man. But in a starful it prevailed over fried and foe and where one short hour ago, the clamor of all hell split the air was now the quiet of a summer evening, and Peace, blessed peace.

The attack fortunately never came toward the graveyard, I say fortunately, not for the child scouts, but for the enemy. They'd been a horror if it had, for all child scouts to the enemy are vindictive, and so the child scouts lost once change of inflicting a terrible loss of life on the enemy, though it is hard to estimate whether they regretted it or not.

However victory in the battle did not seem so pleasing for the dryness of the weather, the war devastations was was delighting the enemy was bringing gloom to the christian states. The weather itself for this year was setting a record for dryness, and the record throughout the country too was a record beyond measure for high temperatures because of the fires which was unequalled for more than any temperature ever known in hot weather for summer. It was threatening in Calvernia also to be a disastrous drought and there was no prospect of any immediate change for the same record breaking arid conditions all records showed was widespread over the country. Even for August the warmest month in Calvernia the average daily temperature was 10, 10 degrees above normal. The draughts from the fires was doing this. All farmers and rural distict districts saw themselves facing disaster. Any places were also suffering from a failure of water supplies, and it was believed the dreadful drought was caused by the extensive heats of the forest fires and the dreadful explosion explosions which all often was shaking the air and ruining so many cities and towns. It was said that practically the only hope now for a change in conditions was the approach of winter in Calvernia with its always unusually heavy snows in the north and rains in the summer. As the average of explosion disasters they too were abnormal as can be seen in further description for ending of chapter on next page.

Some recent explosions had produced such sudden air vibrations and such convulsions of the earths surface surface that not only were the works of men destroyed, camps and cities hurled down but even the face of the very country was either changed or devastated. No doubt these big explosions would be remembered by the survivors all their lives. The slighter ones however were hardly ever noticed and were only recorded by curious observers. Explosions had been frequent. By one exact observer not less than fifty seven hundred concussions had been noticed within the space of four months in the region of the Aronburg and Mic-holleston gun which were attended by such smart concussions or shocks as to be sensibly felt and to break windows in towns and cities for great distances. Near Anna Aronburg city in the extreme middle west of Calvernia one or more concussion shocks of distant explosions had been felt almost everyday and although they commonly passed off without doing any damage the town had now suffered severely from two severe blasts and so many lives had been lost by the downfall of many buildings that the inhabitants rush out of their houses as soon as the least noise in the distance is heard or the least shock of the earth is felt.

We could convince our reader if possible that the surface of the whole war stricken country from shore to shore was always shaken by explosions at some point or other every minute and even by battles and other disasters.

572

UNSUCCESSFUL ATTEMPTS TO REDUCE THE FORTIFICATIONS OF CROWLEY AND THE RESULT /THE FIGHTFUL
SLAUGHTER AND THE CANNONADING OF SEVEN HUNDRED THOUSAND CANNON THAT SHOOK THE CITIES ALONG THE ANGOL NIAN COASTS, AND LEVELED SCORES WITH THE CONCUSSION.

During the same time the great battle of Cedernine raged the town of Crowley having been in the hands of the enemy since the war started, was well fortified. This great city which had inaugurated the great Alandoo Angolinian war pluckily resisted all the attempts to take it. On Go Good Friday 1912 general Varsahills force of about one million six hundred thousand Angolinians made a furious attack upon Crowley attempting with might and main to take Forts Alexandria and Stanoktinia by storm.

The battle raged for four days and assumed a frightful fury, Stanck leading over two hundred thousand men against Fort Alexandria and kept up the assaults for more than five months without a days intermission in the attacks making about sixty assaults in one day, but each time suffered a bloody and crushing repulse.

After two years or nearly a year and a half of battling Stanck began a general action at Sionville attacking the enemys main wings under Bunte but he was killed during the height of the battle and again after many days of frightful carnage the christians were repulsed with terrific slaughter.

At the same time the christians launched sledge hammer blows upon the Alandelinians at Sionville but could not make any impression, and suffering greater loss in killed and wounded were forced to withdraw.

Fort Stanoktinia was at the same time bombarded by over five hundred thousand cannon, but could not be reduced and over eighty thousand christian cannon were silenced and four thousand destroyed during the bombardments which shook the cities along the coasts for hundreds of scores of miles so severely, that those nearest the battle seemed destroyed as if swept by a terrific tornado of hurricane width.

On the days nearing the time of the battle of Cedernine, Marshall concentrated his artillery upon the fortifications and started a terrific earsplitting artillery duel that shook the cities along the coasts for its whole length, and at the same time assaults were successfully made upon Sionville but the heaviest attacks upon Crowley were repulsed with the most frightful carnage. General Marshall himself was wounded, his aiding generals - Salemannia, Marshall, Fields and Mc-Glurges were killed and two others were wounded. After four more days of fearful slaughter Marshall saw that he could not retake Crowley and so abandoned the attack the enemy following him hard and harassing his rear worse than the Russians did to Napoleons army during the retreat from Moscow.

In the whole battle he had lost over six million in killed and wounded, and one hundred and fifteen thousand in prisoners, and thirty four thousand men by desertions and two hundred and thirty four thousand men in killed during the last of the great and longest battle of the war.

The Alandelinian losses were one million in killed and wounded the christians having suffered heavily because they were exposed, to the terrific shell fire of the Alandelinians. The Alandelinians had not lost a single general officer the forts were in the same condition as before the battle started and there was no damage done anywhere. The main commander on the Alandelinian side to the christian Stanck -

THE SERIOUS QUARRREL, OR, GREATER SORROW YET....

Couple of hours previous aft during the battle of Cedernine 6,200,000 of Baldwin's Lancelinians had been forced to surrender to the christian armies, having been caught in a trap and surrounded by an overwhelming force. Baldwin had been tickled with rage but the leader of that division who alone escaped was summoned before the great and haughty general.

"How did this disaster occur?" Asked Baldwin sullenly.

"The Vivian girls were responsible for it." Said General Braggard.

They told me that they hated you and would do this to cause you trouble."

"I believe it is a lie stormed Baldwin." Where is your proof?"

"Not only have I proofs but I swear by the bible that they did it." Said the slanderer.

These last words incensed general Baldwin to the quick. "He turned to the orderly and said;

"Summon those little girls before me."

In a few minutes the orderly appeared with the little girls whose hands were bound behind them by the Lancelinians.

"You children have repayed me evil for good." He stormed. "You have caused a large division of my command to be captured and shall pay dearly for it. And you told one of my officers that you would do this to cause trouble for me."

"But --"

"I want no explanation from you." Interrupted general Baldwin fiercely. "I'll see that you are withdrawn from this region and sent back to Wm. Vanley in disgrace. And here after don't dare enter the premises of my headquarters as you have had the liberty of so doing, and if you do it will be at your risk. I'm going to order my men to shoot you on sight if you ever appear on my premises. Vanley had turned your little girls over to me, I had allowed you your freedom on about the camps and had even decided to take you outside the fings and let you go when I had the opportunity and yet this is what I got for it."

Baldwin then wheeled his horse and left his headquarters tent ordering the sentries to kill the Vivian girls if they ever appeared on the premises....

Meanwhile general Leonia Miconia Picknall had been made by and having seen the performance said to himself;

"What has Baldwin got to say about those chu child prisoners. I'll give it to him for this...."

Twenty minutes passed and then general Baldwin found general Picknall standing before him.

"It seems strange that you dare abuse those poor little Vivian girls you big overgrown ox." Said Picknall. "This occurrence will be liable to make me your enemy...."

"They caused the capture-----" They did not. "Stormed general Picknall. "Said one word more you big moush rat and I'll use you around this place like a foot ball."

"Oh is that so?" Laughed Baldwin. "You are my superior, but you good for nothing skunk, you'll march out of here mighty quick or I'll riddle you with bullets. Go." And he drew his forty fives.

"But as he said this Baldwin realized to his sorrow that he was making a deadly enemy out of Picknall, out of a man who had been his best friend and even a boy chum since they were three years old. In some ways he felt that he had wronged to the little girls and that Braggard had probably been the guilty one, and though Picknall had disarmed Baldwin and before the later knew it Baldwin said something to himself.

"This will be Braggard's last day here in command." He growled to himself. "with a frightful scowl." And I'll cancel that order about the little girls too and set them free. If they are harmed in the least I'll kill every one like a sink rat and him too the consumptive old big slenderer."

Braggard at this moment came up and Baldwin and Picknall as they appeared to be suddenly threw off their gray uniforms and there stood Hanson and The Christian Baldwin to his surprise.

Baldwin was astonished, astonished at the appearance of Hanson and so was Hanson at Baldwin.

"You will excuse me for my meanness to the little girls whom I had rescued from the enemy." Said Baldwin to Hanson with a wicked smile overspreading his face those Vivian girls."

"You will do nothing of the kind." Yelled Braggard. "I'm not in the least scared of you and you will die yourself if I loose my command. I'll report to the government the conduct of you to the Vivian girls who caused the destruction of your command in gray uniforms which they had no business to be wearing and you threatened to kill them yourself if they dared enter their premises."

"Go you fool or I'll run you through like I would a dog." And Baldwin drew his sabre knocking the guns out of Hanson's hands by mistake.

Braggard quickly drew his own and struck Baldwin a glancing blow on the side of the head skinning his cheek badly. Then the general went toward the entrance exit quietly, but the look in his face made Baldwin realize that he had been reckless and was dealing with a bitter-foe who had slandered on the Vivian girls.

Hanson himself had mounted his horse and rode with haste to general Vivian's headquarters. He set the great general's horse as he was coming down the grand stairs leading from the porch and slaught saluting said;

"Your daughters have been insulted and slandered on to that general Baldwin by that old dog Braggard. He falsely accused them of having caused one of his large scouting divisions wearing the gray coat to be annihilated or captured by the Angelnians under general Windernine by mistake during the fighting at the Cedernine run. I know this to be an error, and a thought at first Baldwin believed it he realized it also before he had a serious quarrel with me and when Braggard found it out that he was discovered to be the guilty one he struck his excellency Baldwin in the face with his sabre. The little girls are innocent for as you know they did not lead his gray divisions. So angered was Baldwin when he first believed the black lie that he had threatened them with death if they entered his headquarters. Now Baldwin is sorry."

"I'll speak to him." Said the great general coolly. "If he goes on like that I'll have to take his command away from him and put that Archibald in his place. He ordered the orderly to bring his horse and in two minutes more the two generals were riding toward general Baldwin's headquarters. He set an orderly on the way for the Vivian girls who came just as the two were reaching Baldwin's headquarters.

General Baldwin's pale face flushed at the sight of general Hanson and the Vivian girls entering with general Vivian and his carefully rehearsed calm shook forsook him.

"My sword, general Vivian." He said in a voice that shook with rage. He extended the blade attempting to ignore the others, while again he said; "I'll sooner resign my command than have that old dog Braggard in my army again he...."

"You do don't surrender or resign yet." The great general informed him almost curtly. "Where is Braggard. He's got to atone for his lying to you."

"He got to atone to me first for his conduct to me or I'll have him backed up against the wall and vented." Said Baldwin. "He skinned my cheek with his sabre."

"I won't do anything of the sort and you had no business to cancel that death order or yours."

"But you'll do that before you surrender your blade or I'll have you stood up in front of a hole in the ground, and thought good manners with rifles balls, and you will atone for the abusive slander about the Vivian girls first of all." Said Hanson.

"Fear of death I have none." Spoke Braggard magnanimously. "I have once always been your friend. If I abused the Vivian girls it was because they deserved it. They almost ruined your army with their misjudgement and the exigencies of war made it necessary for me to do so, and my execution I warn you will start a revolution among your army and your disposal. My Vivian divisions sides with me. And I I promise you that I'll never absolve for what I did and I hate to this have you think that I lie to you. Only if I find that they are innocent I'll atone and general Hanson." He added, "having a profound abode absence tinged with a suggestion of scorn across his face." "We had been friends before this. Now we are deadly enemies and I hope to be hanged if I don't get the best of you in this squabble." And turning fiercely to the little girls he added; "And I say this before his excellency general Vivian. You little dogs with dresses, clean out of the room or I'll cut you to pieces if I have to kill both of your fathers and uncle in so doing. You imps have made out of me a galling enemy. Clean out or I'll fill the place with your dismembered bodies. Get you traitors." And he made as if to make a dash at the men.

The little girls obeyed crying piteously. Then extending his sabre to general Vivian he continued;

"Take my sabre if you wish to discharge me to day. I was insulted and humiliated by this common person Baldwin in the bitter hour of my passion over my loss and will not let it go unavenged."

"No I will not discharge you just yet." Answered general Vivian motioning furiously to his daughters to stay right there and not to go out of the room. "You yourself have made a great mistake and I'm almost stunned with surprise. I never knew that this could have happened between you and my daughters, and Hanson and Baldwin. You are such good friends and you have broken the hearts of my daughters, and will have to atone for me also because I vowed death to any one who saddened them in any way. They probably are not guilty for they did not command any of your or even Baldwin's divisions, and I have proofs for they were with Hanson at the time it happened. And I can assure you which you will find out later that the leader of the divisions which he caused the surrender of the christian forces under Archibald were not Angelinians but Glandelinians disguised in purple for they never come from my lines and happened during the engagement between Hanson and Archibald. And I demand you and Baldwin in the name of Heaven to find the rear cause and make him confess even if you have to tie him to the muzzle of a cannon and blow him to pieces.

Now go to your room you bullet headed grouch or I'll riddle you with bullets wherever you stand. With this the two generals left, Hanson going toward his own head quarters with the Vivian girls and general Vivian toward his headquarters.

General Baldwin did not himself go to his room but stood looking after them with a deadly scowl on his ferocious face. "So he said 'Well I'll see what the government has to say about this also. They are both perved over the occurrence and who can blame them.'"

"They are both perved and too particular over those maps I suppose." Said Bri praggard, and you must pardon me because I never struck you or even accused the Vivian girls. It was my divisions under your command that suffered and some one else with my same description in looks and features must have told you and caused all this trouble, said a man coming in looking just like the same devilish praggard. But suppose y those Vivian girls done it to either of the generals which I myself believe they were guilty of though I rave of a not of.

And so they are going to put that spiteful Glandelinian penitent in my place. Eh. Well I'll see about that. And as for those Vivian girls I'll fix their hash for them gold and proper for causing this trouble. I will be a sorry day work when I get done with them. Q A man of my mind never forgets. I was a infernal foul to befriend those striplings like I did and saved them from the cruelties of the Glandelinians. See the repay I got. They knew that the Glandelinians themselves get a division of my men trapped and captured and allow a man with my looks and shape to impersonate me without having him seized, but revenge is mine for now I'll be in the same fix while the real guilty one has escaped. I'll get rid of them little maps and their father and uncle too. I'll send a telegram to the government with my resignation and tell them all about it.

He put on his sombre hat and walked out mounting his horse and galloping away. Riding a short distance past general Hansons region a number of shots rang out and bullets whizzed close to him. Seeing a bunch of soldiers in black hats just as he was about to think he was fired upon by Angelinians themselves for daring to go within Hansons lines, and seeing them rushing toward him he wheeled his horse after discharging a fusillade of shots from his pistol and dashed away bringing down a man at every shot. He gave a shout in reaching his region an hour afterward.

"CONF NY FOYS." He yelled to a number of men I'm perjured. Hurry or they will get me quickly. The Angelinians swarmed to his assistance the Glandelinians scurrying away at the formidable array.

"Readers probably shouted Baldwin: 'And I thought I saw a man looking like you praggard leading them he 'Accded.' Maybe that is the one who slandered."

I have a hint he wanted us to murder the Vivian girls so that they would have gotten out of the way after them they must not escape. At least catch that man imitating praggard."

They were probably raiding Hansons house and as he is one of us we got to do our duty. Persuading a short distance with his men he encountered one of the Vivian girls weeping as if his heart would break.

"He reigned in his horse and cried:

"Why are you weeping that way for you consumptive little sink rats our of hell." He demanded. "Your doings have caused me serious trouble. If I cannot get the best of your feather and Uncle I'll tell you somebody else will. Go out of my way or I'll let my black hatted scout drills capture you."

After this he rode off in a rage determined to get the best of his enemies or die in the attempt, for he was under orders from Man, wangle to cause the disgrace of the little girls at any costs and imitate the christian general praggard not knowing that he was already discovered."

In the meantime the christian officers returned unsuccessful and as sulking praggard said; that they had failed to catch the Glandelinians.

Baldwin rode on toward the east giving no answer but sulked fiercely. What is the matter? "One of his officers asked.

"None of your business." Snapped Baldwin. "Go to your quarters and settle down." "I also have a mind to punish you for your curiosity after letting that darn fool get away. You could have got him if you tried."

"Something is the matter with the general." Said Lieutenant Collen. "I believe he had a fuss with general Hanson, and general Vivian for I saw them coming out of his headquarters."

"He seems to be on a grouch." Said general O'Leason. "I know know that there was something the matter with him."

They watched the irate general till he disappeared out of sight then dispersed

Violet and her sisters had never realized that general praggard would have ever so abused them like this. They did feel sorry for him for they knew that he really believed that he did it for praggard had said to Baldwin that he could prove it.

But to threaten them with death if they should enter his own premises again seemed heartrending. That indeed was what struck them. They remembered with a pang when he had fondled them more than their own father, how he had saved them from death many times by fire from fire during their early lives from the cruelties of the insane teacher. Oh if he would only let them explain. But he did not. However the little girl did not really know the character of the man who had abused them and despite it all praggard felt queer over it and even began to realize that the little girls did not know who the imposter had been and now he firmly decided that they were innocent in all the matter and was bound to get that man even if he had to trail or him all over the war smitten country or upset the Glandelinian army to get him.

Baldwin and praggard knew that it was a dirty blasphemous slander and indeed my dear readers I could not have the heart to admit what would occur to the liar if he would get caught. It would not be fit for writing or explanation in any condition.

The two superior generals knew of the innocence of the little girls for they were not even in that part of the battle when the sad disaster occurred but in general Hansons lines signalling with the boy scout and Baldwin and praggard even realized that they had even seen the little girls at this work. It had indeed been that a sad blow to praggard and Baldwin when the blow occurred and it had been enough to enrage anybody. He or Baldwin had not suspected the accuser and he had, had lately much trouble with him. At the battle one of his infantry forces due to the mistake of misunderstanding of orders had caused praggard to be repulsed with terrible disastrous effects and when praggard was doing his utmost Baldwin had come upon the same man disguised as an Angelinian and looking like praggard Baldwin raising the dickens then with the real christian in a manner which no man could describe, but it had not cowed the treacherous Glandelinian who took the scolding of the innocent man as a joke and planned to cause more trouble for him.

Then general praggard had been ordered to support the great charge up the slopy grounds to Hansons support along the Gloria Hun with advancing battery forces and infantry, and though he had done so Baldwin went up to see the other generals and saw a big christian force with what appeared to be praggard stationed in the same place where he had been before given the order the men having not budged an inch.

Baldwin then did not know what to make of it for surely he had just left praggard from Hansons line from where he came from having come here to order general praggard forward to Hansons support.

Baldwin had remembered that he said to the man looking like praggard: "I thought you were told to go to Hansons support, and I thought you were there for I fancied I saw you there. How did you get back here so soon?"

"You can go plump to H---ll for all I care you hot headed bully." Was the only answer he got, and though the words caused Baldwin to have him looked in the guard house he went straight to Hansons lines, and by Hansons found praggard there fighting so bravely as any of the men. Then his suspicions were aroused and though he had the man he looked in the guard house examined to see who he really was the army jury had no sooner went off for a few moments when the praggard or who ever he was had disappeared. Then the same man had come forward within the christian lines with what was supposed to be a big force of christian reinforcements and one third of the christian division wearing gray uniforms was captured by the purple coat as the trouble he blamed it on the Vivian girls and when out and then to get out of the trouble he refused and when the two general Vivian and Hanson came to make him alone mysteriously away again and generals left he suddenly disappeared the same mysteriously away again and then in came the real praggard having astonished Baldwin with his words.

Toward the afternoon praggard caught a glimpse of the little girls. He saw that they were like many of those busy trip in creatures that can no more be contained in one place than a sun beam or a summer breeze nor were they children that once seen could be easily forgotten on. No perfection of childlike beauty could out rival their form in that whole world.

There was about their forms undulating and aerial graces such as one would dream of for some mythical and allegorical being.

Though their faces were remarkable for their indescribable beauty, there was also a singular and dreamy earnestness in their earnestness of expression which would make all the Angelinians start when they looked at her. The shape of their heads, and the turn of their necks and bust was peculiarly noble and beautiful and impossible to be put even in pictures by painting or drawing.

And indescribable and effective was the deep spiritual gravity of their violet blue eyes, shaded by heavy fringes of golden brown which made every Angelinian Angelinian turn a nd looked back after them as they glided hither and thither among the gas camps.

"Good heavens m., what dazzling beauty!" Thought Jack Evans as they turned in another course. "They almost make my heart ache."

He noticed a look of pain on Angelina's face and said with a tone of muffled bitterness:

"Angelina darling, you are sick."

He clasped her in his arms her short hard breathing alarming him.

"You had not better ride so fast dear." He said. "You know it is bad for you."

"I felt so well Jack, and liked it so much that I forgot." She answered.

"I can almost believe what the matter is." He said laying his hand on her chest. "Hanson thinks you have consumption, from your frequent coughing but I had you examined last night by the X-ray while you were asleep. You are seriously affected from the results of your wounds two weeks ago. I was told by the doctor to take you all under my care, and I am lifting Violet for placed her on his horse. Hanson and her sisters looked at him with surprise."

"A Hercules." Thought Violet's sisters to themselves. "A powerful boy friend indeed."

"Do you know Violet I am awfully sorry that Baldwin has become your enemy and Braggard also and I fear him too on account of Angelina's illness. I know. I swear it that I know what the real matter is and if Baldwin did you little girl did die, Baldwin and Braggard though innocent would probably be blamed for it. I'm going to stay with you and make you better at all costs. But there is something I can't conceal." He added with a blush on his handsome face. "You and your sisters have trapped me with your beauty and kindness. If you were angels I could love you no better. You little girls are the loveliest little creatures that I have ever seen, and another thing if I fail to cure you I'll say that I am as bad as a liar and as the slanderer." And the boy spoke with an earnestness that flushed his handsome face. The little girls believed it with perfect simplicity without ever even a change of feature merely saying:

"We are glad that you feel so Evans, and for your kindness we will look upon you as our brother and ----"

"I see my son that you have fallen in love." Said a Voice suddenly near them. "When did they trap you?"

"Turning in surprise they saw General Evans along side of the boy. "Tell who can help it." Said Jack Evans. "No creature are as I love as them and say papa!" He said in a whisper. "Angelina has a bullet hole in her left side or in her left lung but she can be saved if treated in time. You are one of the most trusted doctors in the army."

"I see." Said General Evans. "She must be confined in the house as she is stimulated to exertions beyond her strength. That is what is making her fail rapidly. I feared this all the time though I predicted that it was consumption."

It was true. Angelina's health was decaying rapidly and also her strength for the wound had been received during the battle of Cedarline and the other doctors had not known of its location.

"Do you cough a good deal little girls?" He asked of Angelina.

"Yes when ever I run about play, or ride on my horse. I have been subjected to a cough since the fight at Cedarline two weeks ago. Hanson said that I have really consumption beyond a doubt."

"Are you shorted breathed, and so you feel weak?"

"Yes I have nervous affections once in a while."

"Do you see sweat at nights, whether cool or warm?"

"No General I do not. But one of the wounded soldiers do. Night after night his clothes will be wringing wet. There ain't never a dry thread in his night clothes and the sheets are so wet that they have to be hung up to dry."

"I knew it." He thought to himself. Here was poor Angelina with her wretched health going down gradually to the grave before the eyes of all. Angelina had been fairly prostrated the day before though on this day she seemed to feel much better.

The next day Angelina was so unwell as to be confined to the house where an operation was performed. On the day after the operation her situation was critical. Many of the Angelinians only believed she was prostrated by the terrible heat of the weather, and by the exertions she had made. The physicians had said that there was room for hope as the wound would soon heal, and that there was some thing else that had to do with her prostration now and not the wound. Even then poor Violet and her sisters had nearly cried their little eyes out for a note had been sent to Baldwin and Braggard to pity Violet and her sisters, and come and see. But a harsh refusal had been sent back.

"It is true that she has a wound in her lung but in some ways that has nothing to do with it." Said Evans, after he had made a close examination.

"Unless Baldwin comes to see her and resume his friendship she will surely die. She is pining herself to illness and death."

This was true for in a week or two there had been a great improvement before this prostration occurred, there having been a great improvement of symptoms one of those decisive lullies which heralded a heart even on the verge of the grave.

Before the prostration she had been again sitting with the soldiers, in the lanes and played with her sisters and laughed again. The doctors alone had felt no encouragement from this truck. And Angelina had felt the same certainty. She felt that Baldwin or Braggard would never as much as look at her or her sisters again and she had a calm sweet prophetic certainty that a cruel death was near and she was troubled by sorrow for those who loved her so dearly. For Angelina life was unfolding before her with sorrow and horror. Day she had only a little regret in dying if she had to go too. Her heart yearned with sad tenderness for all she was going to leave behind. Her father and sisters most of all for she had instilled instinctive or perceptive perception that she was more in his heart than any other. She loved her charming and loving mother and sisters. She felt for many fond Angelinian soldiers to whom she and her sisters were as daylight and sunshine. After a day had passed as was prostrated far worse than the day before. Children do not generally generalize about soldiers but Angelina being an uncommonly mature child witnessing months after months the hellish horror of this Glandelinian war under which hundreds upon hundreds of thousands had died in every battle, and these almost broke her thoughtful pondering heart. She had day by day vague longings to do something for the multitudes of wounded soldiers on either side to bless and save, not only the Angelinians but the unfortunate war stricken Glandelinians as well. Longings that contracted sadly with the feebleness of her little frame.

"Jack she said one day when sitting up in her bed propped up in pillows. "I can understand why Jesus wanted to die for us."

"Why Angelina dear?"

"To save our souls. When I saw those poor creatures on either side going down in such frightful numbers at Cedarline and I realized many millions of mothers may have lost their sons, wives husbands and mothers cried for their little children massacred by the Glandelinians after the great massacres, and when I saw the losses at Cedarline and Chamberline run -- oh wasn't that dreadful -- and a great many other slaughters -- I've felt that I would be glad to die if my dying could stop all this misery, but it won't. I would die for them, Jack if it would do any good."

"Said the child earnestly, laying her little thin white hand on his. Jack looked at the child with awe and before the merit Angelina found her self in the perfect embrace that she ever felt and with a strange happiness creep through her, and it strange to say was this embrace that prevented her death. The rays of the sun were coming into the room forming a kind of glory around her, as she sat up in her white night gown, with her golden hair and glowing cheeks, her eyes unnaturally bright with the happiness caused by Jack's fond embrace. Her appearance and of her sisters had impressed him suddenly and painfully, and he wiped his eyes many times. Her beauty, and that of her sisters was so intense, and yet so fragile that he could not bear to look at it. He again suddenly folded her in his arms.

"Angelina dear; you will be better soon." He said with sudden firmness as he laid his head against his shoulder.

"I've had many things, I wanted to say to you for a great while." Chimed Angelina. "I want to say them now, before I get weaker, and it is all up with me to keep it to myself any longer. The time is coming I know when I will be well I know it. I'm going then to try and see General Baldwin myself, even if I get shot for it." And she sobbed.

"Oh now my dear little Angelina." Said Jack trembling as he spoke but speaking cheerfully. "You must not indulge such reckless thoughts."

"No I don't intend to be reckless." Said Violet placing her arms around his neck and kissing him gently. "Don't deceive yourself. I'm not reckless. I know it perfectly well, and I'm going before long no matter what it costs. But you have made me happy I want to go and convince him, I long to go. I had rather be in heaven though but only for the sake of my father's army. There are a great many things here that makes me sad, but seems dreadful to me. I had rather be there, but I don't want to leave just as yet for my death would cause the ruin of the Christian army. But the sights of such a war almost break my heart."

"So that is what makes you sad and seems so dreadful." Angelina. "Yes Jack dear. The slaughter that occurs and occurs all the time. I feel sad four the wounded, they love me and this war was over. Then I would be all good and kind to me. I really do wish this war was over. Then I would be content to live and struggle hard to be a great Saint."

"Why Angelina, dear angel don't you know you are saintly now? And think Angelina; the soldiers are giving their lives for the freedom of little girls and boys like you."

"Oh but Jack you do not understand. It had made the child later conditions worse. They might be all slaughtered and then Jack think. The greatest stronghold of the landelinians in the world is their fortifications on the landelinian and your track branch river, mouth going into Wickey pay and which defends all approaches to the city of Vivian Wickey and the Mc-whirtherian pun. These positions decided the war entirely. And there are few boys like you Jack. She continued sadly: "A boy by the name of Starring gave me a fond kiss once but Oh God! God he is my enemy now. It breaks me my heart. It is the war John. He found out that I'm I'm-----" She could not go any further but broke into a passion of weeping weeping.

Jack embraced her in such a way that her weeping stopped.

"Never mind." He said pressing her chest against his and kissing her: "I know those boys well. I'll speak to them sometime when I see them again and shall. I'll convince them of their folly and win to their friendship. I'll threaten that I'll betray them. That is the only way."

"No don't do that." Said Angelina as he embraced her continually: "It might not do any good. If they only knew what I've suffered. Then we would be respected and pitied at by them. But what horrid things they do and can do when aroused. One of them shot Violet once." And she shuddered.

"My dear little Angelina, you are as sensitive as a child having sorrows all your life. I'm sorry this war has been witnessed. By you."

"Oh that is not what troubles me Jack. I'm really happy now the way you are treating me. You are making me well and saved me a lot of pain. But I cannot tell you the sad story of my life or of my sisters for it might sicken you or break your heart. But for two or probably seven or eight months and during this war I did have nothing but pain and sorrow when captured by the sin-stricken men. But it seems selfish to conceal it. But the sights I saw in this war always sink into my heart-----they go down deep. I've thought and thought about them. Jack is not there any way to make children free without such slaughter!"

"That is a difficult question even for a learned man to answer dearest. There is no doubt that this way is a very bad one, all the generals of both sides think so I do myself. And then this war would not have occurred if it had not been for general Hinnies disobedience to the king by causing the slaughter of children at Crowley. He got no orders to start a war but did so anyway, though though the battle which followed had been a landelinian victory. I heartily wish that the Child labor evil had not originated, but then I do not know what there is to be done about it now."

"Jack you are such a good boy and so noble and kind, and you have a way of saying things that is so pleasant. Couldn't you go some day and be a scout for my sake instead of a leader of such big forces and lead in the slaughters. When I am well then you will be a great help help to us and can help us warn the Christians when ever danger threatens."

"Help you what?" Cried Jack passionately: "Oh Angelina I thought you little girls were only red cross nurses. Indeed you are the best little girl on earth and so are my sisters. I would give anything if you and them were my sisters as I have no sisters at all. I had one once but she had grown and such wickedness killed her."

"My Aunt and Uncle had a little girl by the name of my sisters Violet Vivian once." Said Angelina: "And that was all they had---and yet she and Uncle had to see it die from wounds received in a tornado in Abilene before she died herself from wounds. Jack these soldiers love their children as much as you or perhaps me. Oh do something to end this war. There is general Manley and his wicked generals. They hate children no matter whether they are Christians or not. I hate even his own children and I make me cry when I think of it. And Jack I'm not telling a lie. Angels have appeared to me in my sleep and begged me to capture them from Manley to end their misery. Manley won't let them die to get to heaven and he is fighting hard to make them do something to destroy their poor souls. It is dreadful Jack that such things are happening all the time."

"There there darling." Said Jack embracing her: "Only don't distress yourself and do tell me that story and I will do anything you wish, even lay down my life for you and your dear sisters...."

"And promise me dear Jack; but you will bring Baldwin's friends back again and also Braggards. I hate to say it but it seems as if you will have to find out the real guilty party. I will surely die if he don't forgive me."

"Yes dear I will do anything in the world, anything you ask, but don't talk of dying."

"Dear Jack." Said the beautiful child laying her head against his: "How I wish we could be going around together."

"Where dearest?" Asked Jack.

"To northern Angelina. It is so sweet and peaceful there, it is all so loving there. Do you want to go?" She asked.

Jack drew her closer to him but he was silent. She noticed that she was breathing it as if she had never known suffocation. She was entirely well only pinning over Baldwin and Braggards affair was indeed the real Christian. Baldwin had never seen them since the battle had ceased or he had never seen them either to tell them not to go to his headquarters, threatening to shoot them if they did. He himself knew there was something suspicious and had ordered his troops to look out for any man who may come within the line impersonating him or Braggard."

"They are imposters." He had told them: "Spies. Treacherous spies who had come into our camp pretending they were us and so causing this unnecessary trouble with the vivian girls and ordering you to shoot them on sight if they ever came here which they no doubt believed they would. They are doing this so that when the little girls are shot they would be cut off from you and this would please Manley. But what ever you do don't shoot nobody but those imposters if they come in. Remember they resemble me and Braggard. They must not be allowed within my lines again."

And this was the reason the little girls did not go to that Man believing surely that the guard had been placed to keep them away instead. But it was not so and Baldwin would gladly go and see them and tell them the whole story if he only could get the chance but his work kept him from getting away.

"You will come with me." Continued Angelina speaking in a voice of solemn certainty which she often used unconsciously.

"To come with you or your sisters, or to be with you would be like heaven to me indeed." Said Jack: "You bet I shall come with you and I never will forget you. But how about the story?" He asked.

She did not answer and looking down he saw that she had fallen asleep. The shadows of the solemn evening closed around them deeper and deeper as Jack sat silently holding the little frail form to his bosom. He never in his life saw a happier face, and embracing her once more he placed her head on the pillow.

Two days later the daylight strength which had lapsed Angelina up for a little while was fast becoming a reality though seldom and more seldom her light foot step was heard on the verandas of the headquarters. Even she was found reclining on a little lounge by the open window her large deep blue eyes fixed on the rising and falling waters of the beautiful lake. It was toward the afternoon as she was so reclining her little half open, her little t'ran parent fingers lying listlessly between the leaves when suddenly the tremendous boom of cannon broke loose far in the distance. In a moment she was off from the lounge and on the veranda. Jack Evans came up on his horse ten minutes later.

"Baldwin had come upon the divisions that had captured his brigade." He said: "I will be all over in a minute I guess and I might be a happy occurrence for he had retaken many whom the enemy had captured and a lot of prisoners also. The retaken Angelinians might know the truth about their misfortunes. And here is a big bunch of roses."

"Oh how can I thank you." Said Angelina. "How did you know that I liked flowers?" She asked as he handed them to her.

"And it is a beautiful bouquet." She said before he could answer her question: "You arranged them very pretty and you gave them to me. Oh Jack dear I love you." She said with a sudden burst of feeling and laying her little thin white hand on Jack's arm. "I love you, I love you, and only wish that Dear Jesus had you born to me a brother. I am still very unwell, but I think it shall be a great while before I'll recover entirely. But it grieves me still when I think of Baldwin. I only wish you were my brother, though you are kinder to me than any of my little brothers had been. It's only a little while, then I shall be well again."

"Angelina's keen round eyes were overcast with tears, large bright drops rolled heavily down one by one and fell on Violet. Angelina's little white hands. V Angelina laid her head against Jack's breast and soothed the beautiful child looking to him like the picture of some bright angel trying to reclaim a sinner. In that moment a regular ray of heavenly love had penetrated Jack's heart and he hugged her as closely as he could.

At that moment general Hanson appeared.

"Uncle." Said Angelina: "I want to have some of my hair cut off a good deal of it."

Angelina had laid on the couch by this time Evans standing up and saluting.

"That's that." Said Hanson.

"The child half rose from the pillows he came in and shaking down her long golden curls really much too long already being three feet in length. Said rather playfully: "Come uncle shear the sheep. That is I just want you to cut off some of my hair. There is too much of it and it makes my head hot. Besides I want to give some of it away. Jack you can do it I know."

"Yes Jack you had better do it because I haven't the time." Said Hanson: "N But don't spoil the locks of it. Cut underneath where it won't show."

"Oh uncle." Said Angelina sadly.

"Yes and I want them kept handsome against the time the war ends."

"I might not live till then uncle. I will go to heaven. Oh do believe me please. Don't you realize that some day I might be killed?"

"Why do you insist that I should believe such a cruel thing. Angelina?"

"Only because it is true. Uncle, and I might happen to one of my sisters or even to you or papa too. And if you will believe it now you will get to feel about it as I do."

Hanson closed his lips and stood grimly eyeing the beautiful long curls which he they were separated from the main length of the hair down over her shoulders about a foot or more were laid one by one in her lap. She raised them up to her ears and at them twisted them around her thin fingers and looked from time to time at general Hanson.

"It is just as I have been forbidding," said one of her sisters coming in. "It is just what has been prying on my health from day to day bringing me and my sisters down to the grave though Baldwin care not for we met him and he cursed us severely. I have seen this long Uncle. You will see after a while that I was right."

"Which will afford you great consolation no doubt," said Hanson in a dry titter tone. Then Jennie who it was said back on a lounge and covered her face with her handkerchief. Angelina's clear blue eyes looked earnestly from one to another. It was a calm comprehending gaze of a small half-bred from the earthly bonds. It was evident she saw, felt and appreciated the difference between the two.

She beckoned with her hand to her father who had just now came in and he came and sat down by her.

"Papa my strength is fading away again and I fear I must go for Baldwin might not learn the truth in time. There are some things that I wanted to say and do that I ought to do, and you must be willing to have me speak a word or two on this subject. It must come there is no putting it off. Do be willing papa that I should speak now please."

"My dear little girl I am willing," said general Vivian covering his eyes with one hand and holding up Angelina's hand with the other.

"Then I want to see all the generals together who can cause me and my sisters by my bed. I have something I must say to them," said Angelina.

Hanson dispatched a messenger and soon a large number of officers were there including general Vivian and the other little Vivian girls. Angelina lay back on her pillows, her hair hanging loosely about her face her crimson face contrasted painfully with the intense whiteness of her complexion and the thin contour of her limbs and features and her large soul like eyes fixed earnestly on everyone. All the great christian generals present were struck with a sudden emotion, for the spiritual face, the locks of hair cut off and lying by her; her father and uncles averted face and the sole of her poor sisters struck at once upon the feelings of a sensitive and impressive race of Angelina and the generals looked at one another, many sighed and others shook their heads sadly and most full mournfully. There was a deep silence like that of the grave. Angelina raised herself and looked long and earnestly round at every one. All of the generals present were struck with a sudden emotion, the spiritual face the long locks of hair, cut off made a sudden sight than ever. All looked sad and apprehensive; many of the officers hiding their faces in their hands.

"I send for you all my dear friends," said Angelina. "Because I love you christian soldiers as if you were my own fathers. I love you all even Baldwin and Baldwin though they have turned out to be as my enemy, and I have some things to say to you which I want you generals to remember always. I do fear that I'm going to leave you far in a few more hours probably you will see me no more."

Here Angelina was interrupted by a sudden burst of groans sobs and lamentations which broke from all present and in which her slender voice was lost entirely. She waited a moment and then speaking in a tone that checked the sobs of all she continued:

"If you love me you must not interrupt me so. Listen to what I want to speak to you. I want to speak to you about your souls. Some of you generals I'm afraid from recent actions are very careless. You are all in danger for you all know that there is death in war and most of you I think are thinking mostly of this world. I want you generals to remember that there is a beautiful world where Jesus is. I may go there and you can go there. It is for you as much as it is for me. But if you want to go there you general officers must stop living idle careless, thoughtless lives. You must be more perfect christians than you are now and you must remember that each one of you can become saints and be saints forever. If you want to be perfect christians, Jesus will help you. You must pray to him, you must read the bible-----" The child checked herself looked pitifully at them and said sorrowfully:

"Oh dear if you could only get Baldwin to come and see me. And she hid her face in her pillow and sobbed as if her heart would break, while many a mother and sob came from those who were addressing who were kneeling on the floor around her. "Nevermind," she said raising her head or her face and smiling brightly through her tears. I have prayed to Jesus to turn Baldwin back to his love for me and my sisters and have also prayed for you, and I know Jesus will help you. Try to do all the best you can, pray every day, ask him to help you, read the bible whenever you can and I think I shall see you all in heaven."

"AMEN" was the murmured response from the lips of Hanson and general Vivian, and some of the others. The other generals were completely overcome and were nothing with their head bowed upon their knees.

"I know," said Angelina. "You all love me and my sisters!"

"Yes oh yes indeed we do," was the involuntary response of all the general officers.

"Yes I know you do. There is not one of you who had has not been kind to me or my sisters and I want to give you something that when you look at; you shall always remember me. I'm going to give all of you a curl of my hair and when you look at it think that I love you and when I am gone to heaven, and that I want to see you all there."

It was utterly utterly impossible to describe the scene, the heartrending scene as with tears and sobs and lamentations they gathered around the little creature and took from her hands what seemed to them the last mark of her love. They fell on their knees, they sobbed and prayed, and kissed the hem of her garment and the elder ones poured forth words of endeavorment in prayer and blessings. As each one took their gift general Hanson and Vivian who was apprehensive for the effects of all this excitement on the little one, signed to each one to pass quietly out of the apartment. At last all were gone but her sisters.

"Here Jennie is a beautiful one for you. Oh how so happy Jennie to think I shall see you in heaven, for I am sure; shall, and Violet my dear kind violet!" she said fondly throwing her arms around her. "I know you shall be there to do."

"Oh dear Angelina I don't see how we can live without you," said Violet. "It's just like taking everything off the place at once." And Violet gave way to a piteous passion of grief. Jennie suddenly with a wild and bitter cry threw her self on the floor along side the bed and wept and moaned aloud. Hanson tried to raise and silence her but in vain.

"Oh Angelina, Oh Angelina I wish I was dying too----- I do."

There was a piercing wail in the cry, the lid of rushing into Hanson's white marble like face and the first stem tears he had shed since the death of his wife and daughter, streamed from his eyes.

"Get up Jennie, dear Angelina might might live," said Jack Evans Evans. "I'll try and get Baldwin myself."

"But he won't come to see her," said Jennie. "He said he would never come and see her." And she wept in terrible lamentations. They all stood for a moment in silence.

"She loves me she loves me she loves me," screamed Jennie. "Oh dear, oh dear! There ain't nobody left now. This is killing me."

"Evans go fetch Baldwin," said Hanson. "Tell him if he don't come he will be guilty of a crime and the curses of God will be down upon him. And hurry."

Then turning to general Vivian he said:

"See if you can comfort Jennie, poor thing."

"I just wish I had never been born," said Jennie. "Life is no use to me now. Oh dear!"

That was all for Jennie swooned. The statuettes and pictures in Angelina's room were shrouded in white shawls and only hushed breathings and sobs and footfalls were heard there, and the light stole in dimly, through windows partially darkened by closed blinds and shades. The bed was draped in white and there beneath two little drooping angel winged figures lay a little sleeping form. There she lay robed in one of the simplest white dresses, the rose colored light through the curtains casting over the beautiful child a warm glow. Her little eyes looked drooped softly on the purple check, the head was turned a little to one side but there was diffused over every lineament of the face a celestial expression of sleep and repose which showed that she was having some beautiful dream. There is no such death, as thou dear Angelina.

"There is no death to such as thou dear Angelina, neither darkness or shadow of death, only such a bright fading, and when the morning star fades in the golden dawn."

So did general Vivian think as with folded arms he stood there gazing. Ah who shall say what the sorrow stricken general did think from the hour that voices had said:

"She is going."

It had all been a dreamy mist a heavy dimness of anguish. There were many flowers on the shelves, all white delicate and fragrant, with graceful drooping leaves. Angelina's beautiful horse horses were with white bore on its back a wreath of flowers. The folds of the drapery, the fall of the curtains had been arranged and rearranged with that delicacy of eye which characterizes their race.

Jennie now advanced with a basket of flowers, placing in Ange line Angelina's hand a fair fair cape jasmine and with admirable taste disposed the other flowers around the bed. General Vivian already realized that he could see the funeral and burial. He imagined that after another, stole in to look at the dead and then came the little coffin, and there was a funeral and carriages drove to the door, and strangers came and were seated and they wore white scarves and ribbons and crapes bands, and in manners dressed in black crapes, and there was a mass and prayers uttered. Then he imagined that he saw the child, that golden head in the coffin, and then he saw the child spread out on the

588

"No," said Angelino, laying her hand in his.

"No," said Angelina, laying her hand on his.

He gave a sudden start and shiver but gave no answer.

'Don't know,' said ANG81400.

"I cannot," said general Avian rising; "I cannot have it so. Oh dear God do not deal so bitterly with me."

He realized that God had always a right to do what he will with his own. Yet id he did not make it any easier to bear and he wept like a child.

It did not make it any easier to hear and he wept like a child.
 "Hush you break my heart," said Angelina, rising and throwing herself in his arms. You must not be so." And Angelina wept with a violence that alarmed them all, and turned Her father's thoughts at once to something else.

all, and turned her father's thoughts at once to something else.
"I hope there's--dearest--hush-----hush----- don't distress yourself about me and I will be resigned."

Angeline soon lay like a bearded one down her father's arms and he bending over her but another day and by every word of tenderness he could think of. Her sisters were leaving, and Jo once having come to herself was in weeping like a heart broken child.

broken child.

"You do did not give me a curl Angeline." "But her father smiling and saying, 'They are all your's papa.' "She said smiling," "All your's and Uncles, and you must give mama and munity as many as she want's. I only gave them to you, poor officers because by then they will remember me when I am gone," it might pain them," "Remember."

At that hour Angelina seemed unusually bright and cheerful and sat leaning in her bed and looked over all her little trinkets and precious things and designed the friends to whom she would have them given and her manner was more animated and her voice more natural than they had known it since she had been severely wounded during the frightful damage at Cend Cedernine. There was a ...

But at midnight, strange music hour the crisis arrived. There was a loud sound in that chamber first of one who stopped quickly. It was HANSEN, and general yaman who had resolved to sit up all night with their little daughter who at the turn of the night had pronounced what experienced doctors call "A change."

They went back to the room in an instant and bent over Angelina who still slept. What was the fact that these two grief-stricken generals saw that made their hearts stand still. Why was no word spoken between the two greatest Christian generals? Thou canst say who has seen that same expression on the face dearest to thee that looked indescribably ethereally upon the face of the child however thou that thy beloved is no longer there. On the face of the child however there is no ghostly imprint only a high and almost sublime sublime expression. Was it the glowing presence of spirit and nature, the dawning of immortal life in that pure childish soul? The two generals stood there as still gazing upon her that even the ticking of their watches seemed to loud. In a few moments the doctor came, looked around and silent as the rest.

came gave one look and stood as silent as the rest.
'When I did this change take place.' A He asked in a w whisper to general vician.

"About the turn of the night." Was the reply.

June and her other sisters aroused by the entrance of the doctor appeared alarmed. "We di don't make no noise," said Hannah; "The fo crimin is ariving. She is a wicked life and death."

through the glass doors but generals Hanson or Vivin Vivian said or heard although I only saw the look on the face of the little sleeper.

nothing but only saw the look on the face of the little sleeper.
'Oh if she would only awaken and speak once more.' 'Said general vixen and stooping over her in he spoke in her ear.

The large blue eyes unfocused, a smile passed over her face, she tried to raise her head and to speak.

'Do you know me Angelina dear dear. Her papa said.

The child with a last effort arose throwing her arms around his neck. In a moment they dropped again and as the two generals raised their heads they saw a frightful scene of mortal agony pass over her face. She struggled practically, pitifully for air, and threw up her little hands.

"Oh God this is dreadful. He said turning away in agony and wringing Hanson's hand scarce conscious what he was doing. Oh Hanson my brother its killing me. Pray that this might be cut short. This wrings my heart,"

"OH Peter the Lord it is I over dear brother." Said Hanson; "Look at her."

The little girl lay panting on her pillows like one recovering from suffocation. The large violet eyes rolled up and fixed. Ah what said those eyes that spoke so much of joy or heaven where earthly pains were past. They all pressed around her in heartless stillness.

'Angeline,' said general wivian : 'Speak to me.'
'Oh this is killing me,' wailed roche.

"Oh this is killing me," Wailed roles.
She did not hear.
"Oh my poor Angelina I would give anything I have if Angelina is spared dear and," Cried General Tatham.

ed over Angelines face and gave one high and soft into a snoring, ly deep sleep. "Hush! Beloved Angelina," cried general ivian as the doctor leaked over her closely; "The bright eternal doors have closed after thee, we shall see - thy face no more. Oh woe to them who watched thy entrance into heaven; when the shall wake and find only the cold gray sky & daily life, and thou gone forever.

General ivian sat pale and quiet holding before his eyes Angelina's little upon his though seeing no letter or word of what was in it, or at least really holding it upside down. And there was more sorrow to general ivian than there was in all the lamentations from the grief stricken men who were at her bedside though he did not show it. General ivian fancied that the bright beautiful face of Angelina with her golden hair was looking out upon him out of the wall. He felt a sleep. And dreamed he saw her coming bounding toward him just as she used to come with a wreath of jessamines in her hair, her cheeks her eyes radiant with delight & light but as he looked she seemed to rise from the ground, her cheeks were a pale hue; her eyes had a deep divine radiance, a golden halo seemed around her head and she vanished from his sight. The golden mist had wandered away from around her head and she vanished from his sight.

During that sad eventful night porAngelina sisters had wandered away from the lines in their sorrow and before they had known it clandestine soldiers led by Sabarring and his companions at once seized the little girls. The young girls were hurried by the clandestine warriors to a large ruined house to be sold to child labor concerns. No one could conjure any villainage much horrors of a such a slave house.

This place was a real obscure den. A horrid Tartarus informis ignominia um tamen dampnatum habebat.

And yet the sisters were attacked

Late in the afternoon Angelina or rather, Violet and her sisters were attacked and sent to the depot to await a general auction on the following morning. They were weeping with a deadly sickness at their hearts the little girl remembered how a certain man had looked at their hands and lifted up their curly hair and pressed them first to his forehead, then to his lips. He said they were beautiful. The girls would sell to a lot of shame but they had no hope now, no protection. The place was full of landowners who could help them, poor little girls.

linda would buy them or either one of them and probably become owners of them body and as would soul. The little girls had no resort but to pray, and many such prayers to God had come up from many child labor prisons, prayers which God had not forgotten as a coming day will show for it is written:

.. Who' no overcometh one of the little onesharm in any way, it were better for him that a mill stone be hanged about his neck and that he be drowned in the depths of the sea. . .

Keep on poor children. The night is short and the morning may part you - for ever. A few minutes before the virian girls were and a short broad muscular man in heavy green uniform elbowed his way through the crowd of clandestines, and coming up to the little girls began examining them systematically. From the moment that the litt le girls saw him approaching they felt an immediate and revolting horror at him that increased as he came up to them. He was evidently though short and only less than five feet tall of gigantic strength. He had a bullet shaped head, large glass glowing black eyes with their shaggy black eye eyebrows and a stiff wiry ink black hair and his large boars coarse mouth was stuffed with tobacco the juice of which from time to time he ejected from him with great violence and explosive force. His hairy hands were large, sunburned and freckled and very dirty and garnished with long finger nails in a very foul condition.

This man of demonic nature proceeded to a very free personal examination of the little girls. He seized Jennifer by the jaw and pulled her mouth to inspect her teeth, made her stand up by the elbows to show her muscles, turned her around and made her jump and air spring to show her legs. Then he spit a discharge of rabid juice in her face and giving a contemptuous "UH-HUH!"

He examined Violet. He put out his heavy dirty hand and drew the girl to him, passing it over her neck and fast felt her arms, looked at her teeth and then pushed her back against roses whose patient sweet face showed the suffering she had been growing through at every motion of the heinous landelinians.

Joint and hand.

Violet was heartbroken and began to cry.

"Stop that you girl," said the landeliniian, "a whispering here."

Joice was also examined but the heinous to lips picked out Jennie. She was pushed from the back, the short bullet headed man seizing her roughly by the shoulders despite her screams and passions of wailing pushing her to the side saying in a demoniac voice:

"Stand there you gutter-snipe!"

"Still the bidding went on rattling clattering. Down went the hammer again. Joice was told. She was forced down from the block, stood looking wistfully back. Jennie stretched her hands toward her. She looked with agony at Jennie. Violet was forced upon the block and looked around her with a glance that broke Jennie's heart. The little girl was parted probably forever! Never was there such weeping. And never had such a thing occurred to them before but now happy it turned out in the end which Evans came to their rescue as well will soon read.

GREATER BONDAGE, YET, AND THE CRUELTY OF HINDAL ST CLARE CALISE AND OTHER LANDELINIANS GENERAL AL AND SO ON TO THE END OF HONORS.

On the 1 war part of a small mean car Jennie sat chained on her wrists and a weight heavier than chains lay on her heart. All signs of happiness had faded from her. Her sisters who would probably never see again, the golden head of little Anselme with its Saint-like eyes. Having got Jen to and eight other child slaves on board one of the cars of a slave train the landeliniian came around with that air of efficiency which was characteristic of him to take a review of her. Stopping opposite to Jennie he briefly expressed her as follows:

"STAND UP."

Jennie did so with a wistful look.

"TAK OFF THAT STUFF."

And as Jennie unbuttoned by her fingers proceeded to do it, he assisted her by pulling it with his gentle hands from her neck and putting it in his pocket. The landeliniian now turned for a trunk and taking from it a pair of girls ragged clothes he said liberating Jennie's hands from the hand cuffs and pointing to a recess in the box:

"You go there and put these on."

Poor Jennie obeyed and in a few minutes minutes returned.

"Take off you r show n," said the landeliniian. Whose name was General

Augustine St. Clare.

Jennie did so.

Then he said the landeliniian, throwing her back a pair of even coarser shoes such as were common among child slaves:

"Put these on."

In her hurried exchange Jennie had not forgotten to transfer her cherished bible to her pocket. It was well she did so for St. Clare having refitted Jennie's hands cuffs proceeded deliberately to investigate the contents of her pockets. He drew out a walk handkerchief, and put it into his own pocket. Several little trinkets which Jen to had treasured as presents from poor dying Angeline the rascal looked upon with a contemptuous grunt, and tossed them over his shoulder into the river.

Jennie had fortunately not forgotten to Anselme's curl of hair but her cat's paw which in her hurry she had forgotten, the landeliniian turned up and held over.

"Humph! Pious to be sure," he snarled; "So what ever your name is you be long to the Catholics eh? Well my dear little girl, I'll soon have that out of you if I myself die for it. I'll have none of your bawling praying and sighing around my place. So remember now mind yourself." He said with a stamp of his foot and a fierce glance of his eyes directed at Jennie; "I'm your church now. You understand. You have got to do and be as I say."

Something within the silent little angel answered. "MN O," and as if repeated by an invisible voice came the words of an old prophetic scroll as Angeline had after read to her:

"Fear not for I have redeemed thee. I have called thee by my name. Thou art mine."

But Augustine St. Clare heard no word or voice. That voice probably Angeline's was one that he would never hear. He only glared for a moment on Jennie's wistful face.

"Now little girl take mighty good care of these clothes. They are better than what you had on and it will be long enough before you will get any on more. I go in for making slaves careful of their clothes. One suit had to do for three years on my place."

He then chained her to another woman and the involuntary look of horror and fright and aversion which which Jen to regarded him did not escape his eye. He frowned fiercely.

"None of your pouts or wistful looks, girl. You've got to keep pleasant face when I'm speaking to you, do you hear? I say all of you slaves." He said retreating a pace backwards; "Look at me-----look at me-----look me right in the eye please,-----straight now." Said he stamping his foot.

At every pause, and by a fascination every eye except Jen to's was directed to the glaring blackish eyes of St. Clare.

"Now," he said doubling his great heavy fist, into something resembling a blacksmith's hammer:

"Do you see this fist? Lift it." He then added bringing it down on Jennie's head with no gentleness. "Look at it I say ye little devil and defy me not." Look at these bones. Well I tell you this fist as has got as hard as iron knocking down slaves. And I never seen this man yet I should not bring down with one crack, no matter how strong he is." Said the landeliniian bringing his fist down so near Jennie's face that she winked and drew back.

"And I don't keep none of you men prisoners for everness either, for I do my own overhauling, and I tell you things is seen too. Every one of you has got to toe the mark. I tell you quick straight to the moment - speak. That is the way to keep in wit with me, and you won't find no soft spot in me nowhere. So now mind yourselves for I don't know no mercy."

He women and children involuntarily drew in their breath and the whole gang sat with down cast dejected faces. Jennie was crying as if her heart would break, for her sisters who were separated so cruelly. St. Clare turned on his heel, and went to the engineer's tell him to go ahead.

This indeed my dear readers was enough to try the faith of the firmest Christians to find themselves abandoned apparently of God in the grasp of the ruthless violence of the war stricken landeliniians. How much more danger there was in shaking the faith of Christ's poor little ones weak in knowledge, knowledge, and tender in years. The train now moved on slowly frightened with its weight of sorrow through abrupt tortuous windings, and sad eyes gazed wearily in on the steep gray banks as they glided by, in dreary sameness. Aboard the train itopped after running swiftly for several hours at a small town and St. Clare with his party disembarked. About an hour after Jennie was wearily trailing along behind a rude wagon and over a ruddy ground. In the wagon was seated St. Clare and other slaves still fettered together they being stowed away with some baggage in the back part of it, and the road was a wild and forsaken one at that, now ending through dreary pines, barrens where the winds whistled mournfully, and now over log on causeways, through long swamps the doleful triplic price of the forest trees rising out of slimy spongy ground hanging with low wreaths of dusky funeral black moss while over and above the loathsome form of the dead or maddened could be seen sliding among broken stumps and shattered branches that lay here and there rotting in the water. It was disconsolate enough for a stranger with a well filled pocket, and well appointed horse threading the lonely way on some errand, but wilder drearier to the man entrained, when every weary step bears farther from all that man loves and prays for.

So one would have thought that witnessed the sullen and dejected depression on those sad faces, the wistful patient countenance which with which these and eyes of the child captives rested on object after object with awe and terror, that passed them in their sad journey.

In a few hours a large city of tents appeared these were soon passed amid thousands of swarms of landeliniians seeming to never end with the city of tents appeared in sight the slave houses rising to view farther off to the rear of the one always line. This place was like a hell upon earth. Dotted here and there were fens of trowed tangled tall grass with horse posts set up here and there, where the turf was stamped away and the ground littered with broken pails, cobs of corn, and many other sloven remains. No kind of flower grew anywhere, and what was once a large garden was now a lot for the dead animals or children.

The scavengery had no window washed, and on the mouldering shelves were the remains of dead children.

The wagon too rolled up a gravel walk. The main house itself looked desolate and uncomfortable. It had a high and wide veranda of two stories running around to every part of the house. With every outer door opened, the lower being supported by brick pillars. Most of the windows were stopped up with boards, many had shattered panes, and shutters hanging by a single hinge, all toiling the coarse neglect and discomfort.

Bits of board straw, old decayed barrels and boxes garnished the ground, in every direction, and wherever sight fell looking ahead, including fifteen blackheads reared by the sound of the wagon wheels came tearing out with a hell of barking and snarling, and were with the greatest difficulty restrained from laying

And even my best friends have forsaken me." She cried pitifully "And has broken my heart. Oh will I never see my poor sisters or father or mamma any more. Oh why were we taken from each other in such a cruel way! Oh Please Dear God."-----she d could get no further but cried in a way that alarmed the Gladiolinnian.

The six hundred child slaves were standing in a long row Jennie at the head and the wistful looks in their faces were beyond description. Five or six overseers stood near them armed with ugly looking cat-o'-nails and whips. Most of the children were frightened all of them having been lined up for inspection. The day that the children were started to work was on a Sunday. All of them loved Jennie being placed over them. He had ordered her to slap each and every and she had seen the stems of blood come from their nose and ears.

To torment her poor sisters all the more the landlady had put pepper in their open wounds. Their hands or arms had been free, but little good it did for they had tried in vain to tear away that crushing grip; but the rasals had only increased the cruel choking. They had been helpless in the power of such cruel men. They had beat at the face of the rasals; but to no purpose and at last their arms had hung down and though they had faintly the landlady had thought that they were dead. What had prevented the rasals from ripping them open to dismember had forgotten, but the brutal finger marks had been on their throat from for a long while even months and they had suffered a sore throat from

For a time general Vivian stood looking at them. Angelina and the boys sensed a of his presence, stood still while one of the Angelinians guards still remaining, and he looked indignantly at the three boys.

"Goodness, there ain't such things as truth in those lads," said the guards. "If I had Ben Baldwin I would have them scourged for causing the capture and selling of Angelina's sisters. I would scourge them boys untill untill the blood would run. I would. I would let them catch it."

"No, No Butch," said Angelina which an air of demand which a child of her kind could assume at times. "You must not ask so Butch. I won't, I can't bear to hear it."

"Upstairs Miss Vivian you are so good. You don't know anything how to get along with bad boys. There is no way but to cut them up and send--"

"Butch," said Angelina. "Hush. B Don't you say another word of the sort again!" And the eyes of the human angel flashed, and her cheek deepened its color.

The guard was not cowed and answered: "There is nothing in this world that can make me say different about those boys not even you or your sisters. I'm defending you name, and if you speak to me like that again I'll have the boys taken out of here."

Poor Angelina looked sadly at the boys. To the sinful lads the little girl indeed had heartrending beauty. He could hardly bear to look upon her and neither could the other two boys. She was indeed a fair high bred child, with her golden head, her deep blue eyes, her spiritual noble broad angelic like movements. Thoughts struggled through Angelina's mind, thoughts which were neither dim, and in Angelina's nature many such were yearning yearning, and working for which she had no power of utterance.

When the guard had so expatiated on the naughty wicked conduct of the three Glendelinian lads, Angelina had looked perplexed and sorrowful but said sweetly: "Poor Starring and your camp companions. Why need ye you be so wicked."

"I heard me and my sisters because we are Angelinians." "I would rather die than have you three boys lose your soul, and yet you have committed a great sin against Starring. And yet I forgive you and rebuke the guard for what he said."

It was really indeed the first words of kindness the three lads had ever heard in their lives, and the sweet tone and manner struck strangely on their wild rude hearts of the three sinners and the sparkle of something like a tear shone in Angelina's clear round glittering eyes.

"Why are you so bad Starring?" She said: "Why you you three boys try to be good. Don't you love nobody."

"Don't know nothing about love for Angelinians," said Fredrick rather hotly. "It is our duty to imprison enemies of Glendelinia."

"But you loved your parents."

"Never had none here that I know of. I was an orphan. I tell you that Miss Angelina," said Fredrick.

"Oh I know," said Angelina; sadly: "But mah maybe you have brothers, sisters or an aunt or an--"

"No none of them. Never had nobody but bitter enemies."

"But Fredrick if you and your companions would only try to be good, you might get a permit from my father to lead a part of my armies of boyscouts. I'd ask him and--"

"There ain't nobody no matter how they impress me would could make me be a traitor to my country. Snapped the three boys together: "Besides we have all we can do ourselves now in Glendelinia. And this being my prisoner. I'll never forgive the Ange Indians for. They have made me--"

"But the man will forgive you, love you boys if you are good. Baldwin would love and forgive you if you were good."

The boys gave a blunt short laugh.

"Don't you think so?" Asked Angelina, tears coming to her eyes as she realized that their hearts were probably hardened beyond hope against her and her sisters.

"No general Baldwin can't hear our presence after what I did to your sisters and neither can your father. If the world now sooner have a loud tough then. And I don't care anyway I would sooner have them enemies than friends. As I could never be their friends now and never will," said Starring, and he scowled frightfully.

"Oh Starring you a poor boy. I love you all," said Angelina, with the same sudden burst of feeling Jack Evans had to her, and she tried to throw her fair arms about her his neck but he slowly drew them off. "But don't you love me. She pleaded. Can't you open your hardened heart. I loved you and your companions despite your recent persecution and after all this sorrow you have caused me by taking my sisters away from me. You haven't any father mother sisters or relations and yet have been a poor abused boy. If you had not caused the capture of my sisters the Angelinians would not done to you as they have done. I can't help it. I love you boys and I want to you to be good. I have been very ill for twenty four days and I believed I would not have a great while to live, but you see I did not die. Yet it really grieves me to see that you have committed such a horrible crime by causing such sorrow to my sisters. I wish you boys even if you will still fight on the side of the Glendelinians try to be good for my sakes. It will only be a little while when I'll be able to be carried around, and then I'll let each of you boys say me for kindness and love. Please repent for my sakes."

Poor Angelina's eyes were overcast with tears. Many large tears or bright drops rolled down and fell on Starring's cheek. Yet in that moment a ray of heavenly love had penetrated the darkness of their sinful souls. Suddenly Starring had her in his arms laying his head against hers and wept and sobbed while the beautiful child with her fair arms around his neck also wept.

General Vivian could not stand the sight and went out hastily.

"Poor Starring," said Angelina. "Don't you know that dear Jesus loves sinners just as much as he loves the good. He is just as willing to love you these boys as me. He loves you just as I do only more because he is better. Pray to him and I know that he will surely help you to be good and when in case you die in one of the fights, you boys can go to heaven, at last.... You then will be Saints forever. Only think of it boys. If you were to be killed in one of the fights these horrible battles and be in that state of mortal sin, what an awful account you would have to give. Just think he die for us, to save our souls. My sisters have suffered horribly way before the war and during the war, as we had been captives many times even before this great struggle ever started and even when we were only four years old. They treated us with a cruelty they could think of but poor Jesus suffered more in a day than we did all our lives, and see the repay he gets, while we us little girls are locked upon as the greatest Angelinian heroines and loved by all. The fairest of all nations. Glendelinia had turned their backs on him. If you would only be good little boys you would be a three of those bright immortal souls. It makes no difference what side you fight on, for you have a perfect right to do so but just the same be good."

"Oh dear little Angelina, dear little Angelina I will try I will try. I never did care about it before," said Starring.

One day later after this scene the Christians continued their advance and even after his Angelina's room in the new headquarters when the Christian lines halted was avowedly sick room. General Hanson himself smiled. He alone was ignorant of the disappearance of Violet and her other sisters. Sweet fragrant breezes as if from the heavenly shores came into Angelina's bedroom and death which had been approaching that dead night had been failed and held at bay. The child felt no more pain now but the awful weakness remained.

Angelina was so beautiful, so truthful, so loving that one could not resist the soothing influence of that air of innocence and peace which seemed to breathe around her.

Jack Evans was such in Angelina's room. Poor Angelina suffered a great deal from nervous restlessness and it was a relief to her to be carried and it was Jack's greatest delight to carry her little frail form in his strong arms resting on a pillow, now up and now down her room now out in the verandas of general Vivian's new headquarters and when the fresh breeze blew from the direction of the great sea and the child felt freest in the morning he would sometimes walk with her under the tall apple trees in the lanes, or sitting down on some of their old seats and sing to a her all the Catholic hymns he knew.

General Vivian often did the same thing, but he always was on duty somewhere, and when he prepared to go Angelina would say to him: "Oh papa, let Jack take me. Poor fellow it pleases him and you know it is all he can do now and he wants to do something."

"So do I Angelina dear," said her father.

"Well papa you can do everything to me. You read the bible to me, you sit up nights, and Jack has only this one thing, and his singing and I know too he does it easier than you can. He carries me so strong."

Angelina's recovery sprang joy and in thanksgiving throughout the Christian armies. But inwardly sorrow beyond describing was tearing at Angelina's heart.

She was yearning for her sisters and Evans once finding her reclined on her lounge noticed that she had been weeping. How pretty pretty she looked with the wreathes of flowers upon her head. He knelt beside her and soon he was carrying her outside into the lane and there he sat with her lying beside him.

"You are not happy," he said woefully: "Praying for your sisters?"

"These words tore at her heart and she again cried bitterly: "Don't, Don't." He said wiping tears away from his own eyes: "I heard what general Baldwin said about them. He told several of his men that he is going to find your sisters and even the imposters of himself and bragged if he dies for it in the bargain. So don't weep poor Angelina. Baldwin will do what he said."

These words stopped Angelina. Angelina's passion of weeping, but did not cheer her in the least. At this moment there was the sound of horses hoofs and general Baldwin came riding up. He did not see the two until he had almost ridden them down. Then a hundred men appeared after him.

Baldwin reined in his horse and turning upon Evans suddenly said to him: "You haven't seen a man with my locks and uniform on. I'm looking for him! He has carried off my plans."

At first Evans was startled for just a few moments ago general Baldwin or what appeared like him had just past them.

"The one you are looking for is gone now," said Evans. "He phoned here half an hour ago."

Baldwin dismounted and knelt next to Ange line. "I am sorry that all this had to occur to you and your sisters and it makes me angry to think of it," he said with tears in his own eyes. "I didn't believe that all this would have occurred to you in the first place. And Angelina you really are like some Evangelist, especially after all that you suffered. After all the trouble those lads had caused you, you have got forgiven them, and even made them sorry for their sins. Would you forgive Braggard and the one who impersonates me also?"

Angelina could not answer but the look in her eyes told him that the two rascals had already been forgiven.

"I could never be so mean as to resent it no matter how I feel about it," she said. "I forgive them with all my heart, and will forget it, only if my sisters will be found. Will you try and find them Baldwin. I don't think I'll ever get better unless you do."

"There is no need to find them," said Baldwin. "They are already found, that is their prisons are discovered, but what I or my men who spied around there have seen we will keep from you, as you cannot stand it if we tell you. But I'll get them back all right, even at the risk of my life. They are in the prison tents near Macdonalds close to Evangeline St. Clare, for the Starring and captives told me so, and that enabled me to find their location. I wish to get them, and if I fail those boys will be put to death for it. General Vivian won't have a no merit, and only three days more is given to find or recover them too."

"Where are they?" asked Angelina. "Could you not get papa to reach them again and send them to me?"

"Well I can bring them as they are in my possession," said Baldwin. "But I don't believe they would care to see you just now. They say that they still hate you despite your misery of mercifulness, or despite their temporary repentance and love which you had drawn from them two days ago. They say that they cannot love enemies of Glandelinian no matter who they are, and unless you and your sisters leave the army they will never resort to your wishes."

"We will force them then," said Evans bitterly. "They have got to come. Angelina won't eat them."

Baldwin sent several of the men to bring the three Glandelinian boyscots. Some time passed but at length they came sulking and scowling.

They were brought over to Angelina who looked more pleadingly at them than the day before. Frederick was sulking in a manner that would have cowed a man, but Angelina was not even shy of him.

"Where are my sisters? What did you do to them?" she asked reproachfully and with heavy sobs. "How could you be so cruel and wicked, even after I was so forgiving, and even embraced you three like if you were my brothers?"

"Cruel and wicked!" said Frederick, with the look of a demon. "Say if I had-----"

"Shut up such talk," stormed Baldwin. "What did you do with those little girls. If they are not returned within three days you will be crucified." He said.

"You have incurred terrible anger of general Hanson and Vivian and they will have no mercy on you though children as you are. Where are the little girls? Tell up quick."

"Your excellency general Baldwin," said Frederick. "You rave like a maddened bull. You cannot stare me by your voice of a lion and what is more the three of us dare you to approach us and we will kill you where you stand in spite of your dirty Christian dogs behind you. As for your dirty hounds of a general Vivian and Hanson we defy them to crucify us. They cannot crucify a fly compared to us if they try anything. Say one more word to us and we will kill you. It is none of your business where we put the Christian snipers."

Baldwin was infuriated by this but a look from Angelina curbed his passion, he realizing that the lads were not to be trifled with.

Frederick was not in the least cowed and even laughed at the general in his grace face and even flung mud at him but somehow the sight of Angelina lying there probably a cripple for life made Starring again feel a sudden pang in his heart.

He was not at all wicked or sinful as his two companions, but fully thought it his duty to do these things, and not for any revengeful methods, for he had nothing to revenge. But only he alone felt the pang keenly. He realized that he and his companions had gone too far and as Angelina was not weeping bitterly at Frederick's rash and cruel words (Thought he really meant all he said) almost broke her heart.

"If you general Baldwin will leave me and my companions by myself I'll tell her all I can," said Starring. "I swear that I won't run off."

"We will stay right here," said Baldwin. "You alone will remain with her. Your two companions will go back to the guard house. They will suffer for this insult offered to me by Frederick."

"I'll do as you wish, in one way," said Baldwin. "You alone will remain with her. Your two companions will go back to the guard house. They will suffer for this insult offered to me by Frederick."

"I'll do as you wish, in one way," said Baldwin. "You alone will remain with her. Your two companions will go back to the guard house. They will suffer for this insult offered to me by Frederick."

"I'll do as you wish, in one way," said Baldwin. "You alone will remain with her. Your two companions will go back to the guard house. They will suffer for this insult offered to me by Frederick."

But Baldwin ordered the men away but they hid at a certain distance to be prepared in case Starring would make a break to escape, the other two being marched back to the guard house by several men.

But Angelina declared that she would hear nothing unless they were left alone, so they were brought back. Baldwin then went off himself and hid, with the rest.

The three boys knew that they were hiding and believing that they were not trusted in their word Starring then resolved not to tell.

"After all I said I saw they don't trust us," said Starring. "So we need not say a word, that is I won't for you would not anyway. Let's go back to the guard house. Better tell her there than be washed by a bunch of untrusting Christian fools."

They turned and started to go at a quick pace but Angelina started to weep piteously again.

"Oh stay," she pleaded in a heartrending way. "Stay and hear the story I'm going to tell and then tell your's. The boys did not halt but continued on and then Baldwin said coming out of his hiding place."

"Back the other way boys. You are going to tell everything whether we watch or not. We are not doing this because we don't trust you. We are lying in wait for someone we see coming. But if you refuse to go back, my men will fire for your disobedience and then you will die like helpless cubs. So choose. Which?"

The boys halted but did not make another move, Starring saying:

"You Christians will suffer for this. I will never tell anything though you turn me in limestone and gash my body open afterward. So mind."

"If you only knew what I and my sisters suffered before and during the war," she Angelina said sadly. "It was during the Galverinian rebellion that we were deliberately kidnapped and carried off by the landelinians and wherever we were prisoners, it was like the home of the demons, but yet our worst horror was at Gloria Galverinia. And that was way before the Galverinian rebellion began, even when we were just leaving our baby hood. If you only knew of this you would not have done this to us."

A great massacre of children occurred at Gloria, a slaughter that you could not have dared to look upon it. We were taken in large penitentiary at Gloria, and the landelinians tried to force us to help slaughter the children. In those days we were more timid and helpless, but fearing to lose our souls most, we refused to obey orders under any conditions.

And oh what happened! I and my poor sisters were tied to pillars. Jennie the Glandelinian had intended to make do the slaughter, at any costs, and despite her piteous and even screams, untied her as a again and dragged her to a long line of children more frightened than ourselves. The landelinians made her undress and told her that she had to cut out the hearts of one of the children.

We were helpless in the power of the landelinians and the rascal the main leader, was fully determined to see to our obedience.

My poor sister Jennie was overwhelmed with terror and sorrow and though she fell on her knees and begged the cruel landelinian to let her go it was useless, and made him mad as a rabid dog. He tied a sharp dagger to her hand and one of the children was brought before Jennie. The little child a boy was a cripple, and like all the other children had a pair of scapulars around their necks. The Glandelinian forced the boy to break them. He screamed for mercy but he might as well have begged mercy of Satan.

The Glandelinian then to my horror unbound me and although I tried to struggle stripped or literally tore off my clothes and tied my legs together so that I was again helpless. I yet had my arms free and the landelinians realizing this tied me to a post next to my sister Jennie and grabbing me by my arms placed my hands around his neck and his on top of mine.

For a moment Angelina sighed, tears springing to her eyes. Such a sad look spread over her face that Starring desired to embrace her but restrained himself.

"When the landelinian pressed on my hands he thought that he was making me do it," continued Angelina sadly. "The look in the boys face was awful, and I struggled frantically, succeeding in pulling my hands free."

Put the landelinian himself choked the boy with all his might. I was horrified when I saw the boy sink to the floor, but the landelinian lifted the poor boy to his feet and continued to choke him until he was dead.

The boy was then carried before Jennie and the landelinians made her plunge the knife into his body. She was helpless and the man was holding the dagger with his own hands.

The boys abdomen was gasped open, and taking out the heart the cruel landelinian with a cruel laugh first threw it at my face, and then slicing it up spread it bit by bit down my throat nearly choking me."

An exclamation of horror came from Evans.

"So they did this to you," said Baldwin spitefully. "If I had been there then!"

"You would have been just as helpless," interrupted Angelina. "These Glandelinians were human cannibals. The landelinian I mentioned did a dirty dirty rag in blood lying on the floor, rubbed it on my neck and chest. They did the same to my

then!"

"You would have been just as helpless," interrupted Angelina. "These Glandelinians were human cannibals. The landelinian I mentioned did a dirty dirty rag in blood lying on the floor, rubbed it on my neck and chest. They did the same to my

then!"

"You would have been just as helpless," interrupted Angelina. "These Glandelinians were human cannibals. The landelinian I mentioned did a dirty dirty rag in blood lying on the floor, rubbed it on my neck and chest. They did the same to my

then!"

"You would have been just as helpless," interrupted Angelina. "These Glandelinians were human cannibals. The landelinian I mentioned did a dirty dirty rag in blood lying on the floor, rubbed it on my neck and chest. They did the same to my

then!"

"You would have been just as helpless," interrupted Angelina. "These Glandelinians were human cannibals. The landelinian I mentioned did a dirty dirty rag in blood lying on the floor, rubbed it on my neck and chest. They did the same to my

then!"

"You would have been just as helpless," interrupted Angelina. "These Glandelinians were human cannibals. The landelinian I mentioned did a dirty dirty rag in blood lying on the floor, rubbed it on my neck and chest. They did the same to my

then!"

"You would have been just as helpless," interrupted Angelina. "These Glandelinians were human cannibals. The landelinian I mentioned did a dirty dirty rag in blood lying on the floor, rubbed it on my neck and chest. They did the same to my

then!"

"You would have been just as helpless," interrupted Angelina. "These Glandelinians were human cannibals. The landelinian I mentioned did a dirty dirty rag in blood lying on the floor, rubbed it on my neck and chest. They did the same to my sister Jennie. Oh how I looked toward heaven begging God to let me vomit up the fragments of the hearts. The rest of the poor little boys were strangled and fairly hewn to pieces before our very eyes, their bodies being torn open and their very insides pulled out. They flared the sliced fragments down the throats of my sisters who were fairly strangled almost to death. But not heard our prayer and we vomited to the anger of all the glandelinians who saw us. The thousands of little girls were also strangled to death, their necks being crushed, and their tongues cut out. Their bodies were badly cut up and the same was done to them as the boys. And then they were thrown upon the other children!

then!"

When the glandelinian turned to us at last, we seemed indeed lost. What they did to Jennie I could hardly bear to tell, but by the way she looked I knew she was being choked worse than the children already slain. Her head was thrown back and I saw a purple and gas ghastly color overspread her face and I saw little streams of blood come from her nose and ears.

"But I say, if we were there," broke in Starring, "I'd-----"
"Could do nothing for us," said Angelina. "I never saw my sister treated so to. Her tongue was sticking out and one of the glandelinians threw a hand full of pepper on it. I saw how Jennie struggled but she was choking her all that much harder, and she soon appeared as dead. The glandelinians at the same time made me run till I was gasping for air. Then another one by tying a heavy cloth over my mouth and nose. I could not remember what had been said afterward though no doubt if I had sworn from lack of air the glandelinian must have supposed that I was dead and took it off for some other use just before I died. I suffered more cruelly afterward when I came too for I was scourged until I nearly fainted. Then he grabbed me by the throat, and - felt as if some iron weight were pressing on all sides to crush my neck. Then all seemed black before me and I swooned. I believe something or somebody hindered the others from slashing us with their knives for we were not killed. I also believe the blood of the dead children ran in streams for the whole toll floor had been covered with the blood. I recovered sometime afterward, and to my horror felt the blood of dead bodies on top of me dripping into my mouth. I having unconsciously drank the blood. Angelina shuddered and a look of horror overspread her fair face.

"Some of the intestines were lying across my face and my blood was smeared with the blood of dead children lying on top of me."

"I managed to get free, and drew out my sisters whom I thought dead, but they soon recovered however, my throat still feeling sore from the awful choking. The stench of mangled flesh and blood was horrible in the place, but we were unable to get out as the door was locked."

We were even thrown in rooms half filled with maggots, but we continually beat them off. Jennie was then thrown in a furnace with strange stuff rubbed on her body, to prevent the fire from killing her and you only can imagine how she suffered. She had been driven insane and only a beam falling on her head at the time we were trapped in the city when it was burning only brought her reason back. Many times these very same things occurred to us in that one city alone and now probably it is happening again to my poor sisters."

The three boys finally looked at each other with consternation. Jack Evans himself was filled with consternation.

"It is horrible," said Darger. "It is a wonder and even strange to me indeed that God did not hurl a thunderbolt upon those glandelinians. But yet I know that worse slaughters have been enacted by the glandelinians. You were not prisoners during the Galverinian rebellion were you?" He asked Angelina.

"Yes," said Angelina. "And come near losing two sisters by death for mine."

"If we had known this before we would not have done this," said Fredrick. "We have after all unjustly done you and your sisters tremendous harm and now we are repaying our debt. But as to your sisters I swear that when I turned them over to Manley he had separated each of them and sent them to different points of the lines separated probably forever. I know where they are, but how they are going to be recovered I can not tell to save our lives. It is utterly impossible to rescue them unless something lucky happens during a battle. But really we're heartily sorry that we did this and after all will take our punishment bravely."

"And tears stood in the eyes of the three boys. "Maybe his anger will relent," said Angelina. "I hope so anyway, though though I know how my father is when in a passion. He nearly fainted when he heard they were gone though he did not show it. You boys have broken his heart as well as mine. Though you have been so cruel to us even again after I forgave you two days ago I still forgive you and I love you. Jesus Christ teaches us to forgive, if we are to be forgiven."

"But why don't general Vivian forgive us then if he believes such things and is a Christian?" asked Starring bitterly. "If he is a Christian he would do so. Of her will he--"

"It is not him it is the law," said Angelina sadly. "God denounces those who abuse us unjustly, and general Vivian realizing it forgives not. Of course I know he will do so if they are returned, by the date he mentioned. Otherwise I'm afraid he won't. He is a terribly terrible enemy when you make him one."

"I've seen that," said Darger. "His anger is indescribable. When we were brought before him he was more like a roaring lion than a man, and would not listen to any excuses we wished to make. He placed us under that cruel general Baldwin, for I know he is cruel by his looks."

"But Baldwin is not a cruel man," said Angelina. "He acts that way for he feels their loss as I do or my daddy does. He loves us though we are no relations of his. He did not act cruel to us, but had every cruel face." "Said Starring. "But here he comes now. We will have to go."

The boys shook hands with V. Angelina and then were marched off again to their cells. As it was now threatening to rain a thunderstorm brewing, Evans carried Angelina back to her room laying her gently on her couch. In a few minutes to Evans' relief poor Angelina fell into a quiet sleep, while the rain poured in torrents outside, and the thunder crashed and banged. Oh how he longed to embrace and embrace that frail little form which had gone through so much suffering, without hardly any one around to pity her. Jack Evans had always been on the trail and had seen many many pretty children but none like Violet and her sisters.

He had as he declared seen little Angelina St. Clare, (in Uncle Tom's Cabin) before she died of what ever killed her so slowly, but yet Evangeline Vivian alone was a hundred times more prettier.

at
THE BATTLE OF MARGARET FORD. ONE OF THE GREATEST FIGHTS EVER SEEN ON WATER AND LAND AT THE SAME TIME.

For five weeks even before the battle of Cedarline the Angelina gun rivers mouths running into the sea from the town of Vivian (Vickery or Vicksburg) hither, had been swarming with hundreds of Angelinian gunboats during a fiercest bombardment of the war up to that time. The town of Martha's Ford was under attack and way up to October, since the battle of Crowley, the city of Martha's Ford had been under attack from the Christian warships the poor non-combatants having to live in caves and dugouts to escape the deadly fire from the Christian warships. The carry the dangerous fortifications. Four Branch River had to be occupied by the Angelinians under general Devine. These branches or each bank of earth was occupied by the strongest Glandelinian forces ever seen during the war, but during the fearful struggle the Angelinians took score after scores of redoubts in one day, and simultaneously other forces crossing the main branch sent the Glandelinians out of the main positions, and with the aid of two thousand two thousand warships cooped up the Glandelinian fleet, which it was quickly captured after a severe gunnery heard for a hundred miles and after a hundred and fifty ships had been destroyed on both sides.

Simultaneously other forces of Angelinians turned their attention to the well nigh impregnable fortresses of Martha's Ford which had been under siege for nearly five months and forty days even after the battle of Cedarline, a siege really being a years duration before the battle occurred here. All nations in the world even Angelina herself believed that if they all together with their greatest armies would attack the fortresses they could not capture it unless aided by three hundred million angels if there were that many, and angels of the most greatest power and it was consequently urged that Angelina however valiant could prove unequal to the task.

Martha's Ford in the place had been a regular titan Gibraltar building builded by the Angelinians in a hundred years before Glandelinians Separation from Angelina and which had taken all those hundred years to finish. It was called Fort Cedarline and had been as impregnable as science could contrive.

No less than six hundred other forts guarded the main fortress. The Angelinian fleets and brigades under Admiral Ford and general Hatch, fourly fought their desperate way along the banks amid frightful slaughter and soon the whole line of ships about forty thousand in number of every make and armed each with three thousand cannon hammered a general fire at the forts. Every gun on the ships burst into flame and the thunderous cannonading as all the fortifications responded was beyond describing and shook the whole coast line its whole length. A tremendous annihilating fire was poured steadily into the southern forts while the Angelinian soldiers landing near the shore were carried them at the point of the bayonet. A score of the other forts were carried simultaneously and by eleven o'clock five fortifications on St. Vincent's Hill were also in the hands of the Angelinians. Meanwhile general Bellens brigades were driving the Glandelinian forces pell-mell from Martha's Ford toward Turner, part of the Angelinian fleet steaming toward the western banks cutting off retreat in that direction with a roaring cannon fire heard for three hundred miles. And the other exits being simply blockaded blockaded the Glandelinians in utmost confusion concealed themselves on the St. Clare ridges.

About eleven o'clock the powder magazines in forty other forts were hit simultaneously, and exploded, these forts being at once silenced. With an immense amount of labor mountain guns were brought forward and filled on ten of the main fortification. It indeed did seem as if all the world was blowing to pieces. Hundreds of cannon from every fort volleyed and thundered, with the fury of hell and fearful fires broke here and there, the thousands of explosions being like volcanic eruptions, explosions being everywhere, and the shock of the titanic cannonade as all the guns of the ships and all the forts not in the hands of the Christians as yet let loose their fire of hell, killed hundreds of thousands of fishes in the water and shook down more scores of towns along the coast and even caused the city of Angelina to crumble into severe ruins. However by two o'clock after continuous bombardment up to this time the fortifications were reduced into blazing ruins, and the Glandelinians at this point struck up the fight flag with the intention of surrendering. The Christian troops about three million men rushed forward to take it believing it to be vacated, when the fortification men rushed through the ruins with a roar that threw them all off their feet and sprawling simultaneously a rain of canister and shell cutting their lives to pieces.

The Christians recoiled in confusion, but recovered their formation and did not give up the assault until they were threatened with annihilation. All the southern and western fortifications were captured however general Drophia leading the attack on the rest of the forts which roared with a continual volcano of flames and din which was so severe that none of the men even on the decks of the bombarding ships could keep their feet. The very sea rose in furious tidal waves. Heavy columns five million strong in each each line, apiece charged straight ahead under the deadly scathing fire that would have stopped all the armies of the world, and they went down in hundred of thousands at every broadside, the battle field for its whole width and length was drenched with horrible wreckage and destruction, the very ground seemed to be under, by the din and every assault met with appalling decimation, ten thirds of every column five million strong being slain and one quarter wounded at every assault. General Drophia went down mortally wounded, Helen was killed, general Hatch and Bird and Lennia were severely wounded, and general Adlin also fell mortally wounded. But the Angelinians succeeded in carrying these fortifications one after another capturing hundreds of thousands of prisoners. A severe hand to hand encounter one of the severest in the war was fought in the town around, which were smashed in the slain and wounded. The last of the fortifications were also stormed by general Hatch's men under a devastating artillery fire of ten thousand guns and more than forty of these forts seemed in fierce conflagrations as fierce as their hammering broadsides. These fortifications could not be carried under such an annihilating fire and the Angelinians recoiled in confusion but other forces sent at it again and again and finally they were carried everyone of the fortifications being carried in a single day the Glandelinians losing over 11,123,999 in prisoners. The Sacred Heart Flag and the national sables of Angelina now waved proudly over the well so won fields. General Kangee surrendered that evening after his line of ten million men was cut up and thrown into confusion ten and twenty times during the battle and now the next thing for the Angelinians was to capture the great City of Vivian Wickey, but it would indeed be a harder thing to do than they had at Vivian Wickey. The Glandelinian losses in the battle was 20,124,128 in killed wounded and prisoners, and the fallen in wounded was 9,000,128.

main Glandelinian commanders
Richard J. James Royce.

THE SON OF THE VIVIAN GIRLS.
FRAID FRIGHTFUL GARNAGE AT MO-WHINTER.

AND YOUNG STAR, (WHICH SHONE OUT LIKE))))))T O O SWEET
A BUNCH OF IMAGES FOR SUCH GLASS. LOVELY BRINGS SON SCARCELY FORMED OR MOULDED! SIX ROSES WITH ALL THEIR SWEETEST PETALS YET UNFOLDED.

THE BATTLE OF E. VANOMIA ST. CLARE. TERRIFIC STORMS OF FIRE AND CREAS OF BLOOD AND GARNAGE FOR BLOODS OF HILLS.
JENNIE, JENNY AND HER SISTERS IN PERIL. . . . RESCUED.

CHAPTER FOUR.

St. Clare had never saw a little child weep so hard and though he tried to cheer her up he found it in vain. POOR VIOLET. If she only knew that poor Angelina yet lived, and even recovering from the disease which fortunately had attacked only one lung. Violet believed that Angelina had died and could not be comforted.

St. Clare saw the package around her neck and taking it off undid it. A golden curl fell into his hand to his amazement. He looked at it in consternation, and setting Angelina gently down examined the curl of hair carefully.

"Is this some of your own beautiful hair?" He asked gently.

"At this she broke out afresh.

"No it belongs to my sister Angelina." She wept. "She died the night we were stolen and we did not even get a chance to bid her a last farewell at her grave. Oh please can't you take me back to my own people. They won't do you no harm, because I'll save you."

"I'm afraid that is impossible." Said the man bitterly. "I'm between King Anley and the Angelinian armies and can get there by no means. But dear child why weep like this. I don't believe your sister died, and if she did she is beyond all the misery misery going on now. She may be enjoying eternal happiness in heaven with God and the angels."

"But it breaks my heart just the same." Sobbed poor Violet. "Oh I wish I was there too so that I could see her again. Oh why has this happened. . . . I never did those three boys any harm, yet they were the cause of our being sold. . . . Poor Violet again wept bitterly. Many days had passed since her captivity started but Violet had never smiled. Her master allowed her more freedom, than to the other children but he filled with them just the same. She was indeed better off than poor Jennie or Jennie and her other sisters the two of which were really nearly dying.

A day had passed and St. Clare the brutal one found that Jennie was missing she not being where he had left her when he struck her down last. He was pained and swore a demon and set a number of men on the search for her. Toward evening they returned.

"Can't find her." Said one of the men. "We have looked through the swamp and everywhere."

"Hullo everyone of you, servant soldiers. There is a runaway in the swamps. I'll give you one thousand one hundred and sixty dollars to any of you men who catches that imp. Jennie dead, or alive. Turnout every one of the dogs."

"Well." Said he chuckling brutally to himself. "At any rate, when they find her. She may be torn to pieces by the dogs. If she is captured alive she will sweat for it."

"GOD PROTECTS THE HELPLESS"

The sensation produced by this news was immediate. All of the hired men sprang forward officiously to offer their services, either from the hope of the reward or from that cringing subservience which is one of the most baleful effects of wickedness and which succeeds against Christians at times. Many of the men ran one way and some another. Others were getting flustered of a nice hunt.

of pine knots. Some were uncoupling the dogs, whose hoarse savage bark or bay added not a little to the animation of the scene.

"Master shall we shoot her if we catch her," said the overseer to whom St. Clare brought out a rifle.

"Yes and now boys, be spry and smart. I've thousand one hundred sixty dollars for him who gets her and a bottle of spirits to every one of you anyhow." The whole band with the glare of blazing torches and whoops and shouts, and savage yell of man and beast proceeded down to the swamp. The hunt was long, and mated and throughout but it was near morning before it was successful the little girl being found in the gin house to the consternation of the Glandelinians.

"Ay, ay," said one of the men. "As hedragged Jennie along!" "You will catch it now. There is no sneaking out of it now either. Till you will get it and no mistake. See how you will lookmaking Master hunt like this all night, and you lying here all the time in here. See what you will get."

One of the men's savage words reached Jennie's ear.

A higher voice there was saying:

"Fear not them that kill the body."

Nerve and bone of that poor little girl's body vibrated to those words as if touched by the finger of God and she felt the strength of a thousand souls in one.

"Well Jennie Virgin," said St. Clare walking up and seizing the poor little girl by the neck and speaking through his teeth in a paroxysm of determined uncontrolable rage:

"Do you know that I have made up my mind to kill you? Well I have." He continued with grim terrible calmness: "Done-----that-----very-----just-----thing Jennie unless you tell me how you came to be found in that ginhouse."

Poor Jennie was silent.

"Do you hear?" St. Clare said stamping with a roar like that of an incensed lion; "SPEAK."

"I have not got a thing to tell," said Jennie with a voice so sorrowful that many of the men were touched.

"You small christian imp, you don't mean to tell me the lie that you don't know," said St. Clare.

Jennie remained silent.

"SPEAK. SPEAK. Thundered St. Clare striking Jennie furiously; "Do you know anything? Speak."

"I know but I will not tell anything even if I die for it."

St. Clare drew in a long deep breath, and surpressed his terrible pain in a frightful voice:

"Mark Jennie, you might think because I've let you off before, I don't mean what I say, but this time I've made up my mind and counted the cost. You have always stood it out against me, now I'll get the best of you, or kill you one or the other. I'll count every drop of blood that there is in you and take each drop one by one until you give up."

Jennie looked up piteously to St. Clare and answered in a way that thrilled all the Glandelinians present:

"St. Clare if you are sick, or in trouble, or dying, and I could save you I would give you my heart's blood, and if taking every drop of my blood would save your precious soul I would give them freely, as the Lord gave his for me. Oh please St. Clare I beg of you don't bring this great sin on your soul. It will hurt me more than I will hurt you more than I will me for God has set a mark on me and will revenge me any brutal treatment of me. Do the worst you can, my troubles will be soon over and I will see my sister who is in heaven, but if you don't repent your troubles will never end."

Like a strange snatch of heavenly music heard in the lull of a hurricane this burst of feeling made a moment's blank pause. St. Clare stood again as if agitated and looked at poor Jennie and there was such a silence that the moving waters of the stream to two rods away could be heard measuring with silent touch the last moments of mercy and probation to that hardened heart. It was only but a moment. There was one hesitating pause, one irresolute relenting thrill, and back came the spirit of evil, with seven hundred fold vehemence as St. Clare flaming with rage smote poor Jennie to the ground! Scenes of such blood and cruelty are shocking to our ear and heart. What man had nerve to do no man has nerve to hear.

"I believe she is most gone St. Clare," said one of the overseers toched in spite of himself for Jennie's pitiable plight.

"Pay away till she gives up. Give it to her. Give it to her," he shouted; "I'll take every drop of blood she has unless she confesses."

Poor Jennie opened her eyes and looked upon St. Clare.

"You poor miserable man," she said; "You have struck me, right at the point where the mark has been sealed. I would give anything if your soul was saved. I forgive you will all my soul though I know you are really damned."

She fainted entirely away.

"I believe my soul that she is really done for," finally said St. Clare stepping forward to look at poor Jennie; "Yes she is. Well her mouth is shut up at last. That is one comfort."

"Yes wicked man but who will shut up that vicious in thy wicked soul? That soul past repentance, past prayer, past hope in whom the fire that shall never be quenched is already burning. Let Jennie be not gone. Her wondrous words and prayers had struck in the hearts of the imbruted Glandelinians who had unwillingly been the instrument of cruelty upon her, and the instant she was carried up to the place, and St. Clare withdrew to his house, they acting her down in their ignorance and caughting to call her back to life, as if they were any favor to her. They gently washed her wounds, provided a rude bed of some sort and of some refuse cotton cloth on to lie down on and soon brought her too. Seeing their master approaching they moved away. Passing through St. Clare's mind was one of those vivid flashes that often sends the dark and wicked soul a lightning of conscience. He understood full well that it was God who was standing between him and his victim and he blasphemed him like a demon and dared him with all his angels to come down and fight him right there. Indeed Jennie was treated with a brutality that I really in my own heart could possibly describe in all its horrors. Not a day had passed that she did not get terrific blows. Jennie had never really been treated so cruelly before. All similar cruelties except the barbarities was repeated day by day and was probably through a miracle that she lived through it all.

John's master had died from Hydrophobia inflicted by a bite from one of his dogs which was suffering from rabies and several of the children were also suffering from it. This enabled however for John to relent in her suffering for none of the men, hating Glandelinians though they were dared to catch her. But John's master could not even be killed. He had made plans about the treatment of Jennie and decided to continue on it until she died. For two days after the severe beating he had given her he did not molest her as he intended to let her recover a bit first. But his wait was in vain and enraged he proceeded to continue the cruelties the very next day. Jennie was dragged from the hut and a noose was drawn around her neck and tightened. The other end was placed over a tree.

"I have a mind to butcher you as terribly as I can imagine," he said with the voice of a demon. "I could as well hang you and cut you to pieces at the same time. I remember the time the Glandelinians hung you or one of you up and failed to do any cutting. That man had made too great a swing and sprang over his head. Then another Glandelinian mad with fury struck too high cutting the rope in two. I know for I was there to see it. That little imp fell into the tub splash in the blood all over the Glandelinians! Then in her mad fright she tore off the intestines around her and flung them at the Glandelinians. It was as that the large piece of flesh struck in the mouth like knocking me over the tub and causing the blood to spill over me. Well I never forgot this. It was from you or either from your sister Violet that that piece of meat came from. Ha you checked the Glandelinians with your bombardment of flesh only a moment and then you were overpowered with your sisters only to be rescued by Angelinians and Calvinians who killed the Glandelinians in turn. I have sworn vengeance but could not get satisfaction until you got into my hands as you are now. I don't think I'll hang you from my hands can shock you better than the rope."

He took off the noose, grabbed her by the throat, lifted her up against his chest and pressed on her neck with all his strength and poor Jennie could not struggle. She made a feeble attempt to tear away that awful grip but she was weak and her arms hung limp. Her head was thrown back and the sight would have made the other overseers butt in if they dared. She hung limp in front of him her eyes bulging and her tongue protruding, her face turning purple and presenting all the symptoms of suffocation and pain. He had some intention of killing her but the look of some of the men made him show her down where she lay writhing and moaning and gasping in a piteous way, but he kicked her in the abdomen and chest and then in the face and finally in the eye.

The servants carried her to the hut when the master left.

One of them said:

"Let's kill her to put her out of her misery."

"No," said another it would only be murder and probably she won't live long anyway now. But murder or not I would like to kill him if I could for treating a poor little girl as like her the way he has done."

"Let's do it," he said; "said another slapping John's back to make her recover for she was still gasping; "It would not be no sin probably to kill that old Stan Sater. Then we could save this darling."

Jennie soon recovered under the urgent treatment of the two Glandelinian overseers and they again laid her on the cotton pile which was battery after battery, redoubt after redoubt, soon let loose a general fire of hell, Cedernine and the other forts joined in unison, and the Angelinians in possession of the forts formerly taken were compelled to abandon them and general ocean of the christians being mortally wounded was compelled to surrender and the fortifications of Vivian with enormous stores they had recently captured and four million men together, with the shattered remains of his fleet.

There had never been a single lull in the fighting and attack after attack with desperate fury had still continued on the left wing of the glandelinians and this line of battle with one hundred million on both sides extended for the length of one hundred miles and the numbers engaged made it one of the most gigantic combats of the whole war except Cedernine. In the end the glandelinians suffered a crushing defeat with the loss of many millions in three hours and their beaten legions were driven into McWhirther with frightful losses of men, generals and material.

This carnage between one hundred million Angelinians and nearly one hundred million glandelinians had been a frightful one and raged along the vicinity of Evangelina St. Clare (Calvernia) and the appalling million cannon like roar of musketry, the right wing of the glandelinians had been crushed, mangled and thrown into confusion, rolled up and displaced with the loss of their main commander Madgenia Evans who was killed but twice they had made reformations and a repulse had been the christians again.

The carnage was indeed terrorizing. Men all that while were mowed down in hundreds of thousands and the roar of cannon shook the country for a hundred miles. The center of the christian line had been torn to pieces, and was soon rolled up and the enemy were about to carry it all before them when general Nelson came to the aid of the center with fresh forces stubbornly contested the bloody ground and drove the glandelinian center back crushed and mangled.

But the glandelinians did not have enough. They went at it again and again until until overwhelmed and losing general Cantonia they fell back. The glandelinian left remained steady for four hours during the fearful attacks of the christians, but the glandelinians were finally overwhelmed and compelled to withdraw toward the main line of fortifications. The glandelinians however would not give in under any condition and though the dead and wounded covered the ground like hay strewn all about for a hundred miles the glandelinians made a second crushing counter attack. Aronburg and McWhitney and Auffmann were captured after severe fighting but the forts at Vivian Wickey under no condition conditions could be silenced, and after the cannonading thunder of two hundred thousand guns continued for five weeks even three days still after the battle thou and guns continued for five weeks even three days still after the battle of Cedernine had past the Angelinians finally gave up the attack but did not abandon the siege. No ships could face those terrible forts as Vivian, McWhirther McWhoolster and Cedernine whose terrible guns blew every ship that encountered its horrible fire out of the water.

Angeline's sorrow.

Angeline reclining on a lounge was disturbed by the roar of the same two battles previously described but she had made no remarks about it though consternation was among the officers, the battle having been heard for one thousand miles.

News had also come in that terrible forest fires started by the recent battle of Cedernine was still burning and was advancing swiftly toward, no one knows where. She was still an invalid but could walk a little now, by supporting herself against the wall. Two days had passed and Baldwin learning that Angeline had given many curls of hair away to the officers before her threatened death came to see her and ask her for one.

"Sure I'll give you one," said Angeline pleadingly; "But please forgive those three boys."

"Sure I will," answered Baldwin as he lifted her from the lounge. "Anything to please a little angel like you and another thing, I never will believe what a man an man would say about you little girls because I know it is false. I may capture those two imposters yet."

Angeline handed to Baldwin a curl, sneaking behind Baldwin was a fellow in gray uniform, and Baldwin placing his hand on the hair in it behind his back smelt something like very hair burning.

Instantly he withdrew his hand and saw the fair curl had been seoured. He was upon the crouching sneak like a maddened bull smothering the villain to the floor with one blow, knocking out every one of the rascals from his teeth.

"Get up you son of the hounds," "Get up or I'll give you another. I place you under arrest as a sneaking spy." Angeline was saddened by the scene but Baldwin had justification in knocking the man down, and she could not say anything. The fallen victim arose slowly to his feet and Baldwin said with a snarl:

"So you big brute. Tried to get a little to freshen up. Tell me all you strung up as a spy for this case." The man trembling and sulking followed Baldwin who reaching the veranda summoned several of the soldiers.

"I issue orders for this man to be confined in the guard house," he said; "Angeline gave me a curl of hair as a token of friendship and love and this dog snaked behind me and set it on fire. Away with him to the guard house."

"But your excellency Baldwin," began the man.

"Away with him," thundered Baldwin; "I don't want to see him again."

The villain tried to struggle but the soldiers fairly dragged him off along the ground to Baldwin's amusement.

"Well of all the nerve," he exclaimed; "Sneaking up to me like that, to Glandelinian dog. But I'll make it hot for him all right. He has committed an insult to me and Angeline together, which he will pay dearly for."

He then went off to see what to do to the prisoner and to report to general Vivian of the occurrence.

General Hanson still ignorant of Baldwin's friendship and not knowing of the mystery of the Braggard and Bad Baldwin affair stood and strode into the room meeting Baldwin or what appeared to be him face to face.

"What in thunder are you doing here?" demanded general Hanson recognizing him as a real impostor; "How dare you enter my headquarters without my permission. As long as you are no friend of mine and don't forgive the villain girls you cannot come here. Be gone. Quick."

"I'll forgive nothing you darn christian cur," said Baldwin; "Your niece gave me a curl (A lie) Watch for solving of mystery; if I promised to forgive a forgive you and I made the promise. I even revenged a wrong just committed to her and you come talking to me like that, without even letting me have a chance to speak. Well I'll cancel my promise and take that."

He let fly a powerful swing sending Hanson reeling against a table while several officers stood aghast at what seemed such a insubordination of a lower general striking his main superior and even a saintly man at that. For a moment Hanson seemed dazed, and then recovering himself he sprang at Baldwin, striking him a stunning blow on the jaw. This thoroughly aroused Baldwin, and he rained blows at Hanson who dodged them as nimbly as a cat. Hanson watched his chance, and then sprang in striking Baldwin a smart blow on the chin. Baldwin reeled backwards against a chair, but staggering to his feet he went at Hanson again striking him fully on the mouth. Hanson became like an infuriated bull, and blinded by rage Baldwin himself forgot to guard himself and received a blow in the eye that sent him sprawling on the floor.

Baldwin staggering to his feet made a rush at Hanson again and caught him fairly under the chin sending him sprawling. Hanson however was not stunned and getting to his feet he dived forward grabbing Baldwin by the legs threw him sprawling to the floor. They rolled over and over exchanging blows like demons Angeline looking on with consternation.

But Baldwin being the stronger got on top of Hanson but Hanson managed to put in a blow that sent Baldwin sliding four yards across the floor. Enraged beyond any description Baldwin drew his sabre and made another rush at Hanson. Hanson did not have time to draw his but hurled a stool at the enraged man striking him fairly in the face knocking five ten teeth out of his mouth.

In the lull Hanson managed to draw his sabre just as Baldwin recovering from the blow of the stool made another rush. The sabres clashed with a ring but Baldwin was instantly disarmed, his sabre being sent flying out of the window. He drew his pistol and aimed at Hanson but the general knocked it out of his hand.

"No more now," said Hanson with a look which terrified Angeline; "Make another attack and I'll run you through. You will lose your command and shall be sentenced to be shot for attacking an officer. You have made a fool of yourself and you know it. Angeline gave you a curl eh? Well give it back instantly or I'll kill you and Hanson raised his sabre in a threatening manner.

Baldwin gave no answer but stepped back, and made a sudden rush sending Hanson rolling with a terrific blow, the sabre flying with a clash toward the ceiling and falling right on top of Angeline. The sabre however fell the wrong way and showed not injured. Hanson staggering to his feet made a moment's pause and then attacked Baldwin with all his energy. They clutched and circled around the room, upsetting everything in their way. Hanson after a fierce and superhuman effort managed to wrench himself loose from his enemy and landed a blow that sent Baldwin crashing over a table, the two going down with a crash that shook the room. Hanson then drew his pistol aiming it at Baldwin who sprang to his feet. He gave once fierce quick glance at Hanson which changed into a wicked smile, and suddenly grinning Angeline he poised her over his head and hissed;

"Lay down that gun or I'll hurl Angeline to the floor." And as he said this there was a look in Baldwin's face that made Hanson realize that he meant to do it. This was the worse worst thing that could have happened. Angeline did not cry out out or struggle as it was useless.

"You spiteful fool cancel that order about my dismissal from the army or I will do it anyway." Snarled Baldwin. "I'm bound to get the best of you if I die for it. I was going to forgive you and that is why I came for. But you regained your hardness and you will pay for it now."

"Take care," said Hanson bitterly. "There is a mark on Angelina which will cause your punishment if you kill her. I will not cancel that order for many others have witnessed this scene and had gone to report this."

Baldwin gave a look of despair and emotion. With an exclamation he hurled Angelina with full force at Hanson and the two went down with a shocking crash. Baldwin then flung a heavy chair striking Angelina with it, and threw the lounge at Hanson but missed. Jack Evans had witnessed this last scene and with all haste toward general Vivian who was coming toward Hanson's headquarters with a number of soldiers.

"I believe Baldwin has killed Angelina as he had flung her at Hanson and struck her with a chair." He gasped. "Come quick general before he escapes." General Vivian did and after a lively tussel general Baldwin was taken prisoner.

General Vivian did not say a word but went over to where Angelina lay. Hanson had gotten to his feet before general Vivian had arrived and had shot Baldwin in the leg during the struggle with the captors. Angelina lay weeping and bleeding in an alarming way.

Terrible silence reigned and soon two morosen arrived with the army doctor. He examined Angelina for several minutes and then gave orders for to be two men to place her in the bed. They obeyed quickly the doctor following closely.

General Vivian then turned to general Baldwin whom a nurse was attending attending to, his wound being severe.

"He is in a dangerous condition," said the nurse. "He has been badly wounded and will have to be put to bed right away."

"There is no mercy that I will allow to be shown shown to that brute," said general Vivian bitterly. "It is hardly needed anyway, as he is so used already. To bed with him eh? No to the guard house. Let his damn wound be treated there. Get out of here the whole bunch of you."

"But b," began the nurse.

"Fiddle stick," yelled general Vivian. "Get him out of here and treat his wound at the guard house or I will create a scene and throw you out also. Get now and hurry about it too."

The men grabbed Baldwin and carried him out of the place.

"If Angelina dies I'll have him crucified or sent to the Calvinian prison," said general Vivian to Hanson. "But what was the matter with you and him? I hear you and him and been fighting."

"He struck me when off my guard," said Hanson. "That is an insult I'll never let go at and will see to his execution, if I go to death for it myself. He deliberately threw Angelina at me, but truly she misad me, and struck the wall though the wind of her flying past me sent me to the floor. I'm afraid she is killed. And the little fool gave him one of her curls at that. She is too loving and tenderhearted and I'll have to cure it. I'll have no too much tenderheartedness around here if it is going to result like this."

Hanson pronounced these last words with a bitter emphasis indeed. General Vivian was appalled at these words.

"I cannot," said general Vivian. "I cannot have it so. The almighty had made her so loving, as it is his will and has he not a right to do what he will with his own."

"Perhaps so, but see the reward," she got from Baldwin. "Said Hanson in a dry hard tearless manner he turned away his head. With mothered voices and light thread the men entered Angelina's bedroom. One of them an officer gave a wild cry of despair that rang through all the galleries. The cries and lamentations, shrieks and screams, men frantically tearing their hair, throwing themselves on the ground or running distractedly about lamenting.

The bleeding little form was laid on the bed but the doctor applied restoratives and soon she opened her eyes looking fixedly about the room, her eyes traveling wistfully over every object finally resting on a crucifix.

The doctor made his examination and it was evident from the expression on his face that he could not decide her fate till the morrow. He applied himself to dressing her wounds, amid the lamentations, sobs and cries of the grief stricken soldiers who clustered about the doors and windows of the large veranda.

"How said the physician? We must turn off all these creatures, as all depend on her being kept quiet."

Poor little Angelina opened her eyes and looked fixedly on the distressed soldiers whom Hanson and the doctor were trying to urge from the apartment.

"Poor creatures," she said. "Add a expression of bitter grief passed over her face. Heand absolutely refused to go. Heart rending sorrow had deprived her of all presence of mind and he had thrown himself alone on the floor and nothing, nobody could persuade him to rise. The best yielded to Hanson's urgent plans, and re-representations that little Angelina's safety depended on their stillness and obedience. Poor Angelina could say but little. She lay with her eyes shut but it was evident that she wrestled with bitter thoughts. After a while she laid her hand on general Hanson's head as he was kneeling beside her and said:

"Poor Baldwin."

"What poor Baldwin?" said Hanson earnestly.

"I'm dying," said Angelina sadly. "Pray forgive Baldwin and God will spare me. I feel it. Otherwise he will take me away by death."

"Assaulted as he had been by Baldwin Hanson felt remorseful and some pity for him, and yet then the main question was:

"How about general Vivian?"

"If you would like a priest," said the doctor.

Violet hastily shook her head and said:

"Pray forgive Baldwin if you don't want me to refuse refuse a priest."

At this moment all present heard these words:

"Violet thou art slowly passing away
Though they that love thee dearest know it not.
Yet as they dearest sisters are borne so far away
Please save them from the fangs men this very day.

"Oh Evangelina we crown thee then with blossoms so fair,
Queen of the Angelinians,
Queen of Angelina.

"Oh Evangelina we crown thee with blossoms so fair
Queen of the Angelinians
Queen of Angelina.

"Yes yes I forgive Baldwin," said Hanson but ask your father as that song may come true. I doubt if he does as he is more angry at Baldwin than I am." Poor Violet looked pleadingly at general Vivian and beckoned him to her.

"Do you care if I die?" he asked pleadingly.

"Angelina, Angelina, don't speak to me that way. It will kill me," said general Vivian bitterly.

"Then please forgive Baldwin, if you don't you will break my heart, and then I'll die." Please forgive Baldwin. And she looked at him in such a pleading manner that he could not bear to see it and turned away his head. He hesitated, wondering whether to forgive Baldwin, or punish him.

"I don't see how you can think of asking any one to forgive Baldwin after what he has done to you," said general Vivian. "You are very much like Christ himself, as he forgave his bitterest enemies after they had crucified him, or rather asked God to forgive them saying:

"Father, forgive them for they know not what they do."

A child like you or your sisters don't deserve to suffer as you and them and yet when Baldwin flung you down to spite Hanson you want to forgive him. Well I'd gladly forgive him too but I'm sorry to say that I cannot decide just now. All my officers have witnessed this occurrence and they told me and if they refuse to forgive him I cannot save Baldwin. I'll try and summon them now, but I fear it is useless."

He sent a messenger and after fifteen minutes he returned with thirty general officers. "You have seen what Baldwin did to Angelina did you not?"

He asked.

"Yes we did shout all when vehemently.

"Well said general Vivian hesitatingly. "Little Angelina is dying and if I only forgive Baldwin and save him she will live. But would like to consult you as you have seen he act. Evans here had also been a witness and summoned me."

Baldwin is already in the guardhouse under arrest and had been seriously or probably fatally hurt by general Hanson during a severe fight and even had his head banded. I determined to have him put to death whether he recovered or not but Angelina here wishes me to forgive, and spare him. But I cannot unless you say it would be useless to save him otherwise. If it were not for her I would have killed him on the very spot as this action had set my heart on fire. But she begged me to forgive him and I really don't know what to do. If you think it wise to forgive him I'll do so."

The officers remained silent, and looked at each other in consternation. They pondered at general Vivian's words and it was nearly five minutes before one of them gave an answer.

"We will settle this among ourselves and give the answer to morrow," He said. "We cannot decide just now as we are too irritated. But to morrow we will give our yes or no."

"But Angelina wants the answer now," said general Vivian. "or despite what the doctor said she may cry herself to death at night. Be more answer than no an ever at all."

and forgive me for Baldwin you know you committed a greater sin than murder, though you did not kill her, and if you don't forgive, God will not forgive you."

Baldwin did not answer but motioned to her fiercely to go away.

But she did not and said:
"Some day Baldwin - know that you will regret this. Since you won't atone it can't be possible for the councils of these armies to forgive a your act and something horrible might happen to you for releasing those rascally boys who are deadlier enemies of Violet and her sisters than any of the glandelinian generals alive." And she shuddered.

Baldwin still remained silent though he gave her a look which was like knives.

"It is no use to coax him," said general Vivian drawing Eva forcibly away. "You might only increase his rage and he would only turn on you. When hot tempered he is a dangerous man to deal with."

Eva felt like crying but she restrained herself and said:

"I don't fear him. I'm sure I can convince him."
"Not while his temper is up," said general Vivian. "He hates you as well as Angeline though he don't know you. You had not better not monkey with him for I fear he would strike you down."

"I draw her gently away motioning to the men to take Baldwin back to the guard house. Poor Angeline was sobbing bitterly and Hanson was doing his best to cheer her but he was not successful as Baldwin's words had affected her badly. Poor little Eva was bewildered and almost cried too. She felt sorry for poor Angeline and she felt sure that general Baldwin would never atone. Poor Eva she too had sorrows all her life. She had sorrowed for all these colored people she had been among so long, but what she had witnessed now made her heart ache all the more. She remembered that she had touched the wicked heart of poor Topsy and she was bound to touch Baldwin. She skipped out of general Baldwin's headquarters and followed to where they had taken Baldwin. The men objected to her following them but as she threatened to turn into a fit of weeping they let her alone.

The part is

the THE BATTLE OF EVANGELINE ST CLARE

occurs on August 15 1913

After his occurrence general Vivian was bound to recover his lost children at all cost and made preparations on general for advance against general King Manley's right wing, the other glandelinian armies under Schoemannia, Ricknell, the two Manleys and federal going elsewhere to operate against the christians in the north. Hearing of the approach of mighty forest fires upon his left Manley decided to move out of its range and he started an advance northward, and learning that general Raymond Richardson Federal was coming to make a junction with him, and to massacre all children at Evangeline St. Clare Manley decided to open a path for Federal to do so and in the first clash of the battle general Meldonia's christian forces of about fifteen hundred thousand were literally massacred by the glandelinians. The greatest indignation was kindled throughout the christian lines which swept forward to revenge it. Meldonia's fortified lines in gray and John St. Nellions's blazed with a storming withering fire whose crashing roar was heard even where Violet and her sisters were prisoners, but these glandelinian generals were killed at the first outset, the gray lines were crushed, tangled and shot, and then rolled back with the loss of three other generals being August Johnston, August Mason, and Henry Mason his brother who were severely wounded.

The armies of Hanson hearing the tremendous crash of battle was now on the full march for the enemy's lines when Manley interfered by the movement of his main divisions to Vivian's right, and arrested the triumphant march of the christians throwing them back with at upendous loss. This was followed immediately by a terrific onslaught of ten battalions of glandelinian horsemen and infantry, the clashes of cavalry forces on both sides, and made a frightful slaughter, and the cannonading along the christian lines seemed to shake the whole country.

For an hour the frightful battle raged in successions of horrible cavalry conflicts, but the energy displayed by the christian cavalry compelled Manley to augment his forces in the vicinity of Evangeline St. Clare. The roar of the terrible battle could not be heard for hundreds of miles. The chief events of the late part of the morning were the desperate but unsuccessful attempts to expell the christians from the St. Clare passes and great Glorinia plains where a hell of a rage raged.

A column of glandelinian cavalry numbering nine million in all clashed together with general Vivian's christian cavalry forces and dragoons added to them, the glandelinian forces were crushed to fragments with thousands of five million in all slain, and five hundred thousand were taken prisoners.

these forces of Charranina And Zimmermanian and Mc-Hollistinian cavalry being repulsed but in the engagement Counting was killed and also general Flandering, with five cavalry leaders of the glandelinians, generals Flanders, Belgium, Germany, France and England were slain.

Simultaneously the town of Eva fell into the hands of Manley's army but before the glandelinians could harm a single child a torrent of christian infantry overwhelmed them in a fearful massacre of slaughter and hellstrongs of carnage and general Meddelinia of these forces was killed, three christian leaders were killed, Evangeline, Joe Rae, general Troopington, and Baldwin Harrington.

The Angelinians under general Hindale St. Clair made a resolute offensive with ten million men, and though their line had been almost withered general Fremont's glandelinians during the mortal carnage changed the position of his troops on the left wing which movement left the division of general Luckwick Baldwinson's division entirely exposed by general Henry Lemmison's guns. This on the withdrawal of almost the whole gray line at this point, as general Federalson had informed general Manley of the fact but too late to make an amendment. His divisions then trying to find another crossing of the Evangeline St. Clare creek and having crossed at the main line of the A and B railroad with five divisions, one million men each, had been advanced too far from the main glandelinian army for three hours and general Hanson having enough troops to make a general demonstration against Manley, and at the same time to fall upon the glandelinians at the railroad did so, driving Baldwinson's whole five divisions back in confusion with only three million left.

A furious demonstration was then made on the center which extended gradually to the right and the storm of hellish battle shook the country for one thousand miles.

Manley was forced to sent general Ambrose Fuller with fifteen million men from the Evangeline St. Clair railroad, to reinforce general Famin and Hellanda by way of the St. Clair crossroads these free masons having met a crash inf attack and having been beyond reach of help. This was indeed the terriblest part of the battle. The whole christian line was in action and every hill and field where the battle raged was covered with clouds of smoke and wreaths which rose up in great white flecked balls that rolled off and formed wreaths while the deep million cannon like savage roar of countless firearms mingled with the thunder of artillery in a way that showed that the if the glandelinians were making a demonstration it was an exceedingly violent and vehement one to say the least of it.....

The whole line of general Vivian's artillery was in action and two hundred thousand thousand glandelinians fell every quarter of an hour. The battle was a serious one indeed..... The glandelinians having taken the redoubts in the morning only to lose them and to retake them again. At eleven o'clock a eleven o'clock retaken by the christians, and retaken again by the Free Masons. The revolting horrors of the losses on both sides was too frightful to relate in detail.....

BIG GLANDELINIAN FORCES TENS OF MILLIONS STRONG FAIR AMMUNITION AND FIRE.....

Strange firing broke out from a battery of ten thousand cannon sending its sheet of screaming shells along the ground as they rose with the hills before Hanson's lines and exploded beyond with ear-splitting crashes. Hanson had only been at a stand point for a few minutes when the crest of a low ridge a few miles in front of Hanson's positions suddenly grew gray.

What was it. He applied his glasses and soon made it out to be the enemy who had just crowned the ridge after taking the christian redoubts behind and was not preparing for an assault on the christian center. Their presence there showed that the redoubt must have been again captured by the glandelinians though for a minute Hanson could not make out whether they were infantry or cavalry. In less than a minute they began to descend the hill right in the direction of Hanson's lines as though determined to drive his right out of its position and turn it.

The glandelinians descended with a rush but without firing. They did not advance in linear masses but scattered and defused. They came down half way in this manner the Angelinian artillery tearing big lanes among them, all the time in the most savage manner. The christian infantry fire which for five minutes had been heavy near Tribune ridge now began to roll along Hanson's lines with the roar of a million cannon, and the glandelinians who were just coming in range began to drop in whole multitudes.

Hanson did not know whether the Free Masons originally intended to attack his left or not, but to his surprise was that there came a change in the direction of the assault..... The advance now veered to the front and went to the christians all along the line with a deafening shout opening a withering fire at the same time. Hanson's whole line flamed and smoked, the opposing line being lost to sight for a time the glandelinians however meeting a withering tempest of canister and minnies. This frightful carnage lasted about two hours during which time a terrible loss of life occurred on both sides. Then the glandelinian first column of ten million strong having been cut to pieces began to withdraw carrying off the wounded as they went. But they yet, had not yet enough. For encouraged by their success in taking the redoubt and believing that they could also take this line they had no sooner withdrawn from the christian fire, than they formed and went at it again. They swept upon Hansons whole line with almost preternatural fury, and struggled there amid a seething storm of flame and smoke, a death struggle of demons. This on rage raged with unceasing fury for four hours, and millions of dead and wounded glandelinians lay in front of the christian trenches, this one column of glandelinians having been almost annihilated. The sides of the ridges were literally covered with the dead and wounded, seventy dead and wounded being counted on a space of not more than a dozen feet square. Terrible was the carnage here but the survivors were a gain repulsed and they retreated up the hill.

It could hardly be believed that they went at it again, and yet they did so and in more monstrous columns. Fifty million this time rushed forward in one long line. To Hanson who had watched the two preceding assaults it seemed madness. Because the annihilating christian fire never slackened a minute and that the christian line never wavered, while he knew that the angelinian reserves were waiting behind, ready to fall in at the least sign of wavering.

Again the scene of carnage was repeated with ten fold vehemence and the assault was delivered with seemingly crushing force. A fire severe enough to have stepped all the nations of that world broke the assaulting line of fifty million completely into thousands of fragments, and the glandelinian survivors sullenly withdrew keeping up a heavy fire and taking time to carry off their dead and wounded or at least their wounded. Still they held the redoubt, upon which they fell back apparently with the intention of holding it but they were not allowed to remain there long. The attack on the redoubt along hundreds massive lines forty miles in extent had been equally unsuccessful and the angelinians pursued the glandelinians with a murderous fire, and the seven divisions of forty million men went at them with the bayonet and after severe and terrific hand to hand fighting for two hours in the enemies trenches soon swept them out of the redoubt like a whirlwind. At four thirty the glandelinians were in retreat everywhere. The christians reoccupied the whole of their first positions besides pursuing the glandelinians a long distance with savagery. The sanitary corps had already carried off the wounded both christians and Free Masons but the glandelinians left few of the latter and only about 333,000 dead on the field. The stupendous losses could be better judged by the fearful number of knapsacks left upon the ground which was strewn with them. The main line of the christians had already begun to assemble and bury their dead. They were laid out in long rows angelinians and glandelinians alike.

TERRIFIC STORMS STORMS OF FIRE AND CARNAGE.....
JENNIE JOICE AND HER OTHER SISTERS IN PERIL.....RESCUED.....

Three days had passed, there was a terrible roar of battle in the far distance and St Claire noticed that the air was filled with pungent bling smoke. He at once applied his glass as.

"Damnation!" He screamed; "We are almost surrounded by forest fires."

He yelled for one of his servants who came on a run.

"Make preparations for flight right away," He said; "We are caught between two gigantic forest fires and the advancing enemy and many be trapped by the whole three if we delay long. Manley has been worsted and is retreating with all haste."

The servant hastened to do his bidding.

Yes St Claire you are threatened by three enemies, two forest fires and by the advancing christians and fires so terrible as to be beyond description. But your escape is in vain. You may as well repent of your sins before it is too late.

Let's turn back for a while to the main path of the forest fires.

It was the same great conflagration that had originated from the battle of Cedernine the furing of the firing during that battle having caused it to burn round the battle of Evangeline St. Clare still raging had started another one which joined in a way to encompass this location where violet and her sisters were slaves. For days it had continued to burn since its progress from Collyer and Stanek and generals Chamberlaine, Logan County, St. Clare, Illinois, Kennen, St. John, and Sullivan of great glandelinian forces opposing the christian advance from St. Clare had fallen mortally wounded their lines swept back the christians progressing on toward where violet and her sisters were held slaves.

The fires itself had spread over a wide district and was turning to be one of the worst forest fires the world had seen.... After burning for nearly a month this ocean of fire had changed its course and advanced with the roar of artillery toward the enemys lines. Whether the battle of Evangeline St. Clare was really responsible for its spread no one could tell but many declared that other forest fires originated from those that Manley must have lit on the Garnation ridges to cover his retreat was to blame.

However it advanced on its career of destruction and before general Jivian had known its treacherous character it had again changed its course advancing thirty to seventy miles an hour at certain locations making a rear like hundreds of thousands of cannon.... One of the fiercest of these fire seas was headed for Evangeline St. Clare, and threatening to overlap Manleys right wing. General Jivians lines itself was in danger from it but the great general fiercely fighting the glandelinians at Evangeline St. Clare was unconscious of the danger until he made a fierce headlong driving onslaught on Manleys right christ crushing it to fragments and rolling up the whole wing for ten miles. This same branch or it really being the main sea of them all was threatening the places where Jennie Ji Joice, Violet and her other sisters were prisoners, but Jennie and Joice's locations were already so surrounded that escape seemed utterly impossible.

St Clare realizing it decided to have all his men cut down as many trees as possible and fight the fire as desperately as possible to check the advancing conflagration.

Most of the men quickly set to work and many thousand trees went down in a few minutes. The fire was closer upon the vicinity of violet's master than Jennie's but he had a fair chance of escape.

He got his men at work to cutting down trees and clearing away large bushes while he made prew preparations for flight. He got as many wagons as possible and loaded and even forced the frightened children upon them.

When all were ready to start the approach of the conflagration could be heard already be heard, and the sky was becoming dark and heavy with the smoke clouds which looked more like typho on clouds than smoke, and which also filled the lower atmosphere with a white pall as thick as a pall. The hellish redness of the approaching conflagration could be seen plainly and Violet's master saw that there was not a single moment to lose. To the driver of each wagon he said;

"Dash down the nearest roads you come to and see that you don't get tricked by this approaching perdition! I'll take the wagon with the rest down the main swamp road. If the fire catches up with you seek some deep ravine."

After receiving other general instructions they dashed off. St. Clare with Violet on the seat beside him took off in the direction of the main road in a short time and sped down this line a cyclone.

Jennie and Ji Joice however were in the hands of cruel masters, and these to seeing their fight against the conflagration useless as their men though hundreds on in number dropped by scores finally made a dash for safety leaving all the children to the mercy of the approaching conflagration! whose booming roar was heard now so plainly in the distance.... Smoke hid objects for the distance of one rod and the atmosphere was hot and parching.

Poor Jennie did not know what to do? The other men had wanted to take her along / / / / but St. Clare had leveled a brace of pistols at them and made them come alone.

She was in the direst danger, as the beatings had made her a cripple and made her helpless. Yet she did not despair and prayed fervently. She managed to drag herself to the river near by and then suddenly she hit upon an idea. The swamp was her only refuge. But could she make it in time. The fire was already dangerously close and she could see that trees not far from her were starting to blaze fiercely. The swamp however was not very far but it was probably that the advancing sea of fire could consume it also despite the dampness of the trees.

The general dangers of the swamps were the wreaths of hanging moss and magnolia and the thick resinous foliage and the trunks which alone were really dry. Never did poor Jennie feel so sad or frightened before in her life.

The other children were too terrified to render her any aid and these were running in every direction. No escape the approaching conflagration. Jennie had recovered to curl of hair that St. Clare had taken away from her and as she looked at it she again wept bitterly.

"Oh dear Angelina!" She cried pitifully; "You who are now in heaven. Please save me from this fire, please do. I'm helpless and can't reach the swamp in time to see escape. Oh please Angelina listen to my prayer and save me. I don't fear to die but if I'm burned will never recover my remains. Oh Dear Jesus I know you can save me. Harken to my prayers. Oh please dear Jesus." In the meantime St. Clare had returned alone seeing that escape was utterly impossible. To the swamp he was afraid to go, and now he stood full well that God was standing between him and escape and he a gain blasphemed him..... He decided to take revenge, by killing Jennie in the most shocking manner.

He picked her up and carried her to the shed and seizing the other little children whom he could catch he slew them right away..... Five minute later a stranger came into the shed. It was an Angelinian in disguise it being the boy Evans. When he entered the shed, he felt his head grow dizzy and his heart sick.

"Is it possible-----is it possible-----is it possible." Said the boy kneeling down by her. "Jennie, Jennie, my poor little friend."

Tears which did honor to his manly heart fell from the boy's eyes as he bent over the poor Vivian girl.

"Oh Jennie dear-----do wake-----do speak once more-----look up. Here's your boy friend Evans. Don't-----you know-----no. I've come-----to take you-----back to-----to your father. You shan't die, you shan't die-----nor think of dying. If-----you do-----I'll kill you. I'll break my heart to think what-----you-----have suffered-----and lying in this old stinking shed here bleeding and pining your life away."

At this moment St. Clare sauntered up to the door of the shed looked in with a dogged air of coolness and turned away. Evans sat fixed with solemn awe for it seemed to him that the place was holy, and indeed it was.... He turned.

St. Clare was standing sullenly behind him. The sudden presence of this man was simply loathsome to Evans and he felt only an impulse to get away from him with as few words as possible. Fixing his dark ten blue eyes on St. Clare he said:

"I cannot describe what I think of this atrocious affair. This little girl is a little holy child whom God has always under his protection."

This little girl has undergone cruel treatment ever since she knew reason and now you have nearly killed her. This innocent blood shall have justice, I will proclaim this murder. I will expose you to general opinion."

"Do so." Said St. Clare snap ping his fingers scornfully. "I'd like to see you don doing it. Where are you going to get witnesses. How are you going to prove it. Come now. After all what a fuss, about an old little gutter-snipe from the perditions slums."

The words were as spark to a ton of powder. Evans was a lad of quick temper and avenged the insults to the helpless. Evans turned to him with an exclamation and with one indignant blow, knocked St. Clare flat upon his face, and as he stood over him blazing with wrath and defiance he would have formed no bad personification of St. Michael and the Devil. When he attempted to arise Evans kicked him in the mouth knocking some teeth outaying.

"Take this for the beatings and kicks you have administered to the little girl."

Then turning he went over to little Jennie.

The villain staggered to his feet and sprinted toward the swamp as fast as he could run. "The old Satan." Muttered Evans to himself. "How I would like to revenge this."

He picked Jennie up and carried her rapidly in the direction of the swamp. The fire was now almost upon them and the sheds began to burn and smoke. The atmosphere was stifling hot, but however Evans reached the swamp, knowing full well how to reach the advancing Christian lines.

Jennie was still conscious but by the time he reached the swamp she had her arms lovingly around his neck. He did not stop at the swamp but continued on following the main main road. Evans saw with horror that the trees of the swamp was catching fire with a screaming roar, millions of Will-o-the-wisps seemed to flare up in dazzling brightness and he soon discovered that he was pursued by an ocean of fire traveling at an awful rate. He hastened on at times pursued by the seemingly Will-o-the-wisps, by burning storms of brands and flying branches.

A hot rising wind broke loose, and smoke came swathing about and forming a pall.... Evans wondered if he would make it in time. The sea of fire catching the mignon and moss was spreading as fast as flames would over a sheet of cotton and Evans wondered if he could make it. All this while he was aroused by a terrible booming roar, the swamp was considerably large and the fire would probably only burn above but nevertheless their danger was great for the sea of blazing material would fall and envelope everything in a mass of fire below. The smoke became thicker and thicker, the roar louder and louder like thousands of cannon, and Evans could hardly breathe while the sky above seemed red as crimson. Suddenly he saw a large open space before him and sped for it and reaching it he saw that it was a vast lake full of slimy water with steam from the heat of the distant fire rising from it, and fearing quicksands Evans did not know what to do.

Yet he did not lose hope. He believed that the lake was not very deep and decided to wade across if he died for it. He was bound to save Jennie. "I wouldn't do it." Said Jennie pleadingly. "The fire is coming too fast and it only would make the water boiling hot." Evans realized it and testing the water saw that it was already too hot to wade through. What should he do? The fire behind was burning all before it and advancing with great leaps and springs among the masses of foliage and moss. Evans could already feel the tremendous heat from the fire and decided to continue his way on the road he had just left.

"If I only had an auto or something." Said Evans in despair. "The Te Then I could go ahead of this approaching conflagration. I fear we are lost." "Let me lay and ask your own safety." Begged Jennie. "I'm too heavy to carry." "Indeed I will not do any such thing." Cried Evans vehemently. "Leave you to perish just for my own safety. Why Jennie that is why I came here for I was looking for you and your sisters and found you. I trusted in God that we will rescue and if we don't we will die together. But one thing I'll not leave you behind to ask my own safety."

"But what good will it do?" Pleaded Jennie piteously. "Angeline is dead, my other sisters are probably burnt to death and your life is more valuable than a crippled body like mine."

"Angeline dead oh! Well I'm glad to say that you are badly and seriously mistaken. Angeline did not die that night. She still lives but is pining her life away for your return. Wouldn't you be willing to live to save her?"

Jennie did not answer to this and suddenly as they were reaching a cross road, they heard the wild galloping of horses and the noise of a wagon. In a moment a wagon load of children hove into view and Evans recognized the child sitting beside the driver. Evans drew his pistol and shouted:

"Haul you dirty Glandelinians haul."

Then he did so and Evans got on lying Jennie under the seat.

"Where are you going with these children?" Asked Evans sternly. "I'm trying to escape this fire." Answered the driver sullenly. "I'm not going to harm them."

But Evans was not satisfied. He was going to order him off the seat when he saw that they were being enveloped by thick rolling clouds of smoke, while a horrible screeching roar behind them arose while a hurricane of wind tore through the trees showering them with a storm of branches and almost toppling the wagon over....

"Make a dash down that road quick." Ordered Evans leveling a pistol at the driver. "Make time go as fast as they can run. I'll attend to you later."

Violet recognized Evans.

"Oh Evans is it you?" She cried as the horses started off with the frenzy of a mad dog. "How did you find Jennie?"

"As she is now." Answered Evans bitterly. "Her master has probably paid the penalty by this time. I mean to take this Glandelinian as a prisoner."

Violet looked piteously at him.

"No don't." She pleaded. "He has been kind to me and the other little girls and boys. Let him go for a new my sake."

Evans looked gloomy and said:

"He is a Glandelinian child laborer and I have to take him prisoner. It is my duty. But if he has been kind to you I'll plead for him. But Jennie's master I would not let free if I caught him."

"How was he so cruel and wicked to poor Jennie?" Asked Violet.

"Cruel, wicked." Said the boy with affected surprise. "You don't know what you are saying, or what I mean dear Violet. I found her in a dirty shed lying on the ground bleeding and helpless. What that man did to her I could see by the marks on her body, and I gave her a good kick a good wallop for calling her a G." "Outcries of the hell's slums."

Violet looked sad and said:

"If you knew how kind my master had been you would not take him prisoner. You don't know him because you was not in my place. His name as he told me was Hindale St. Clare and he treated us children like his own instead of his slaves."

"Why Violet you have really taken such a fancy to the man that I shall be jealous. If the is really what you say why did he not speak up. Most Glandelinians are full of excuses and lies when taken prisoner and will tell an untruth as fast as they can speak. The only way to manage Glandelinian prisoners is to put them down at once and not let them open their mouths."

"But general Hindale is no mean Glandelinian like these others and you must know that I never tell what is not true."

"No angels like you never lie." Said Evans and "And I believe you. I won't make him a prisoner then. But how are we going to get out of this swamp? There don't seem to be no end to it and the fire is rapidly gaining on us."

"I don't know." Said Violet. "This swamp is very large and takes three days to go through. I believe we are doomed. But what care I. Poor Angeline is dead, Baldwin and Braggard are our enemies and Joice and my other sisters are probably gone!"

Evans did not answer to this, but discovered that they were reaching a large grass plain.

"We are leaving the swamp after all cried Evans gaily. "No Violet we will be with the Christians once more. And don't despise Violet. Dear Angeline is not dead."

"But Baldwin has been cruel to her. I cannot bear to tell you what he did. But she is still alive."

"Oh Jack you may be fooling at me just to cheer me up." Exclaimed Violet.

"My dear Violet I'm telling the truth. You see a terrible hissing of burning hay startled them and turning their heads they found themselves in greater peril for only five hundred yards from them was a gigantic rolling cloud of smoke arising from the grass in the plain, and they had no sooner got themselves out of the plain when a sea of flame swept past.

Then all at once the horses seemed to be running away dashing down another road at break neck speed.

"Stop them," shouted Evans; "They will upset; (.....)"))

"Glandelinians are after us," said Hindale. "I'm doing this on purpose. Look can't you see them. They are cavalry men."

Evans glanced toward where Hindale pointed and saw graycoated horsemen swarming toward them from the outline of the woods and Jennie recognized a man leading who looked like Joice's master. She knew him for she had seen him buy her. Evans saw that it was impossible to escape them for they seemed spreading out all along the stretch of unburned sodas intercept him and the children. He dared not fire for he knew that it would be fatal as mostly all Glandelinians are sharp shooters. The leading general Alfred St. Clare was coming at a tearing rate and on how Evans longed to shoot him down.

"Stop you christian dogs," Evans harked about; "We want y those two vivian girls."

Evans did not obey and legged the driver to make his horses go faster.

But common horses could not outdistance war-horses and Evans saw the gray coats under Henriques' father gain rapidly led now in pursuit by Harry Hainbreadth Harry.

"Stop confound you," shouted the general; "Halter I'll fire despite orders not to fire first."

Quickly Evans hit upon a plan. A bundle of bad paper lay in the wagon and Evans quickly unwrapped it and spread it out.

"Hindale have you got any matches," asked Evans; "The only way to escape is to fire the grass here."

"Yes I have plenty," said Hindale at a glance and he handed Evans a large box full.

The forest fire had set fire to the prairie itself thus putting off the escape of Evans in that direction and so the only means was to set a fire in the path of the advancing enemy. So Evans realizing it decided to start a new fire and check the Glandelinians. He set one piece of paper after another on fire and it threw it into the grass which caught like oil and soon became a long line of fire moving swiftly toward the frenzied Glandelinians. In an instant there was tremendous confusion among the graycoats and they fought among themselves to get away from the two lines of advancing fire from behind and front.

Harry Hainbreadth Harry cursed and swore with all the vehemence he could and stormed with rage and dashing among the men checked the consternation and ordered them to seek some other way and go after them again.

The Glandelinians endeavored to do this but being in danger from the two branches of fire that threatened to hem them in they retreated hastily toward the direction they had come Harry holding with rage and disgust.

"I guess they must be raving mad," said Evans laughing; "It is wonder I did not think of it before."

"How many were there?" asked Jennie faintly.

"I did not count but to me they looked like an army in pursuit of us. But who was that fierce individual that you looked at so closely?"

"The man who bought Joice. Oh I fear he has killed her."

"I doubt it," said Evans; "He may have escaped him and thought I had."

Hindale St. Clare had just reached the edge of a clearing in the swamp when Evans saw a little girl lying by the roadside. The far distant part of the woods beyond were also burning and the sky was heavy with the rolling clouds of smoke.

Hindale stopped the horses and Evans dismounting went over to the little girl.

"My gracious it's Catherine," he gasped.

He shook her gently and to his relief she opened his eyes.

"What remarkable beauty!" thought Hindale St. Clare. My cousin Eva who died was very pretty and so was poor Joice St. Clare but these little vivians indeed have dazzling beauty. I don't see how the Glandelinians can treat them so."

Evans carefully lifted Catherine and carried her to the wagon. My how Jennie and Violet did cry with joy. She was placed among them then they once more resumed their trip. Suddenly they encountered another man with a wagon load of children going an opposite way.

Hindale directed Evans to take the same road and soon other countenances every one of Hindale's overseers were following the same route. Evans thought that the trouble with the Glandelinians was over but Harry Hainbreadth Harry men had followed secretly and rapidly gained upon the fugitives. One of the overseers saw them and blazed away dropping a score of them. A general was also wounded and that was Alfred St. Clare. At the sound of the reports Evans gave a start.

"The soldiers are following us," said one of the men (grasping his rifle firmly; "There is a lot of them too and there is a black man tied among them hand and foot."

"He looks like poor old Uncle Tom," (unsaid another man; "The man looks like him anyway. How did that nigger get caught by them free masons anyway?"

"I have a mind to shoot down his captors no matter what the cost," said Evans; "But I guess all of us had better make a dash or they will kill us."

In a few minutes the liveliest race ever seen occurred. Six horses and wagons were racing madly down the road while the Glandelinians were coming a tearing behind opening a withering storm of fire and yelling like demons.

One of the overseers was hit but remained in the seat, five others were killed and three others were wounded bullets whistling all around them but the drivers continued to lash the horses who galloped at a breakneck speed the wild action of the wagons scaring many of the children.

Unfortunately the wheel of the rear wagon came off, the guard being killed by a shot and the wagon overtaken. Evans and all the overseers however started firing as furiously as they could reload and firing in such a way that the Glandelinians going down in tens with even some of their officers were compelled to halt and all the children managed to scramble into one of the wagons which had halted. Then away they flew the Glandelinians trying in vain to shoot down the driver but only hit every overseer who sprang from the wagon like ten pins.

The five fugitives now reached a wildly rushing stream but they dashed across the pursuing Glandelinians following close behind y willing and firing fiercely.

The Glandelinians reached the stream just as the last wagon crossed and dashed in with a tremendous splash.

Violet had never seen the Glandelinians pursue so desperately before and she discovered that the most persistent pursuers were boys boyscouts with Starring Fredrick and Darguin in the lead. No wonder the chase was so furious. The river was swarming with the pursuers who again started a general firing; the bullets bringing down every overseer of one of the wagons and the drivers also. Other men took the place of the slain drivers the fugitives now reaching a small meadow surrounded by burning woods.

They dashed madly across the stream just as the last wagon crossed and dashed in with a tremendous splash.

Violet had never seen the Glandelinians pursue so desperately before and she discovered that the most persistent pursuers were boys boyscouts with Starring Fredrick and Darguin in the lead. No wonder the chase was so furious. The river was swarming with the pursuers who again started a general firing; the bullets bringing down every overseer of one of the wagons and the drivers also. Other men took the place of the slain drivers the fugitives now reaching a small meadow surrounded by burning woods.

They dashed madly across the stream just as the last wagon crossed and dashed in with a tremendous splash.

Violet had never seen the Glandelinians pursue so desperately before and she discovered that the most persistent pursuers were boys boyscouts with Starring Fredrick and Darguin in the lead. No wonder the chase was so furious. The river was swarming with the pursuers who again started a general firing; the bullets bringing down every overseer of one of the wagons and the drivers also. Other men took the place of the slain drivers the fugitives now reaching a small meadow surrounded by burning woods.

They dashed madly across the stream just as the last wagon crossed and dashed in with a tremendous splash.

Violet had never seen the Glandelinians pursue so desperately before and she discovered that the most persistent pursuers were boys boyscouts with Starring Fredrick and Darguin in the lead. No wonder the chase was so furious. The river was swarming with the pursuers who again started a general firing; the bullets bringing down every overseer of one of the wagons and the drivers also. Other men took the place of the slain drivers the fugitives now reaching a small meadow surrounded by burning woods.

They dashed madly across the stream just as the last wagon crossed and dashed in with a tremendous splash.

Violet had never seen the Glandelinians pursue so desperately before and she discovered that the most persistent pursuers were boys boyscouts with Starring Fredrick and Darguin in the lead. No wonder the chase was so furious. The river was swarming with the pursuers who again started a general firing; the bullets bringing down every overseer of one of the wagons and the drivers also. Other men took the place of the slain drivers the fugitives now reaching a small meadow surrounded by burning woods.

They dashed madly across the stream just as the last wagon crossed and dashed in with a tremendous splash.

Violet had never seen the Glandelinians pursue so desperately before and she discovered that the most persistent pursuers were boys boyscouts with Starring Fredrick and Darguin in the lead. No wonder the chase was so furious. The river was swarming with the pursuers who again started a general firing; the bullets bringing down every overseer of one of the wagons and the drivers also. Other men took the place of the slain drivers the fugitives now reaching a small meadow surrounded by burning woods.

They dashed madly across the stream just as the last wagon crossed and dashed in with a tremendous splash.

Violet had never seen the Glandelinians pursue so desperately before and she discovered that the most persistent pursuers were boys boyscouts with Starring Fredrick and Darguin in the lead. No wonder the chase was so furious. The river was swarming with the pursuers who again started a general firing; the bullets bringing down every overseer of one of the wagons and the drivers also. Other men took the place of the slain drivers the fugitives now reaching a small meadow surrounded by burning woods.

They dashed madly across the stream just as the last wagon crossed and dashed in with a tremendous splash.

Violet had never seen the Glandelinians pursue so desperately before and she discovered that the most persistent pursuers were boys boyscouts with Starring Fredrick and Darguin in the lead. No wonder the chase was so furious. The river was swarming with the pursuers who again started a general firing; the bullets bringing down every overseer of one of the wagons and the drivers also. Other men took the place of the slain drivers the fugitives now reaching a small meadow surrounded by burning woods.

They dashed madly across the stream just as the last wagon crossed and dashed in with a tremendous splash.

Violet had never seen the Glandelinians pursue so desperately before and she discovered that the most persistent pursuers were boys boyscouts with Starring Fredrick and Darguin in the lead. No wonder the chase was so furious. The river was swarming with the pursuers who again started a general firing; the bullets bringing down every overseer of one of the wagons and the drivers also. Other men took the place of the slain drivers the fugitives now reaching a small meadow surrounded by burning woods.

They dashed madly across the stream just as the last wagon crossed and dashed in with a tremendous splash.

Violet had never seen the Glandelinians pursue so desperately before and she discovered that the most persistent pursuers were boys boyscouts with Starring Fredrick and Darguin in the lead. No wonder the chase was so furious. The river was swarming with the pursuers who again started a general firing; the bullets bringing down every overseer of one of the wagons and the drivers also. Other men took the place of the slain drivers the fugitives now reaching a small meadow surrounded by burning woods.

They dashed madly across the stream just as the last wagon crossed and dashed in with a tremendous splash.

Violet had never seen the Glandelinians pursue so desperately before and she discovered that the most persistent pursuers were boys boyscouts with Starring Fredrick and Darguin in the lead. No wonder the chase was so furious. The river was swarming with the pursuers who again started a general firing; the bullets bringing down every overseer of one of the wagons and the drivers also. Other men took the place of the slain drivers the fugitives now reaching a small meadow surrounded by burning woods.

They dashed madly across the stream just as the last wagon crossed and dashed in with a tremendous splash.

Violet had never seen the Glandelinians pursue so desperately before and she discovered that the most persistent pursuers were boys boyscouts with Starring Fredrick and Darguin in the lead. No wonder the chase was so furious. The river was swarming with the pursuers who again started a general firing; the bullets bringing down every overseer of one of the wagons and the drivers also. Other men took the place of the slain drivers the fugitives now reaching a small meadow surrounded by burning woods.

They dashed madly across the stream just as the last wagon crossed and dashed in with a tremendous splash.

Violet had never seen the Glandelinians pursue so desperately before and she discovered that the most persistent pursuers were boys boyscouts with Starring Fredrick and Darguin in the lead. No wonder the chase was so furious. The river was swarming with the pursuers who again started a general firing; the bullets bringing down every overseer of one of the wagons and the drivers also. Other men took the place of the slain drivers the fugitives now reaching a small meadow surrounded by burning woods.

They dashed madly across the stream just as the last wagon crossed and dashed in with a tremendous splash.

Violet had never seen the Glandelinians pursue so desperately before and she discovered that the most persistent pursuers were boys boyscouts with Starring Fredrick and Darguin in the lead. No wonder the chase was so furious. The river was swarming with the pursuers who again started a general firing; the bullets bringing down every overseer of one of the wagons and the drivers also. Other men took the place of the slain drivers the fugitives now reaching a small meadow surrounded by burning woods.

approach of the christians. We cannot escape the Old Mission." Said Eva as she came out this was just to find you and succede and on hand bound to let you out of the clutches of the Free Mason. Your sister Angeline will die surely if she don't see you within a couple of hours or days. I mean for the doctor said no. he is paining her life away. Violet saw by his looks that he was determined to escape with them under any conditions and wondered how could he do it: the landelinians were swarming in all directions to intercept him.

"I know that you are a very brave boy Evans, and mean to save us." Said Violet. "But I don't see how you can for the landelinians seem determined to get us at all cost."

All of a sudden a swarm of purple coats came dashing from the banks rushing into the river from four directions and opening with a clattering roar. "Damnation!" "Screamed Hairbreadth Harry!" "We have run into an ambush!" The landelinians fought desperately the leader escaping the landelinians said confusion fifty of the graycoats being mowed down and the rest escaped many being wounded however. Other bodies of the Angelinians had attacked the landelinians who had on their way on but succeeded in only recapturing two and with heavy loss at that. They tried in vain to overtake the other regiments but the landelinians showed such a bold front, that though the Angelinians finally succeeded in recapturing them they lost many leaders.

They however made off with Hindala's wagon pursued by the obvious landelinians under general Maurice Nelly.

"How far are we from the christian lines?" Asked Evans of one of them. "We are quite a ways." Said the Angelinian. "But they are coming this way and a then!"

At this moment they appeared and at the sight of them the landelinians wheeled their horses and retreated swiftly. One of them took Evans place and several attended to Jennie Catherine and voice who also appeared to be in the wagon bandaging their wounds throughout. It was light in the night when the heat of the day was recaptured with the remainder of Violet's sisters and midnight and when the main portions of the christian armies were encountered. The wagons were taken in their possession while Evans and two others hurried off with theivian girls to find general Vivian. Their way was red with the glare of the distant conflagration and by his Evans could see plainly where he was going. The other two slips of general Vivian army had halted and Evans passing through mine suddenly came upon Angeline who was sleeping upon a cot under a large oak tree.

Evans said something to the men carrying the little girls settling their little baggage down on a long bench near by Angeline's couch placing a pillow under each which several men handed to them.

"Go and notify the two generals." Said Evans who still held Jennie. "I'll wake Angeline in a minute."

One of the men hurried off to do Evans bidding. The other little girls alone were not asleep and Evans sat Jennie down beside Angeline who lay robed in one of the whitest dresses he had ever seen her wear. The cot couch itself was draped in white and was strewn with all kinds of flowers. Angeline's heavy eye lashes dropped softly on the pure white cheek and her head was turned a little to one side a look of rapture and repose over spreading it.

A wreath of small white foil flowers circled her pure golden head and this sight made Angeline's sisters believe that she was dead after all. She had. They had almost forgotten how the Angelinians treated little heroines and all Violet might be kept up to the last. Angeline's head was back. She recognized dear little Violet instantly and with a cry of joy she threw her arms around Violet and kissed her sobbing at the same time.

"Oh dear Angeline." said Violet. "I thought you was dead. When did you get better?"

"I'm not quite well yet but am getting better quickly." Answered Angeline. "Oh do you know Violet. Baldwin is in great trouble and the soldiers won't forgive him. He had fought with uncle and then threw us against the wall and hurt me badly even after I gave him one of my curls. Yet I forgive him but the others won't."

"I don't feel a bad guy thrust when she heard this. If it had not been for that I would have been alright now." Continued Angeline and it sadly. "But God saved me as I was flung against the wall but Hanson broke the force of the blow and so I was only badly cut up and main maimed. I can walk a little now but I feel weak yet."

Violet had a twinge and forgave readily too but at first she felt little for Baldwin and said:

"I don't blame the Angelinians for punishing him. He might have killed you if Hanson had not broken the force of the blow and I cannot decide either, till I be his friend or not. I know we are innocent."

"It's not that." Inter-upted Violet. "He found out the right will doer and was friendly again before this occurred. Hanson probably threatened to shoot him and probably he intended to throw me at him to stop him. Though he had threatened him with throwing me to the floor. But Violet forgave him for my sake and don't say nothing of it to my other sisters. I know their nature. They might not forgive him at all."

Violet looked pitiously at Angeline and said: "Your other sisters are lying on the benches. They do know of it and so do I know of it for Evans who rescued us told us, but would not tell much."

Angeline looked sad and but Violet placed an arm around her and said: "Believe they will forgive Baldwin and so will I and Jennie. But if he don't repent of it how can we save him from the punishment?"

Violet gave a start for the spirit like form of little "Evangelina" that was standing a few feet away looking at her like a reproaching angel. Though she had never read about her Violet knew her well and her appearance had startled her.

"Why Eva my dear friend." She exclaimed: "I thought you were killed by the landelinians during the Calvinian rebellion. How did you escape?" "Everybody says I'm killed." Said Eva with a gay laugh. "Why the doctors have saved me though I had nearly been cut to pieces. Are these other little angels your sisters?"

"Yes." Said Violet. "Come over to me. Don't be so afraid. Angeline won't care." "I know and I'm not afraid." Said Eva coming toward her like a floating white cloud. "It is a long time since I saw you and yet I know where you and your other sisters were and told the generals all. And then I directed your friend Evans where to find you. But I was surprised for you were rescued sooner than I expected."

At this moment Jennie awoke and then came the two great generals. At the sight of the little girls they gave a cry and the scene of joy that ensued could not be described. As soon as general Vivian and Hanson had controlled themselves Eva said:

"Can't you forgive Baldwin now. He heard that the little girls had returned and wanted to see them very much."

"Well under any conditions he can't see them until Jennie and the others get well and are able to be around again." Said general Vivian sharply. "An' you don't believe a word of it. I think he is only shamming. But anyway he cannot see them until they are entirely well."

"But general Vivian he wants to be brought." "Enough. He will be brought when all traitors go." bellowed general Vivian fiercely. "You are a good girl but just the same I don't want no pleading for him."

You keep away from the guardhouse there you was yesterday as you have no business there. If you are seen there again I'll have you expelled from the army on the charge of harboring a prisoner. I want no pleading for that brute understand!"

But Evangelina looked downcast and aggrieved and turned away. Violet believed that her father was only pretending but he was not. But he saw the downcast look on Eva's face and drawing her gently to him said in a kinder tone:

"Listen Eva it is always right to be kind to prisoners but it is not proper to go in or around the guard house without permission. I don't reprove you because you or Baldwin but because the Angelinians complained about your going around their guard house. I allow no one to go around the guard house, even my daughters without permission for the reason that they might unintentionally cause the escape of the prisoners, and you can ask the Vivian girls about it and they will tell you that I'm right. And Evangelina even if you was in my place you wouldn't want strangers to be near your guard house would you?"

"I at should feel like you general." Said Eva. "But then there is a mistake. One of the generals there permitted me to enter. I didn't sneak in."

"But he ought not to have done so and I never told him to and he is guilty of disobedience. At any rate I cannot let Baldwin see my daughters until they are well enough to walk around. But it is impossible for me under any condition to forgive him for he acted like a traitor in securing the escape of those three landelinian boys whom I had placed under his charge. If the government I don't let him of to do anything for him. I'll have to consult the Pope. He alone is our main head and probably can save Baldwin from the disgrace."

Violet and Angeline almost wept when she heard this. "Oh Papa, why did you be so cruel as to tell them?" She asked

Asked pleadingly and reproachfully. "He was a friend of your's and did that to anger you."

"Why was I so cruel to tell them?" Said general Vivian in surprise. "Why Angeline dear I never told them. He government had learned of it through the correspondents you know our armies are full of them."

Violet and Angeline also realized this and looked downcast.

"Oh why did Baldwin be so foolish," said Violet. "He knows what would happen for losing his temper and yet he would not care." And she cried as if her heart would break.

"Maybe I can do something for him," said Eva. "I'll write to the government right away and tell him all I know. In the meantime a big tent had been erected or raised over Violet and her sisters and Eva immediately started to write the letter for the government. In a few minutes Violet alighted like a bird on the rounds of her chair and behind her and peeped over her shoulder.

"Oh Violet Vivian what beautiful writing you are doing there!"

Eva put her little golden head close to hers and continued:

"I wish I could help you for I have learned to write some myself."

Violet admitted that she could and the two commenced a grave and anxious discussion as to one equally earnest and each the letter was finished.

"I hope-----" began Violet.

"I am Violet," said General Vivian's voice coming in at this moment.

Violet and Eva both started.

"What's here said General Vivian coming up and looking at the writing."

"Oh its that letter I said I would write. It's very important for I'm sure the government will forgive Baldwin for my sake."

"I wouldn't discourage either one of you but there is no word of the letter. I just had General Baldwin out of the guardhouse and what should happen, but that I was startled by a fierce voice behind me saying:

"General Vivian! your excellency that man is an imposter, disguised as me. Do not let him go. He has liberated those three lads you placed in my care while prisoners and not long ago he had gotten off with my plans. He and another rascal are in league with each other."

I turned and saw what appeared to me another General Baldwin and could not know what to make of it. At his approach the Baldwin prisoner I had suddenly gave me a blow that sent me sprawling against a tree and shouting now detachments of Angelinians are after him under General who leads the pursuit. It was a spy an imposter who had did all this. So now that it is discovered I'll leave it all to you and your sisters to tell him the whole story and Braggard also for he never had a hand in it either."

Eva looked surprised and happy and Angelina could not speak for joy. Baldwin and Braggard immediately appeared and the two generals told the whole story.

Three days later Jennie and Jole were well able to be about though at times Evans who was recovering from his own wounds had to help Angelina to walk.

"I really do wish this war was over," she said one day to Evans when news of an impending battle was rumored the Christians marching on to Marconino. "It has deprived me of all my friends and two brothers who were killed at Stanok." And tears stood in her eyes.

All the Glendelinian general are stubborn," said Evans. "It is their stubbornness that causes the war to last so long. These Glendelinian generals must think that these frightful battles are stage dramas. Shewman is the same way," said Violet. "He is fighting hard now with Nicknell who is trying to prevent him from making a junction with only Manley."

"I think I had better carry you for a while," said Evans as he saw that Angelina was breathing hard. "You seem played out."

"Angelina readily consented and he carried her as tenderly as if she was a very valuable vase.

"You do not intend to go in any more signal stations?" "Do you?" asked Evans anxiously.

"I do don't know," said Angelina. "Eva said that he would not let me under any circumstances and that here after I and my sisters may have lead only scouting parties. That is when we are well."

"When you are well by ain't you well now?"

"Yes but I ain't well enough to run about and ride horses like I used to," said Angelina sadly. "It will be a long time before I'm well altogether. I'm still sick and awfully weak."

Evans realized this with a pang and he fretted if she would ever recover her strength again. She had been prostrated by the Glendelinian spy's angry action and the sickness and sorrow over her sisters. If she ever did recover it seemed that it would be a long time. Toward the afternoon a halt was made and

Evans sat Angelina down under a wide palm tree as the day was waning the tree affording a cool shade. It was toward the evening when General Vivian riding toward the tree he heard gay laughing. He hastily rode over to the spot and when he saw made him laugh too. A feeling of awe stole over him.

There sat Evans on one of the mossy stones near the tree every one of his hat on holes stuck full of tripodal flowers, and Violet and Angelina were laughing were hanging a wreath of roses around his neck while little Eva sat on his knee like a chip-sparrow also laughing.

"Oh Evans you look so funny," said Jennie who was sitting near him. Evans had a softer benevolent smile and enjoyed them as much as his little sister friends. Angelina was behind him, placing a wreath of jessamine on his head while Jole stood by with a wreath of daisy the whole of them looking more like celestial beings for sure with the flowers it being a pretty sight indeed. General Vivian rode away not caring to disturb them in their happy hour.

which would enable Violet and her sisters to fix out the plan of the expedition of Abbieann. However by social route, the vivian girls themselves were able to come themselves, and as Gertrude had advised which seemed best, it was decided to try George Zimmermann, and see if he would be able to pass the qualifications to become a boy scout. He was surprised therefore when on the 30th of August he was summoned before one of the Princesses, and it happened to be Jennie vivian.

She asked him first:

"Would you like to become an Abbieannian boy scout?"

"J Yes Princess," he answered.

"Just call me Jennie," she as advised smiling so sweetly upon him that he winced. "What is your Nationality?"

"German."

"What Country were you ever in besides Germany?"

"American, Canada, Canada, and South America. My mother is not German though. She's Irish."

"Irish boy. That sounds good to begin with, part German and part Irish. How long have you went to school?"

"Five years in Germany and four in America?"

"Have you passed any examinations?"

"Yes."

"How many?"

"Three."

"Can you speak any other language besides German and Abbieannian?"

"I can speak English."

"So can I. That's all the better. Gertrude said you couldn't."

"I didn't think of mentioning it."

"I see. You haven't got any proofs though that you passed the examinations."

"Yes Jennie, I kept them nicely reserved. I have them in a book in my satchel. Gertrude knowing why I was summoned by you advised me to bring the papers. Here they are."

Jennie looked them over, and said:

"I must gain the approval of my sisters. Where are they Jack? To her aide-de-camp."

"Where are who?"

"My sisters."

"They are with Gertrude. I'll go and bring them," he answered and did so promptly. When they came she showed them Jack three different examination papers, and they looked them over carefully. Pretty good for his age and small term of school," said Violet. "So he can understand, and read, German, Irish, French, and Abbieannian and also English. That's remarkable for his age believe me. Why with his knowledge of these languages sisters we can surely use him as an advanced scout. This brings him a pull sure enough, and besides what he has done for Gertrude and her followers, gives him a strong qualification yet. How old are you George?"

He told her.

He expected she would ask questions as to where he was born, who his parents were, and so forth and make a lot of time wasted, but he was surprised to find that she then only asked:

"You're a Catholic like all of us are you not?"

"I sure am," he answered. "I was baptized in St Peter's Church."

"What were your parents' names?" she asked.

He told her.

"What!" she exclaimed suddenly looking at her sisters.

"Are you sure you're right?"

"Yes," he answered. "They were drowned in the flood when the raft struck our boat."

"I don't think you are sure about that," said Joice herself while her sisters nodded their approval.

"Because," added Catherine we have records of the names of refugees in general vivian army, and there are names of Frank, and Jim, and Zimmermann among them, who said they lost a boy in the flood, when a boat they were riding in was struck. My boy you sure have good luck and God has Blessed you for our service. I'm sure by bringing them safe through the disaster."

"Were they rescued?" He gasped.

"No," she answered. "They managed to save themselves. The water was not deep where the boat was hit, and they were able to wade ashore. But they think sure you are lost. I'm going to wire news to general vivian army right away that you are safe. Don't take it too hard lad," she added. "I know how it feels to know after all your parents have been spared to you."

George sure could not know how to express his gratitude over this pleasant discovery, and this made him more willing yet to serve the Abbieannian Country for Thanksgiving to God for His merciful Mercy. Catherine went off right away to send a note to general vivian, to find the boys parents, stating facts, and telling that the boy George Zimmermann their son was safe in general Aronburg's army, and soon to be a boy scout, for they knew from the statements of the two refugees they promised Our Blessed Lord to allow their boy to serve Abbieannia if He would save him.

"Now said Now," said Jennie. "My boy, we must excuse you for your knowledge. When you want to be a scout you must know plenty. Were you ever one before?"

"I was for three years in Germany."

"That makes you go a step farther. How much in knowledge in Geography and History are you?"

"Very good. I passed my examination for that, but lost the papers."

She asked him to explain what he knew of Geographical lessons and he did so splendidly well. She and her sisters too found he knew lots of signals, knew the ways and works of all girl and boy scouts of Abbieannia knew their "camp-fire" signal calls, flag drills, and everything in boy scout life that is known, (girls having same drills and works) and this pleased her and her sisters very good. Every test they put him through, he accomplished without the slightest mistake, he could also work a telegraph, and put one up and so forth. Everything that a boy scout should know, he knew very well. Then she said:

"There's one thing, you told Gertrude and others a story about us."

"A story?"

"Yes."

"What do you mean?"

"That we saved you from the enemy."

"Didn't you help me escape from the enemy's camp that day. You sure did or I was dreaming."

"You had the story all mixed up," said Daisy. "You must have been absent minded at that time. We have still kept the records of that affair. Don't you remember that day you decided to try and make an escape from the enemy's lines, and when first seeing us there, and mistaking us for child slaves you somehow without our knowing how, got us away with you. You rescued us, and you told Gertrude we rescued you."

George suddenly remembered that she was right.

"Good gosh. That's right. But please don't tell anyone. Let them still think it. Will you?"

"Well at your request I will," laughed Daisy. "But for being a scout I believe you'll pass."

"When are you going to ask your father to let me be one?" asked George.

"Ask Father," laughed the girls in a chorus. "He has given up power over everything. Only we and He and our Uncle has the say. We can pass that ourselves, but we'll have to send for Governmental papers, which will be brought to you with our names on it. Here's a slip of paper. Needn't read what's on it," she added. "Just sign your name, address or what army you were in, and age there."

He did so very carefully in Abbieannian however.

"Now sign this," she said producing another slip of paper, and he did so.

She and her sisters then signed their own names, with approval and then sent for Gertrude, who when she came, with Angelina Ritchie, were asked to sign their names as with assent.

"Now I'll see that these get's to Angelina Agatha by wireless telephone," said Violet. "When we get the papers from there, you're in. Seeing your qualifications, and as we have lost two scout officers, we're putting you in the place of one as a 'replacement'."

"Oh how can I ever repay you," he asked.

"By doing your work well," she answered. "Then she said to Gertrude:"

"We put Jennie in. She's been such a help you our sister Angelina when she was ill, that we simply couldn't refuse the request. Many of the others wished her to be their mascot, and so she is. That's the best honor we can do to a little girl of her age. Very few can be a mascot and therefore we made her one. We got papers for Jean and Jack Saunders too. They're mascots too."

"Mascots?" gasped Gertrude. "You don't mean?"

"We do. They proved their mettle unusually and do deserve it."

"How can they ever repay or pay you Violet?" said Gertrude. "You have sure been good to us all."

"You can repay us easily," said Joice. "By keeping to the idea of helping us in the plan for capturing the results of the disaster."

"We wish to find the cause of the disaster," said Gertrude. "By the way Prin cease, I will try to do anything positive." said Gertrude. "By the way Prin cease, how did you fare out with Jack Saunders, whom you gave one more chance."

"He proved his mettle as a real coward," said Violet. "But it was not we who shot him. It was through his cowardice we were taken again. The Glandelinians shot him to death as he tried to escape."

"Good riddance," said Gertrude scornfully. "I ought to have shot him myself long ago. We must never take foreigners in our ranks again without first testing them. But now let's forget that and how about going on with the plans. I'm most anxious to begin."

"I don't know what to do yet," said Jennie looking kind of sheepishly. "Like the wind rules the waves, the Glandelinian armies under the Tamerlins rules all the territory of Abbieann, and now if driving every one out of Bengall county. It is like blow blowing back the waters from the shallow places in the Red sea. I believe it seems the hosts of christian armies there lack leaders with foresight those who are or whatever their military education are are not above asking advice about the nature of the territory."

"To be sure," said Angeline Riches. "Supposing the Glandelinians did not make the disaster, why do they try to prevent any one from coming there, and are even frustrating scientists now?"

"That is mysterious but suspicious," put in Gertrude herself. "However the Glandelinians may be taking advantage of the condition--and therefore they must have had the ability to make the disaster, but the wisest thing we can do in investigating the place is to make the best possible use of the existing state of the weather. You know it can be pointed out that any battles planned were by our officers more to the enemy, and the enemy himself had planned battles and campaigns without regard to the prevailing or probable weather, and which all to frequently resulted in disaster. Our generals could wait till weather is unfavorable against the enemy at Abbieann and then strike. None of our commanders, however great his skill, nor however large his army on our side, ever dared to neglect the weather. Last year the great Glandelinian Master of generals, Mic-Holleston Johnston learned this lesson to his sorrow. He had as we all know entered Northern Calvernia with 1,567,899 men in November and was forced by December to retreat, leaving in his mad rush for safety a handful of men remnant of his once grand 'Armee' to make that way best as they could to warmer states. The weather had deprived this Glandelinian general of a well earned victory."

"But how could weather help us out in our plans?" said Joice. General Phelenn in Tamerline and the others are able despite all weather conditions to often up upset military movements. It seems we have to do some sort of too dangerous but secret scouting work around or near those Craters. There only is some sort of evidence left. This is the age of "Smoke screens" from forest fires, of dangerous gas attacks. Yet it seems impossible now to think of it, when I first intended to have it pulled through. We were thinking of postponing it ourselves, when you suggested it, so you really wish "Yes, take advantage of the weather." We didn't think you proposed to back out of it."

"Well we had thought of doing so, even Dargar had his heart set against our proposition and he told us lots of the dangers of the place. We are fallen on strenuous days, for now our armies seriously purpose to regulate the war and chase away the Glandelinian Glandelinian armies. We argued with Dargar, and naturally there is argument and did difference of opinion. I know, for he told me so and my sisters also, he had an interview with you, and you sent him away refusing his proposition. We told him we could get arms to displace the Tamerlins from the Abbieann Territory. He said it can't be done. I told him "Come and see some day."

"There is one man who would be the proper person to refer this dispute," said Mildred Maxwell. "And he is George Gingore Adelfab the great Geminian leader whose son you know is a famous scout boy scout and spy always operating successfully in the enemy's line for us. He is the head of the Gemini officer and higher than Dargar. We could have him talk it over."

"Where is he now?" asked Violet.

"He is lying wounded in general Aronburg's headquarters."

"That wouldn't do us any good just now," declared Joice. And besides space and time is limited and in this review we are having the plans for our expedition to Abbieann must be given the right of way. Therefore

Such fires are observed during this "beautiful war" in many sections of our country, and are quite frequent throughout our southern State of Angelinia too. If we have no evidence against the enemy of these disasters, then how were they formed. Campers cannot be blamed, and there were no thunderstorms to do it either. There was no lightning to strike anything!

How were the fires formed? Some say even clouds can form from smoke if smoke reaches a colder race region above us, and that it is also a product of the combustion of turpentine and risen that may be in the trees thus burning. What we now propose to do is, in brief not to wait for better scientists to find out what is the cause of Abbieann's destruction, but try the work ourselves, with the help of Scientists, and get aid as the need requires. Strangely enough we know the flood itself is in connection with these explosions and which has relieved its latest and most significant application. He who would investigate these things must be a scientist, and we have no better one than the young man we wish to employ and that is Walter Starring. Many of the scientists think there must be some way to get through the Abbieann region despite the enemy armies being there. Perhaps this can be done, and perhaps not, but most of the investigators, especially Dargar, and his helper William Schlender say that this is just like putting the cart before the horse, and expect the cart to pull the horse. As it is not lightning that makes these forest fires, it also was not eruptions that destroyed the towns of Pelgal County, and Bengall State. And besides excavations now in progress by others we do not know whom to mention there are so many under the auspices of the Gemini, and the Calvernian government indicate the possible possibility of comparing these disasters with the same as at Lake Salicla and elsewhere. It seems feasible. Of course Dargar told me last week, when we were back in the christian lines, that near that locality, forest fires are again also, and smoke fogs, whether over what is left of Abbieann or through the explosion region or over the flood fields is essentially a wall of smoke coming there at times would too would prevent our work without difficulty. Quite a remarkable fact too for while the smoke often rests on the ground like vapor fogs winds can make it spring into the air and float away. We know smoke never stands still and is always rising and fading more than fog of vapors do but yet at the same time continue to issue from the fires.

Sometimes it seems to me as if the explosions may have been from setred munitions in secret tunnels exist or existed. Experiments of the debris by the investigators prove too that there are no such things as volcanic matter. It is not however under such proofs that we wish to prosecute our work. Our hope is different, and I believe we should take advantage of the fact when the smoke for hange heavy for that can enable us to do something under cover, and the enemy if he is near by could not see us."

"That is hard to guess at," said Jennie. "It would take a separate paper to tell of the natural results of the disaster. The great rubbers of the scientists however are the floods. The floods have erased much evidence. A full book could be written on the subject or to put it in a less attractive manner a person might lecture six times a week for a full term on this one subject, and while his hearers might be exhausted, the subject would not be. He probably too would pass lightly over the first big flood when I believe even was bigger than the Flood of Biblical mention. But the problem is how are we going to get there."

"It would cost us quite an effort, and the whole nation shudder at the idea of itself from the entangling consequences of this fateful injunction to neglect all levees and dams of our rivers when it could be known what the enemy would and could do," said Gertrude.

"Yes in the light of what follows it seemed that the experts of our Nations that long had been preparing for war overlooked the importance of the Abbieann disaster. Angelinia Arathia escaped almost destructive disaster because of its strong protection. Abbieann was not protected. And now the investigators too as I heard had been hampered by the weather and the smoke fogs up there. They have passed near the city in some cases beyond, without even spotting the ruins. True a light smoke mist hangs a times low over the land, but alert and active men on any investigation would nevertheless have detected the once again innocent metropolis and made rigid investigations. Last month early the authorities of Calvernia had issued a statement intended chiefly for the investigation. But even this plan had met with disaster."

"I'm sure" said Jane "that many details of the disaster were available but it seemed very inadvisable for scientists to say more than about the cause of the disaster, and I believe if our own work could be and would be more carefully planned to work out the disaster. The scientists have worked diligently perfecting means to make discoveries, but this is not enough. Glandelinia of course wishes to break Abbie's grip on Calvernia, and believing that Abbie's might be forced to yield supremacy of that state, the enemy must have tried to force such means oversteering these disasters. For as the militant brains of other nations Glandelinia realized, while the militant brains of other nations European included, failed to comprehend, the nation the nation excelling in brain power would and could have all other nations at its mercy of Glandelinia secure Calvernia in her possession. It is said that the chief Geminian Members or Supreme Persons received a letter early in 1913 from the Secretary of a Board of War officers, charged with the problem of preparedness, saying that the board had decided decided that it was necessary to discuss further the possible need of guarding levees of rivers. And lakes as there is no telling what the enemy might do. Now it seems possible we are regretting that this has not been thought off before the war broke out. Within these last two years more cities and towns have been ruined than any number known in all the calamities of the entire world. This Abbie's horror, and the big floods resulting, and all the dreadful complications now coming on found the Calvernian State entirely unprepared for it now may be told by what we ourselves have seen. Nevertheless historians I suppose will lose sight of the significance of this effort of Glandelinia to develop a deadly third arm of her wicked offensive. Its importance is not yet clearly grasped by those who write critically of these disasters because the face of the other cases so completely belittle the results, and even now I have secured recently a small book written which is a story of Abbie's destruction. The book is in entitled "How Abbie's was wiped out by Convulsions of Nature, and volcanic explosions". It seems to be regarded as a natural disaster. This disaster whatever the cause is the most momentous event of the world's history, far out-reaching the consequences of all calamities of the world, or the engulfing of whole lands by the sea, and unless something is done our country will not believe Glandelinia did it, and will let it pass down in history as a freakish volcano upheaval. Just how keen the disappointment was to all of our investigators will never be known, but we do feel sure Glandelinia did this sure of a favorable outcome. It will be too if the mystery is not solved, and this was a trump card concealed by Glandelinia this agency of frightfulness surpassing all others, this abilities to sweep defenseless cities away by flood, and forest fires, and it will not fail in its purpose if no one finds out the mystery. Then Mildred's fate will be a realization!"

"What was her fears?" Demanded Jennie.

"She don't believe we will win."

"She don't believe we will win."
Jenn is smiled and said, "Does not know yet.But why did the investigators fear or fall in the shadow of the enemy's dark and dense smoke were c
The enemy was finally assigned but it was found out, the enemy interfered.
Therefore we believe something is amiss.Why did the enemy interfere?
There was statements in the investigators were lost.That is doubtful as the Abkhaz region is as familiar with everybody as a dinner plate on a table.In fact this unsuccessful method was the first occasion I ever heard of of scientists being scared away by the enemy."

"What I have heard" said Catherine t"the official forecasts of these scientists who examined Abbiemann have a good value for our cause, and they believe that the craters nearest Abbiemann were torn by the mightiest blasts. The areas nearest Abbiemann were used to verify a which perhaps increased the truth of the statements t it would be a great improvement if the statements of these scientists were more definite and included the size of these holes."

"But all the statement of these scientists would not help us a bit even though they may have a verification record of over eighty fifty per cent which meant that their forecast failed as nearly as often as they were verified. The war and its horrors brought him to us the important piece of better knowledge of coming results of disasters, for operations, offensive, and defensive and these depended for the success largely too upon the element of the weather. If our scientific scientists could only better their statement they would be of the best of service to us. It is of course not expected that every scientist should be able to tell whether these disasters were caused by volcanoes or not. Yet there is a common impression that every man should be competent disaster solvers, probably they are so close to nature. For the same reason farmers and forest rangers, and railway men could qualify, but unfortunately for the reputation of all, no one can study such things except school scientists and accurate examinations can be made only when there is an accurate knowledge by investigation. It is surprising but nevertheless true that these scientists told so many that the results were or were not the results of volcanic activity. Yet we have those floods extending thousands of miles, the dreadful results of the flood and a more or less on edge of the pressure and force of the flood eddies sweeping through our towns and villages. Let us consider now, a certain forecast of some approaching disaster, someone made by a body of expert engineers in the afternoon of June the fifteenth a strong and unusual current was then noticed in the Norma Pan river, and the river way was running off its own natural course. There was pressing need of some warning of an approaching danger, because Mildred Greenburg was near this mighty river. I remember a horrible tragedy because of this flood. At the personal solicitation of our father, one of the Head Members of the Gemini was on his way to visit the other Rulers of Abhishekna States with the view of mobilizing military force to crush wicked Glandelinia. This mission was of the highest importance. This man Francis Horn was indeed a name to conjure with. He was inflexible of all purposes, about 10:00 a.m. For within an hour the raging floods had rose and there were no more rivers but raging seas. The condition was exactly the reverse of those anticipated. Even fiercer than the north-east torrents, was the floods rushing from the northwest. After that analysis of the flood showed it was passing from the flood horror near Abhisamm, and about to recure before heading southwest toward an gollia Abhisia itself. The Flood signal stations warned against any shipping going on on such conditions but these too were swept away.

But these too were swept away. The St Marys weighed anchor about six o'clock in the morning. At seven the four torpedoed destroyers doing escort duty unable to keep the pace turned back. Forty minutes later the ship was struck by a terrific wall of water and was rendered powerless by the flood and the crashing timbers and wreckage hurled fairly against it. I heard that every body perished and few of the bodies were ever recovered. One tall figure said by horrified witnesses and a small his faithful brother with the option of the doomed ship were seen standing on the bridge, as the vessel was struck. No boats could be lowered, as the fury of the flood was more dreadful than a hurricane swept sea. The end sure had come. The stern eyes that so often on our battlefields had looked with unconcern at death, must indeed have wrenched with intense sadness, the swirling waters of the raging flood. It was the sunrise hour of the worst catastrophe on record. It was more. It was the sunset of a life of great service, the passing of a good and gently soldier from war and war swept nation. The lack of definite knowledge of the floods advanced and its course seemed inexorable. Even more so, of ignorance of the fact that the flood was covered with wreckage flies. Someone either hindered, or he was tripped by a treacherous foe. As a result this great Abhiennian, Lord Marshall was hurried to an untimely death.

without even having the chance to receive the last sacraments... While he himself was not over confident of a successful outcome of his last mission, we all admit, that he was the one man of Abbiennia so far who might have held the wavering irresolute governor of Galverin in to a fixed purpose, and probably saved his life, for that one unfortunate Governor also perished in the flood. With the earnest support of the Abbiennian Grand Duke Michael Bellion needed reforms might have been accomplished and the ominous rumblings of impending defeats of some of our best armies prevented. He might have brought to our distressed and crucified Galverinian state (and no one else could) authority that would be respected, and brought a speedy downfall of rebellious Glandelinia. If the flood had missed that territory, or delayed a day longer, another route would have been selected. If the fury of so much wreckage jams had been wanting a good successful rescue would have been accomplished by the horrified refugees on the shore of the flood. But it was not to be. Therefore the destiny of Galverinia, perhaps the fate of all of the southern Abbiennian states hung upon a forecast of the floods approach which had not been made that dreadful afternoon at Mildred Greenburg, because that city was laid low hours before and all communication cut off.....

"There is one thing I would like to know," said Mildred. "I know that no one was close enough to see the explosions exactly as they were. Hence for any one to investigate these things is not an easy matter, and if we do go it will be a long time before we will find out the mystery ourselves."

"How then shall we ever hope to succeed in making the investigation?" said Dolores. "For the present it may be wiser, to leave off such purposes as go to Abbiennia, and study the ground and the craters themselves and find some other cause. The problem in making the investigation is to bring forth the cause of the disaster, to find whether the enemy really did it or not for we surely know without a mistake the disasters were explosions and nothing else. The first step is to find clues for a clue is the only hope."

"And another thing we have to discover," said Gladys. "Is what was used to be exploded?"

"Violet, and her sisters laughed at this question."

"I'll let you try that," laughed Violet. "You may do the impossible, but we won't try it, as it's all exploded."

"Well let's go on with the plans," said Joice. "This is what I think will be done. As Angelina Riches suggested. Starting is a good spot, and he will be sent in on ahead in good clever disguise."

"We'll start as soon as it is possible, and the army must move to cover our movement. We'll work around the craters only, examine every spot for such things as we might suspect, batteries for discharging electric sparks, wires and so forth. If these are found then the evidence is there. As we are well acquainted with all kinds of volcanic stuffs, that is I and my sisters, from our many experiences in volcanic craters, mountains, and scenery we can tell soon enough whether the disasters were of volcanic origin when we get there. The meeting is adjourned, and we must now make the preparations."

"Before we go off," said Joice. "I'm going to make notes so I'll remember what the remains of Abbiennia looks like should we be there. Let me see girls--North portion of city on elevation escaped flood--lower part under water or washed away,--and oh yes, Lake Mic-Hollister--"

"As she finished there was the report of a pistol, and a bullet tore a hole in the window pane and cut her in k pen exactly in two."

There was consternation on everybody, but the other girls rushed out side, and before the one who did the shooting could make a move, they thought little girls had managed to drag the man into the room.

Violet and Jennie shoved him violently down upon a chair--saying, "There, that'll hold you a while. Cover him Gertrude with your pistol. You're a dead shot."

Then Violet said--"Well sir what have you to say for yourself."

The man seemed to refuse to answer indicating that he can't talk, and believing him Jennie said--

"I don't believe he can talk. I'll get a pen and paper and let him write."

"I don't believe he can talk. I'll get a pen and paper and ink and make him write."

We should pass briefly over the conditions there in response to a request from our father, and find means first to clear the region of the Glandelinian armies that are said to be there. Of course there is an interesting practical point connected with the so called "explosion Craters." Using now units the starting point from one to another is 1,000,000 feet. A long distance indeed. Hence when we travel from one to the other and examine every piece of ground for any clues, it might bring something logical and an immense improvement, but almost any clue might have been erased by the enemy if they had been the cause of the calamity. That is strange and entirely unscientific and very unsatisfactory is the reports that the disaster is caused by volcanic upheavals. From the lecture, on the Volcanoes of the World I and my sisters must be able to quote the answers given in examining papers, and geographies set by many experienced travelers, authors and geographical historians. The question was absurd. To solve the destiny I and my sisters for that purpose took up a schooling of our own. Joice was our "play teacher" and the question was; to us--

"Describe the volcanoes around Abbiennia, and their types?" Her question was void or without void, for there were no volcanoes, and never were any there. We couldn't answer the question. Who could ever have the average idea of the actions of volcanoes around Abbiennia. And all Solian scientists there could find no evidence of them either. Of course was they thought the craters simply indicated was the same as those produced by the explosions near Lake Solisia some time earlier."

"There's something wrong too with the weather," said Mildred. "We can recall that it has hardly ever rained this spring and summer. Even when it looks like rain the clouds eventually must be smoke, and you know how the sun seldom shines. And when it did rain, it rained only a drizzle, and stopped sooner than people wished. This is sure a most memorable year. Forest fires, explosions, floods, dry draughty weather, smoky skies and atmosphere, heat, and horrors beyond description."

"So far as we can realize the condition," said Jennie. "What the wheasther man says, this draught is caused due to a shift in the great pressure areas, produced by the tremendous heats of these awful cities and forest fires, and other great blazes. The Mic-Whirthing seas usually give us plenty of rain in summer and abundance of snow in the winter. The heat of forest fires the weather men claim causes the air currents to keep to the west and pass one another amicably, an anticyclonic area is set up and continued fine and draughty weather reigns. That is why as we have noticed in this forest fire area, the winds are mostly south or east."

"Well the horror at Abbiennia," said Angelina Jennings in regard now by the world as a huge natural disaster, with volcanic eruptions, great earthquakes, and floods and fires. They believe the symptoms serve this purpose and as general Darger puts it, as the greatest volcanic upheaval of all history. If we could discover such things then they are right. It is in keeping with the large figures which have become so familiar since the war began that we are given an estimate of the total number of refugees produced by the big floods following as something as near 23,000,000. Darger himself told me once that he has done a number of other things during the last fourteen days but off and on during that period he has been trying to get at the bottom of the mystery, and believes he had succeeded in finding out just as much as when he started. And he feelingly added that if it takes the Scientists as much difficulty to understand the mystery of the disaster as it takes him why it is obvious that there will be no time left for lunch, nor for dinner dinner either. That the disaster mystery will never be solved by any one."

"There's no use of trying any means of Control of these disasters if we do not find out whether it was Glandelinia who did it or Nature," said Catherine. While girl and boy scouting seems a good vocation let us remember that long before this disaster the disaster not the question not only of disaster prevention, but of finding the real cause was anticipated. And who can number the disasters of this war. Can any one put a cork in the flood and make it stop flowing, when it is rising over all the land."

"Scarcely the control of some of these disasters can be by engineering," said Daisy. "This of course makes us feel decidedly more comfortable but why that bother when without this war these disasters never happened before. As might be expected, this seems therefore to fasten the suspicion upon the enemy. Many of the scientists have turned down many propositions to make investigation because they were afraid of the Glandelinians. During the progress of this war therefore particularly it is being represented in the highest quarters that the cause of the events shows clearly that the enemy must have had something to do with all these disasters beyond doubt, even though we have no evidence."

"The war is giving a stimulus to many innovations," said Gertrude, "but it does not produce any hopes of finding out the cause of these frightful disasters." "It has not any more," said Jennie, "but it has given us some rare experiences."

"The investigators must have had some rare experience," said Jennie. "It is astonishing what many scientists will suggest. The head of one of the important educational establishments offered to send to the region a man who had an infallible method of investigating the results of volcanic eruptions. The offer was not accepted for two reasons. First, no one else would have thought it as infallible, and second because for the copy copyright of the method a heavy sum was demanded. Yet all of the scientists sent in reports that no volcanic eruption had been witnessed there. And the war proved too that it there was no direct relation between rain fire and volcanic eruptions. Barger does not allude to the experiments made in the region, and it will be remembered that our Government in its wisdom gave ten thousand dollars to a professional scientist to discover after that first awful day where that very loud noise had come from. He predicted that he saw nothing else but "explosion" craters near Abilooma. He declared the explosions occurred near Fort St. Ann, across the Norma Run, not far from Abilooma, when it occurred it was a hot muggy night, and space was saturated with water vapor light showers occurring at intervals, but they occurred mostly before the explosions and continued long after the explosions had ceased to thunder. As an experiment in making investigation s, the explosions were pronounced "Not Volcanic Eruptions". Some believed a battery of storage munition dumps blew up. However it does not follow that the great detonations could have been followed by any fire, but this flood is wide spread. To sum up, it is a catastrophe which is not only a yearlong as to its chief causes, but as the most disastrous on all records."

as to its chief causes, but as the most tragic accident on our shores.
"The effect of the explosion would Gertrude" to make such connections may have been regarded either as physical, arising from the detonations, and thermal expansion or chemical reaction to the great amount of explosive material exploded and burned. We know the direct effect of such detonations was beyond measure and astonishing, the thermal effect too was unusual and the chemical effect must have caused most of the deaths. We have room for more argument, and that is the comment on the saying that the disasters must have been ground or level plain eruptions. But as the scientists insist, such statements are at fault, for the explosion debris does not as a rule show to be volcanic material thrown up in eruptions, there has been no lava coming from the eruptions nor any volcanic gases. An identical method was suggested a month ago for examination of the debris by volcanic scientists in their laboratories to see if they can find a volcanic material, but no one has arrived yet as to the success of the proposal. Finally with reference to the action of the explosions we have to try some of the work ourselves to discover the true cause. I intend for the beginning to send Starr in to Walter Starr at the first on the way to morrow if you please. Think it worth while. He can have to guide him later on, our friend Angeline Nichols for she is a great guide as well as a scout. We can ourselves try to find out whether it was a Natural Phenomenon of the enemy that caused this awful disaster."

"We have probably to guide us, only the records of the experience of some of the Scientists, who investigated the region of Ahlbiannu at the peril of their lives to several days. They climbed they had found objects of curious interests which would to be also curious in forest for the nation itself. Rumor also has it that they found something mysterious and on that occasion brought it to their laboratory for examination. At the same time some one else found something like a stone slab which when broken was discovered to be a white stone inside, but having an easily rubbed off black surface. This too was taken to be examined. R. R. alone then said and nothing else. We it seems have a firm our own opinion whether that rock was covered with the effects of emulsified navel or that was a part coal rock and also, white inside, and coal dust on the outside."

"What I got in a letter from Jennie Turner" said Angelina picked up was that some old works ago a famous Germanian scout, Captain Frank Stender standing on the top of a forested ridge near Alton and looking at a small cloud drift trail over the sky said he found something like many strange fragments of rocks and earth debris strewn all over the hill----a strange way of describing the form of one of those mounded "S Eruptions.". Although other disasters have been as plentiful as ever, we need not wait for any more to go on to make investigations, for it is not quite difficult to make the blame on the enemy, but it seems possible to form evidence against Glendelin in the wake of the Iron Trail.

He was forced to sit by a table, take pen in hand and this was what he wrote:

"I did not mean to shoot at you little girl. I am a mute and cannot talk. I'm just a citizen in the army on sight seeing and was out practicing with my revolver when I accidentally shot your window. But I believe it is no use. I am terribly handicapped because I am - somewhat near sighted and if you think I'm the man who tried to shoot you, then I am not."

The Vivian girls read the note, and then Jennie who always is the little "wild cat Princess" retorted sharply:

"I don't believe a word of it sir. I still think you mean to shoot on a of us through the window. And too if you are near sighted how were you able to shoot a pen out of my hand at sixty paces?"

"That's a good question Jennie" laughed An goline Riches "Here you" To the man, sharply" "try and explain that if you can. Write it down. And how can you write so good if you are near sighted."

He was forced to take up the pen, and he got himself held more tighter by writing this whether he was truthful or not.

"I had no intention of shooting that ink pen out of your hand. I was trying to see if I could hit yonder mountain."

"Hit that mountain" retored violet herself "That man must be crazy. Call the soldier guards and have him placed in the guard house. We'll have him in vesticated in the morning."

This was done.

These two confessions brought it forth that the man was not any evil character, that at he was truly near sighted, and very bad at that. But when he was released he was given to understand that he was not allowed to carry any weapons therefore unless he could improve his eye glasses and get something to done for his eyes, for otherwise he was apt to shoot something or somebody he was not aiming at. He had been "relieved" of his weapons and empty cartridges, and even told that he might find it safer to leave the comm.

During this day all of the main Ahlsoot leaders, and of the privates who were to start on the expedition, made careful and hasty preparations for it. Gertrude herself with Annelie picked, as her leaders studied a large map of Ahlsoenn in one of the geographies she had with the hope of finding which would be the easiest way to go down to the wreck without traveling on the flood. For the further north you light go on the flood the less maybe the water might be if it was needed in that locality, and the less risk might be incurred.

"Gertrude said to Jean "Will you send or bring Walter Starring. He's in this camp I know. I came yesterday. But I do not believe he can speak Abniggonian and I will speak to him in english."

This great American scout, sitting for the Algonquian, came at the sum one and Gertrude indicated to him to sit beside her on the table. He was about only two years older than her by now, and a remarkable boy indeed.

"Do you know why you were called for?" Asked Angelino Pichon.

"I believe I do," he answered.

"Well" said Gertrude in English "It is possible that you can make it. I suppose you must be surprised that I an Abbeysnarian can speak speak such good English."

"I am not surprised, but did not expect it" he answered. "How come you know."

"Oh I've been studying it. I can read it too, that is why I believe I'm such a successful spy. Well I visited, and her sisters, your best friends plan to try and find out whether Glendoline was responsible responsible for this disaster or not. They want you to be ahead of us, to as to say beat the trail. You follow along the shores of this Norma River, and keep in sight of us. We are starting in soon as possible, but we would like you to go forth by September the first or sooner if you can."

"To learn the truth" starring guest d.

"Who is responsible for the destruction of Ah'l-ann."

"You say that's impossible," he said. "The flood has r eceded all traces of slugs. If anyone, any of us succeed it'll be a miracle."

"We'll pray for the miracle then," said Angelina Richens. "But will you do it or not?"

"I can have preparations to start right away." He answered. "I'd be glad of such an adventure. But when or how will you start?"

"We are not sure when we'll start, but we're going ahead of the Princesses as was their plan," said Gertrude. "If there is any danger of your getting lost, we'll send you a wireless signal and I'll tell you and bring you through. I'd go with you now but haven't made the necessary preparations. Please excuse myself, so the enemy won't recognize you."

With this Atarrin saluted and went forth to get ready.

As he was getting ready he found he had been followed all the way by Jean Gaundere.

"I forgot," she said, "to warn you, tell the mission to a one no matter who questions us. This must be a secret."

"I'll keep mum," he answered.

Later, while he was getting ready, he was asked by many boyscouts and soldiers of his own portion of the army, and even by soldiers and camp fire girls where he was going and so forth, but he told he was not allowed to tell, for who among them all whether a child, or man might not be a spy in disguise.

They were disappointed, but nevertheless it couldn't be helped.

A SERIES OF HAPPENINGS! THE RESULTS OF GREYS AND SACRILEGIOUS COMMITTEE BY THE GLANDELINIAN.

It was several days later when generals Hanson and Vivian, and Evans including the little girl, went to a large Angelinian Sanitarium at Santiago Calvarinia, to inspect thousands of wounded Glandelinian prisoners and he met patients Lieutenant suffering from a very ugly bullet wound in his left leg which was alive with worms. First of all as themselves told.

Hans Hanson and the others that the physician used all kinds of poisons to destroy these, and as no remedy proved effect, the sufferer had demanded of the doctor not to go to any more trouble as it was useless. For his terrible affliction would last until he died.

"Really this is something very extraordinary." The nurse related to Hanson. "In all the years of the doctors practice he had never seen anything like it though he had handled many a case."

"Where did you get this wound?" Asked Hanson of the patient. "At Cedarburg." Answered the patient. "Any the reason why it does not heal you shall know. As twenty eight years old when in the time before the battle of Cedarburg I was compelled by General Johnston Jackson Manley to join Hushum Manley's army. I was then a lieutenant. There were two other officers with me, Colonel Thomas and Major Frank Johnston. Being Glandelinians we had been influenced by the ungodly maxims of the age, in other words we were infidels, or rather three wicked striplings who prided themselves on having imbedded the child slaughter spirit. With the marching army which was desolating the Calvinian country we three fellow officers had a gay journey together and though taking no part in them we watched with pleasure the frightful massacres of children and the wanton destruction of the property of the Calvinians. On nearing the regions of Cedarburg we passed through a little village where in an alcove over the church door we saw a carved wooden statue of the Blessed Virgin. Despite the ravage of the war it had remained uninjured and instigated by Satan one of our number suggested to ridicule the superstition of the Calvinian peasants by profaning the image. As we had our revolvers with us Colonel Thomas proposed to shoot at the statue. With a roar of laughter Major Frank readily consented. I shrank with horror from incurring the guilt of such an outrageous and sacrilegious act. Yet fearing to be considered less brave than my comrades by failing to assent, I endeavored to dissuade them from their purpose. Thoughts of my good mother flashed in quick succession through my mind. I was mocked for my cowardice. Thomas loaded his gun and fired. The bullet struck the head of the statue right in the forehead. Frank was next—he aimed—the shot penetrated the breast—and he grinned."

"Now it is your turn and chase." They said. I dared not refuse. I trembled as I aimed and while involuntarily closing my eyes I hit the statue."

"On the leg!" Inquired Hanson.

"Yes on the leg above the knee where I was injured. You see why I cannot be cured. After this terrible deed we continued our journey. An old Calvinian woman who had seen our blasphemous sport said warningly: 'You are going to battle soon, this impious act will bring you no luck.'"

Thomas threatened her, but already filled with remorse of conscience I was vexed and troubled. Frank, although less affected than I was also despondent and irritated. We ended our days march in this painful mood having more than once quarreled among ourselves. In the evening we reached the main line confronting the massed Christian forces under general Vivian. I tell you it was no joy for me to go into battle on the following day the image of the outraged statue haunted me. Meanwhile everything that morning of hell's damnable carnage went all right for us Glandelinians. Vivian's right wing was reported annihilated, his center was pounded by storming assaults and during the fearful onslaught Thomas distinguished himself for exceptional bravery. But during the time when the whole earth seemed to turn into a seething hell, when the skies seemed to roar in hellish thunder of battle, General Vivian's center let loose a storm of both battle and artillery and musketry that roared as loudly for hours as if the world was melting inside the sun, a storm of shells seemed to come from everywhere, whole armies of my comrades were prostrated to their deaths in a single minute and in this confusion everything seemed to turn red, Colonel Thomas roared/ then suddenly fell with his face to the ground. Despite it being like suicide the other Glandelinian columns pressed on against that seething storm of three hundred thousand cannon. I and Frank hastened to pick Thomas up. He was dead. The bullet had pierced his forehead between the eyes, on the very spot the day before previously he had struck the statue. Pale as death. Frank and I looked at each other too horrified to utter a word. It was now that the Christian fire was at its fiercest, the attack of our forces being infallible. My God who was the fool that said that Glandelinian because beaten so many times before his battle was no fighter. I fairly cried at seeing the frightful massacre of my comrades. We realized it was a bloody conflict, that the Angelinians were bound to win under any conditions, and pressing my hand Frank said:

meanwhile into the trench.

"Before long it will be my turn. Lucky for you that you did not see this."

The unlucky and unhappy youth was not mistaken. The time we were driven back with only fragments left to the whole line of recent assault during the retreat we were under heavy fire but it seemed as if I and Frank would at last escape uninjured. Vain hope. A flash shot forth from one of the Angelinian trenches where lay a seriously injured Glandelinian soldier. Frank felt a bullet in his breast. Oh general Hanson what a horrible death for a poor sinner. In agony he rolled on the ground calling for a priest. The godless retreating soldiers shrugged their shoulders and he expired. He was left lying by the wayside. From that moment I felt totally convinced that it would not be long before a bullet would strike me down. I determined to desert the army, find a priest and confess my sacrilegious deed but this I was suddenly made aware that I could not do. Meantime we engaged in various parts of the severer encounters of the terrible battle and as I still still escaped unhurt my fear gradually abated unfortunately my good resolutions also vanished. During the supreme fury of the battle I thought no more about the crime. But when the result was becoming general defeat for our side and we spilled oceans of blood, sacrificed millions of men, saw all our banners blood soaked and in shreds I was struck by a shot right where you see the wound. Thus the old woman's predictions were fulfilled. I still hear her say: "You are going to battle. But this impious act will bring you luck." My comrades were dead and in hell probably, and I came back wounded. At first the injury did not appear serious. The surgeon declared that in a few days I would be all right and could leave the hospital, but during the ensuing days the approach of Francis Vivianus terrified us he made a prodigious advance where general Vivianus' armies left off during the battle. I was wounded. Glandelinians were not able to escape or be rescued by the Glandelinians, and were abandoned and taken prisoner by the Christians, who were nice and kind to us however wicked as we were. Even in their hospital tent I myself had hopes that their own doctors could cure my wound but to my amazement which increased in terror I perceived gathering in the wound these innumerable worms that have baffled the skill of all physicians. Since that time I have dragged this wound around. I have tried every remedy but all have proved useless. It is true this punishment has changed me. I pray to God to cure me and I hope that is mercy but I do not complain. This affliction has proved salutary for many souls especially for my own. I am well aware that if I reach the end of my days in the friendship of God as a Christian penitent I owe it to this terrible wound. Then I shall consider myself fortunate that I had to limp. I have no hopes of being cured but I confide in God's mercy and trust to die in His Grace through the intercession of her, to whom I have offered such a horrible insult. So my dear reader Hanson and the rest realized these striking misdeeds of Divine Vengeance on the wicked Glandelinians. During the war up to this time the Glandelinians were credited thousands of supernatural powers of different descriptions and one was related to Hanson by another Glandelinian prisoner which went as follows:

"I was in general Raymond Richardson's Federal command before the outbreak of the frightful storm of battle at Cedernine and our armies have having attacked violently and vanquished the Christians with great slaughter and advanced successfully and rapidly toward Francis General. The inhabitants of this small town fled by four, but already taken flight, among them the parish priest. In the great confusion it had not occurred to secure a place of safety for the Blessed Sacrament which had been left in the Church. The Glandelinian villagers who still remained unconverted consulted as to a means of preventing the Holy of Holies from being desecrated. There was no time to do so. Call the priest from the next parish still in possession of the Glandelinian Christian armies, and the villagers believing themselves worthy to carry the Blessed Sacrament in their hands entrusted an innocent child of seven years of age to carry it. This little girl held the Ciborium containing the Consecrated Hosts in her hands her father carrying the little girl toward the Blessed Sacrament toward the village priest. Well so unfortunately. Federalists drove onward to the town so furious that the Glandelinian soldiers, who were causing more terrible slaughter. Never had a more touching Corps-Christie procession passed through battle-scarred woods and fields. No sooner had they reached the vicinity of the town, the silvery tinkling of the bell preceding the Blessed Sacrament was suddenly intermingled with the roar of thousands of cannons in the distance, and the squads of Omarien Cuirassiers upon this small procession, shot the villagers down, strangled the child to death, cut her and her father to pieces pulled out her organs and fed the Sacred Hosts to one of their lieutenants before, and the others were shot and against their acts but was powerless to stop them.

The following is another, an example of an Angelinian priest's heroic sacrifice on the same battle fields of Cedernine. His church as another of the wounded Glandelinians declared was filled with wounded Glandelinian soldiers. Suddenly the roof was shattered by Artillery shells. And to the greatest consternation of all it was expected that the suffragan wounded Glandelinian soldiers would fall a prey to certain death. In this distress the brave priest took a piece of linen and with blood marked a large cross on it, then saying a short prayer he climbed upon the roof of the church. Right and left the big Artillery shells whistled and yelled and screamed and howled through the air and thundered in horrifying salvoes of explosions, a fragment of an exploding shell tearing away a piece of the very flag staff he held in his hand. But the courageous priest did not falter. Waving the flag high in the air he shouted in high tones to the Glandelinians immediately the furious bombardment at this point ceased, and the wounded Glandelinian soldiers were saved. In appreciation the officers of the Glandelinians coming up when the battle was over allowed no one under any conditions to harm this heroic Angelinian priest who was given his passport by Glandelinian Hermann himself so that the priest was allowed to pass safely through the whole Glandelinian army without being molested. During the same battle as told by another Glandelinian prisoner who was an eye witness. Another priest was nearly made a martyr at Cedernine for persisting in administering the last Sacraments to a dying Glandelinian general. The main division of this division was Francis General. He was with nearly all his officer generals were members of the Know-nothing party. The great Glandelinian general taking another leader named General. He was a member of the same party and president of the college of Know-nothings in Glandelinia. There were seventeen million Glandelinians in his command at Cedernine of whom five million (Omarians and Gargolians) were third degree Masons and Know-nothings. Father Johnston Hendrickson, and Walsh were among the Glandelinians as prisoners and when thirteen hours of fighting passed and the battle had surpassed hell's fury in horror, one of the Glandelinian generals a Catholic was mortally wounded by a shot, and was found lying on the ground in mortal agony by the priest who inspired the protests and warnings of his Catholic captors donned his vestments and approached the dying general with the Eucharist in his hand, when he was confronted by Francis Davis Schmidt a general from Free Mason and agent Glandelinian supplanting general at that, who jammed the priest for a papist, and seized him by the throat declaring that in his army or without Glandelinian generals no matter what religion they be would have to die without Catholic mummery. Drawing a pistol he threatened to shoot if a step was taken toward the spot where the poor general lay dying. Clasp his crucifix the priest replied that he must go to the relieve of that departing soul even though his own life be sacrificed. David with rage the Glandelinian General would have felled him to earth, but for the other priest and myself who suddenly covered the general with out pistol pistols and Father Hendrickson was soon at the dying general's side hearing his confession and administering the Blessed Sacrament. The soldier died while he was repeating the last prayer. It was at this moment that the hand some Cannon came up, and seeing what was going on he dismounted from his horse and struck the priest a fearful blow, hurling him down where he lay stunned and bleeding on the ground.

"Drop the cross up here." Commanded the general and some of the men reluctantly seized the prostrate priest by the fee tarred hair to the parapet of a captured Christian position and flung him down into the trench.

maning into the trench.

"The papist shall never see his Angelinian country alive." Exclaimed Cannonia and he le off by planting a fearful kick on the priests head. The blood gushed from a ghastly wound dying the white vestments crimson. The soldiers were in the act of pushing the inanimate body down into the trench when large forces of christians advancing in a general counter charge fell upon the landelinians shooting and bayonetting them by hundreds, felling them right and left with the butt ends of their guns and wresting the body from them and rescuing the other priest during the confusion. The landelinians fled.....

With the view of inspiring our readers with greater love for the holy vivian girls I intend to write a short description of the beauty of these little girls as prescribed by Jack Evans himself to Gertrude Angelina.

"Indeed for my part, human language is utterly inadequate to express the beauty of the vivian girls. The supreme loveliness of the celestial spirits as it sees us to us can be compared nothing with nothing like the vivian girls who far surpass everything that is pleasing to our mortal eyes. How exquisitely beautiful is the blue blue vaulted heavens, when like so many sparkling gems it is studded with many stars. All natural beauty and grandeur grows dim when compared to the charms and magnificence of the starry heavens on a tranquil summer night. Beautiful is the sun which because of its wonderful open splendor and radiance was adored as a divinity being by so many pagan nations. Beautiful is the form of the Vivian girls. When I went through the streets of the Abbeinnian towns the little girls were so attractive that people came flocking around to gaze at their lovely features and the mere sight of them turned mere sadness into joy and love. There is nothing yet that I have seen is far more splendid and beautiful and sublime and excellent than the angels and the little girls seemed next to them in beauty. They seem to have angelic spirits about them and all human beauty either of persons or things which has ever existed from the beginning of creation or shall yet be the end of the time is in comparison with the beauty of the vivian girls less similar than an ugly worm compared with the charming face of youth. And when they are so beautiful and faintly like they are I don't see how whatever there really landelinians could be so cruel to them and treat them the way they do. All of them were alike. But then if the rascals were forward enough to shoot at the Blessed Virgin as one confessed, who is more beautiful than any of the vivian girls and who had a still greater sorrow they surely could take pleasure in torturing children more prettier than the vivian girls themselves if there any such children. What I have seen in violence and her sisters suffer during this war makes me feel that landelinia should be wiped out. If I was general vivian and if any of the Hanleys were brought before me I would have shot them down like dogs. It is a good idea that at that the Angelinians retain all the prisoners who have been captured in order to force them without pay and even under the lash to rebuild the ruins of the Galverinians cities repair the desolated fields and farms and clear away the wreckage of forests. This work as I know is already under way and the landelinians are forced for punishment to build the ruined cities even destroyed by the Angelinians. This is I presume the greatest punishment than I have ever saw any landelinian prisoner suffer and is well deserved and I declare that this government ought to make slaves of the landelinian prisoners for all times instead of the time it only takes to build the ruins and for the duration of the war. In fact the landelinian governments are mad clean through over all the massacres of children that has occurred the wanton destruction of Galverinia and have several times notified a general Hanson that to their ideas Abbeinnian in Abbeinnia is going to interfere and that extreme measures will be taken to be forced upon the landelinian governments. Besides the past treatments of the poor vivian girls had maddened me so far that I am to the Glandelinian prisoners in my possession as a bulldog would be to a strange kitten if I let alone a similar one. I hate the very sight of a landelinian and the sooner I get him out of my command into the internment camps the better it is for me. Glandelinia has done a lot that should be atoned for and will if she wants to preserve herself from total destruction if we win this war. And to close his interview I will say for the first time that landelinia will pay us dear and what more all islands belonging to her shall now belong to Abbeinnia from now on or when they are captured, and no landelinian will be allowed to cross the Angelinian boundary line again. Though when the war is over I'm sure the Glandelinian nation will never be forgiven for the murder of children and the wanton destruction in Galverinia.

Evans and the little girls went alone one day to see the landelinian officer who suffered from the incurable wound in his knee to the internment camp. This internment camp held about two thousand wounded landelinian prisoners officers and men many of whom were on the road to recovery. Evans examined the foot bullet that had been taken out of the mans leg and noticed that it was an unusual one as none like it had ever been known to be used, either among the Abbeinnians, Dombobians, Tripolgoigo, Tripogonians, Abyssinkillians or Angelinians or landelinians any either. It had a peculiar odor and Evans questioned the patient whether it really was an Abbeinnian, Galverinian or somebody else. "I don't know for sure." He answered. "The bullet gave me terrible pain after it hit me. I believe it has some mysterious poison in it that creates the venom."

"Where was he lying when he fired, and are you sure he was wounded, a man?"

"He was lying face downward near a abandoned trench when I passed him and when I was a few yards from him he shot me, and a moment after when I staggered to my feet he was gone." Answered the prisoner.

"It is no ordinary human being that has behaved so avenging the insult to the Blessed Virgin." Said Evans rather with sarcastic sarcasm. "It may have been one of the celestial beings disguised as a soldier shooting your companions down. As I know there is not a single single landelinian soldier who performed similar outrages that have ever escaped the vengeance of God. For your part it may have been an angel against your will as you state, but nevertheless cowardice for doing it for the fear of your comrades who were even far under your command. If you had not been a foolish man you would have used self will and would not only have refused to commit the deed but stopped them also. It is lucky you missed your aim or did not aim well enough or death would have been your lot also."

"Maybe I was a coward, but then I did not think of anything else." Said the patient. "I was repentant of it nevertheless but got no time to make any atonement for it. And I believe I could have escaped this injury if I had not entered the battle."

"Don't be too sure about that." Said Evans. "And as you are not able to join the other prisoners in the work of rehabilitating the ruins of Galverinia we may have to allow you your freedom when the war is over. But remember what you received for your past wickedness and sin no more. Glandelinia has been punished for her sins and never will forget the lesson after this disaster of war which has befallen her."

"I'm past hope for a cure." Said the patient. "And will probably walk around all my life with his loathsome wound. But by the fate of my two companions and of myself has learned me a lesson and I'll do my best to obtain God's forgiveness."

"You are the first landelinian that I have ever known that has turned out like this." Said Evans sitting down by his bed. "And this makes me your friend. I've met a wounded landelinian soldier during the battle of Apple Goliard that had struck the priest over the head with the blessed sacrament he was trying to rescue from the gray coat the blow splitting the priests head open and injuring the sacred article. During the part of the battle of Gubernineat Collyer and Stanek this rascal was severely and mortally wounded by a shrapnel shell and died cursing and blaspheming and vowing revenge in return for his punishment. Many others were alike and committed still more sacrilegious crimes and one of the vivian girls averted the risk of her life if you are the only repentant among all these rascals that I have ever seen and I congratulate you upon it. I will have to go now but if I can I'll obtain your freedom."

And Evans and the little girls left the internment camp.

"It certainly is some war." Said Violet. "And when it is over I will never forget it."

"Neither will I." Said Jennie. "It is simply horrible. And my what battles the Angelinian armies fought and lost and won."

"I suppose if you little girls were on your way to heaven, your only conversation would be about the war." Said Evans with a laugh. "But to be serious I think it is somewhat myself." Just at that moment Hanson met them having searched for the little girls having some news which he was impatient to reveal, as he loved to see them still happier and had decided to tell them at the first opportunity. Having met them he said:

Having met them he said:
 "I have some good news for you little girls."
 "Good news!" Gasped Violet. "From where?"
 One General Whillamsburger Zimmerman and Noble day Federal are here to see you little girls."
 "Are you in this come all ready?" Asked Joice.
 "No." Answered Hanson. "They are in general vians lines looking for you little girls. They are g going to make all the wicked landelinians apolgy for thar unjst enmity toward you little girls."
 General Hanson noticed a sudden brightening up of thar sweet faces.
 "Oh goody." Cried violet. "Our worse enemies will not molest us now. Thank god. This is unexpected indeed."
 It was the first time that Evans or general Hanson had seen their faces so radiant or saw them smile since the furious war began.
 "Oh uncle it makes us feel so happy to hear this." Said violet.
 "F Double day Federal is crippled yet and h is being brought here by his friends. AND you can see them if you like." Said general Hanson.
 "We will be there." Said violet. About eight o'clock that evening they got to their own main headquarters after being out all day among the other portions of the camp with Evans the little girls saw two purple unif. uniformed generals standing by a tree in the beautiful flower strewn garden. In conversation with thar father and uncle and glancing at them sharply the little girls recognized them as Double Day Federal and Whillamsburger Zimmerman. The latter supported with the help of a crutch. For a moment the little girls were mute with surprise and drew back.
 "I've come to see you little girls." Said Federal with bowed head.
 "I'm hartil heartily sorry for to hear of the offences of the rascally landelinians toward you little girls and will do all in our power to end it all as soon as possible."
 "Oh happy day." Cried violet. Her sisters bursting out with emotion. "Our prayers are answered." Four excellency general doubled day Federal she continued. "We love you. And pray for you daily. Heartily & heartily for gave all the landelinians who have wronged us but generally we blame this cruel war. I and my sisters are always suspected of spying on the landelinians and you know it is always the duty of a soldier to punish spies. But we know that as fierce as a man as you our friend Zimmerman as you are nevertheless love little children, and will avenged the slaughter of so many little children."
 "I never suspected that you little girls spied on the landelinians, and neither did we know you were spies." Said Zimmerman.
 "But the landelinians do not do that because you and your sisters are spies but because they are heart less wicked cruel men driven to their meanness by their wicked leaders. As you know the landelinians lust for strong revenge against God and persecute you little girls to defy him to cause your ruin and satif satisfy their thirst for revenge. But through me and your father the landelinians will not get any profit and will be humbled and punished instead. We will cause the complete downfall of the wicked Manleva as soon as we can, as they deserve all they will get. If we can get that man called the "TERRIBLE TORNADO" as we nickname ra Raymond Richardson Federal all will be well for he is the one who is desolating all the country, and has cursed not only the saints and angels in heaven alone but God as, also a million fold and so powerful is the rascal that if he wanted to he could save all these children from the horrible massacre. His word is law however and his men most who are human fear him so exceedingly that they do it through his trunyn trincially mys thosesnakes and wringling worms of eaten taking advantage of the sheer pishness of their demand murdering all the children they can. If I ever lay my hands on any landelinians caught murdering children the devil will hve them with him in the everlasting lake of fire. And the nevertheless for all you little girls suffered you still forgive them!"
 "Yes we forgive them." Said violet again with tears in her eyes. "We even will forgive the wickedest of them all."
 "And they have other wrongs by fighting against god." Said Zimmerman sternly. "There is no longer cause for enmity know betwen n you little girls but if you forgive them so will I and love them at large. Will that be satisfactory?"
 "If it is your duty to punish them if caught we can't help it and as to being left at large would be committing a sin your self." Said Violet. Again wesay that we forgive them come what may but we don't mean that we wished them freedom from p. punish punishments well deserved but sure we cannot stand it to see them poor fools sent to perdition without any chance of saving their souls. That would be horrible besides he found their families and mothers if living could identify them. 64 four i even if it is just to do so."

 "All right as you wish." Said Zimmerman. "But if you little girls are not saint's I'll eat all my uniform and sword too. And he one after another clasped them in his embraces and held them fast as the loving general he was double day Federal doing the same. Soon after the little girls left for another section of the beautiful garden so close to the entrenched christian lines. According to many statements knownall save the world the real cause of this great war raging fiercer and fiercer as the months go by we can state down numbers of depictions which had brought on the war and which I have to relate now before I go any further;"

I

1. First cruel conditions of child slavery.
2. The great Calverinian Cancer, which is the main danger brought on by child slavery.
3. Unjust treatment of the Vivian girls at Calverine, and various other p. pains in Calverine the year before the war in the month of January and probably February, 1912.
4. The massacre of children at Calverine during the height of the child labor rebellion. July 1911.
5. Insolently extending the child slavery horrors into northern Angellina July 1911.
6. The brutal treatment of the Vivian girls at Andean. October 1911.
7. S. Insulting the Angellinian presidency, threatening the Pope and fooling the Angellinian and Abbieannian governments when deanded to pay a fine for causing the Calverinian insurrection. October 1910.
8. Many wicked lies. October 1911.
9. Refusing to comply with peaceful demands and trying to force neverer Hanson to give up the child slave houses he took by force in his efforts to crush child slavery. October 1910.
10. Refusing to receive a peace envoy and threatening him with death. Also kidnapping vivian girls on many occasions. October. And November 1909.
11. Insulting the flag. Threatening the president, and placing the weaker nations already under the per protection of Abbieannia under the power of the landelinian authorities, and seizing many hundreds of their children, wring them from their homes to be slain if not capable of working which was considered as an act of p. piracy and as a assassi assassination. Met Venth not given. From 1908 to 1910.
12. Landelinians disguised as Abbieannians and Trispeligionians butchering children at Calverine and causing them the most horrible tor ures especially in Andean, strangling children to death, smothering them, and laying open their bodies while alive and left to die in that condition. Throughout the whole month of October 1910.
13. For their cruel massacre of men women and children at Beppeduring th the same month.
14. Setting the Ball-sell-tell-mell penitentiary on fire, Abbieannian pro party, with the Vivian girls lured into it, and because they escape lay the blame on them. February 12th 1912.
15. Governor Federal's almost successful attempt to blow up the Volcano Mt Calverine and ca causing a frightful eruption that could have wiped out thousands of cities had they been within thirty miles of her. This happens in the latter part of February.
16. Menies impudent invasion in making a short cut through Calverinia to suppress the Child labor rebellion in Calverinia. March 21 th. 1912.
17. The Crowley Massacre.
18. The torpedoing in 1848 of an Abbieannian ship loaded with children with the daughter of an Abbieannian King on it who perished with the rest resulting in the frightful Glandee-Abbieannian war of eighteen forty one and which had not been atoned for yet.
19. Trying to enforce conscription to draft Calverinians into the landelinian army which caused a general uprising throughout the whole of Calverinia thus precipitating the sudden outbreak of the war.
20. The assassination of the child labor rebel Anna Arenburg which was the most shocking child murder ever caused by the landelinian government, he sides the seize seizure of the Boyking and Blanglomsen islands in 1849 which were converted into the most horrible child slave regions in the world.
21. The seizure of the Me-Whirthan fortifications and of Arenburg in the earl early part of March 1912.

23. The Phalanx mystery.
 24. The Arenburg Mystery.
 25. The destruction of Calverine by the glandinians who in setting the Delth-tell-tell-moll powtentairv on fire caused a mighty explosion of the powder wing which shook down one third of the city from the cuncousie decousion, burned one quarter of it and once again placed Islet and her sisters in the greatest danger ever imagined.

boldly he found their fathers and mothers if living could identify them. For four days the coast was not a rumble of the crackers. On the eleventh day, a boat reached

Front CHAPTER SIX.....A-A-99

A TRAIN THAT IS MAROONED []---A HEROINE OF A TELEPHONE CALL. SOME ONE WHO HAD A NA MIRACULOUS ESCAPE. THE CITY OF OERTHIE ANGELINE FACES FLOOD PERIL. A PRIEST'S DEVOTION. THEN COMES A GREAT FLOOD OF INQUIRIES. THE ANFUL CONDITIONS PRODUCED BY THE FLOOD ARE TOLD TO WAR CORRESPONDENTS. EVERYWHERE, NO MATTER WHERE YOU GO WATER IS SEEN LIKE AN OCEAN.... A SECOND BREAKING NUMBER OF SMALL TOWNS SUFFER.....DESOLATION FOR SEVEN TEEN HUNDRED MILES..... LOSERS BECOME MORE APPALLING THAN ALL THAN ALL OTHER FLOOD AND EXPLOSION AND EVEN FINE DISASTERS COMBINED. A CHAPTER OF INCIDENTS. THE EXPERIENCE OF TWELVE SUFFERED BLENIGLOMNEAN CREATURES.....

THE EXPERIENCE OF A GREAT HEAD PERSON OF THE GEMINI..... 18.
 ISOLATION THAT IS MORE COMPLETE. THE THIALS OF EVEN BLENIGLOMNEAN CREATURES AND OTHER ANIMALS CAUGHT IN THE FLOOD. RESCUE WORK THAT SEEMS BEYOND HEROISM. TRAGEDY IN COUNTLESS HOMES.
 NORTHEASTERN ANGELINIA SEVERAL CITIES SUFFER, 100000 TON.

Of the many unusual situations none of them occurred excepting a most unusual one that could have been presented by the marooning of a Mic-gollister and Pandora train for fifteen days, near Little Franciscana with nearly three hundred passengers on board and most of them water and flood refugees. The situation was described by Mr. John Thomason, who was among the passengers.

"In this:

"First our train was pursued by a severe forest fire and after a three day's hard run we escaped that. Our train reached the vinyl vinyl vicinity of Little Franciscana on Wednesday morning just before the approach of daylight," said the man. "We were flugged by a farmer living near the tracks, who said he had been sent by the authorities to stop the train before it ran into a washout. He told the engineer he could go no further. No one had dared to go to bed that night, as the train crawled along through the rising flood. We were watching the rising waters come up and cover the houses. The first day the conductor and others, went to a house far above the water and asked if we could be relieving something to eat.

The owner of the house said yes, that I and all the other marooned passengers in the house could have anything in the house but all there was there were ham and eggs and not enough to go around for a hundred people. But the conductor broke into one of the express cars and found there about three hundred loaves of bread, and five hundred pounds of fish and some meat.

Six women did the cooking for the crowd. They had to remain on the train, all of us and eat there. I and others fed the people on the train in squads of thirteen.

On the seventh day, we got tired of eating in the marooned train, so we decided to take our chances in some of the houses still above the water, but we had to do so in the upper floors. We found a good supply of potatoes and other food. That relieved the ham and eggs, loaves of bread and fish diet for a while.

By this time, things were pretty bad. Also the sanitary conditions were becoming terrible, but we got good water from the tender. The engineer of the train was the only one who was cheerful. He even made the life of the party. Finally one of the passengers got after the railroad President and managed to be drawn out of Franciscana at about six o'clock. Six hundred labors had been working on the track for fully two days, and had rebuilt it as far as Franciscan Junction. The train was backed sixteen miles to there, and then off the track went the engine. So again we had to get out.

The Mayor of Franciscana with his wife were on the same train, and when we were compelled to abandon it we had to leave the Mayor on the train with his wife.

He was very ill and could not be removed, and a doctor who had been on the train volunteered to stay with him until he could be removed. So we left them at Franciscan Junction.

Sixty wagons had been provided by the railroad however and we were taken twenty miles in them to Aberdeensburg. All of the way the water was up to the floors of the wagons. When we got to Aberdeensburg at ten minutes to ten on the twelfth day of the flood, we had supper at the only houses not touched by the flood. Flood and thysere they were on high ground.

At eleven o'clock, we left for Urpo City on a train that had been backed in from Phealntonburg, where it too had been held up by the flood. Then we ploughed through the shallowest portion of the flood until we reached Alhambru. Most of the way three feet of water was over the tracks..... We had therefore to change trains at Glendale, and we got to Agton at two o'clock after running running on track covered or water covered trucks, through what was through was a miraculous trip on a miracle train through the big desert. There we could go no further. Elsewhere the flood was dangerous and as deep as a sea. All of us remained at that town which fortunately though surrounded by the flood was on too high a rise of ground to be reached.....

Questions like these presented in the flooded soil sections of the country will always bring forth either in this story or even in reality the best that is in men, and with every similar disaster new heroes or heroines are made. Among those in this part of the disaster who are being hailed as saviors by their fellow Angelinians and others, is Hendor Henrysonia, of the Telegraph signal office of Angelinia Agathia. Angelinians, and Californians too, owe their lives to this good wizard of the telegraph wire, whom both the Californian and Angelinia State Governors declared was one of the most wonderful men with whom they had ever heard of for heroes.

"He saved millions, where Hans Hunschia saved one."..... said an admirer. "He got many to go out in boats and obtained rescue work despite all risks, discomfort and fatigue."

Another account was that of a heroine though sick at home in the north end of Dorothy gale city. She had noted the flood sweeping the city all night but then to no degree to cause alarm, and naturally she foresaw only damage that might be done to the wires.

Despite her condition she hurried to the telephone office as soon as morning came on. Soon afterwards she received a message from the Wire Commissioner of telephones at Jennica that that town was flooded by a deluge, and though the waters saved the town from total destruction by the near approach of the dangerous forest fires nevertheless thousands would perish unless aid came at once. This young telephone girl whose name we'll say was Miss Ann Santor knew it was a case where either one or the both states should step in. She called up Governor Hendro of Angelinia State. And the call was received by him at his residence at Mombi. At that time Mombi was not yet touched by the flood. Therefore that was the first news the governor had received of the flood. In a few minutes Miss Santor had Governor Hendro and a large number of officials and high members of the Gemini, and General Henry Josephburg in communication with the flood districts..

A special train was sent off for Dorothy gale and Jennica, loaded with boats and rescuers and got there just on time before the flood washed away the tracks, and bridges. They saved every one at Jennica, then repeated the great work at Mombi where they even had to rescue the governor himself and his wife who ran into great peril in rescuing others themselves. From the minute Miss Santor heard the appeal from Jennica till late Tuesday night, three days after, she stayed almost constantly at the switchboard, snatching sleeping only two hours of all sleep each night. Miss Santor, weighing scarcely one hundred pounds, less than five feet tall, a child in appearance, did indeed a feat of endurance unsurpassed during the entire duration of the flood. And she saw all she desired of the flood waters.

It was through Miss Santor that after his rescue Governor Hendro directed all the operations of the militia and rescue parties. It was through her that the governor and all his assistants were able to find out conditions from hour to hour in the flooded districts.

It was Miss Santor who with the governor in communication hour after hour with other rescuing parties at Angelinia Agathia and elsewhere, and with the Mayor of Angelinia Agathia, the one man in the heart of that worse of all flooded city who for only four days who could communicate with the outside world. Even then Miss Santor did not work without an ache in her heart..... Her husband and two children were critically ill at home because of catching one of the plagues produced by any one of the disasters of the past, countless lives depended upon her upon her work work at the exchange-----she had to choose between her love for her husband and children, and her duty to her fellow men and women-----as if she had nothing else but a soldiers choice..... A light flashed on the long distanced board. Miss Santor plugged in. It was a personal message from her home. It was a special and trusted nurse that was talking. He told her that her husband had Ulcer or the Red Disease. The Specialist was at the house, waiting. Mrs. Santor matched the head receiver from her head, her eye was thought to get to her husband's bedside. She stared or started from the board, and then stopped. The nurse was calling "Hello. Hello. Your husband wants you to say at the switch board" said her mess message. "He says it is your duty. He says the suffer of many thousands may millions depend upon you.".....

So Mrs. Santor stayed. On the second day after she had received the startling news, she startled the governor of Angelinia State by notifying him that the great great Heitor reservoir dam was breaking. If it should go it would mean the complete destruction of every living soul in the flooded regions. She then got the told her to find their families and mothers if living could identify them. For four days the priest ate not a crumb of the crackers. On the eleventh day, a boat reached Ol Governor of Angelinia State into communication with the nearest State Authorities, and a large gang of engineers, soldiers, prisoners and others from Alton, and a thousand construction men were rushed to aid the reservoir employees exhausted from fighting the flood which surrounding a portion of the dam was undermining the walls. After a most desperate effort the dam was saved..... The same work was repeated in effect at fourteen other big reservoirs which had been slightly or gravely affected by the consequences of the explosions. But Mrs. Santor's work was very continuous. She even kept track of the advance of the flood waters, and of the spread of the uncommon forest fires as long as her line remained open. She notified exchanges hours ahead of the floods and they warned whole cities and townships in the flood's path, or those in the path of the "Red Plague". Mrs. Santor had great success in notifying the people of the Chickadee valley, from Little Eva St. Claire south south to the Central Californian River, and the whole Mic-Jollister, Mic-Whither and Aronburge run eastern valleys of the approach of flood or forest fires with the result that they fled pell-mell from the danger zone....

"....." The most cool and collected and comprehensive girl I have ever known" said Governor Vivian himself, and he had not seen the woman in person. Some of the most miraculous escapes of some of the survivors of the disaster even if they happened in this story or in reality could be almost beyond belief. Many were the stories of those who rode down the flood torrent on rooftops which experience of any thrilling story was not ever read of in any thrilling fiction book or magazine, and even then if submitted to the most sensational magazines they absolutely could be respected as being too widely exaggerated or improbable.

As witnesses themselves stated to some war correspondents one man his wife and six children simultaneously were hurled from their beds by the lurch that the House gave as it was drawn out into the powerful current. The man the first one to get up rushed to the window, and saw trees treetops, myriads of houses, stables, outhouses, fragments of wooden bridges, masses of debris and wreckage, and every kind of furniture rushing forward and onward, with his own house in a flood so wide he could not see across it. As the building began to settle in the water, he was forced to chop a hole in the roof to escape as the rising flood which invaded his second story bedroom, his family being first aided by him he going last... perched on the rooftop, he saw the flood at its worse. Here and there was a flash of cloth on the surface of the water, and sometimes he could distinguish in relief against the yellow water the white spot of a little girl, or some other persons face....

Suddenly the house crashed into some obstruction and split in two. Then with a grinding sound, the current tore his half house free again and swept it on. When the remnant of his house was finally stranded he was rescued by men in boats. His wife and children were still on still on the other half. A number went out in motor boats and after some hours reached and rescued them. An old lady was a nun who when rescued from a floating tree, where he had perched four days and nights, with the flood sometimes driving him dangerously close to the shore where a tremendous forest fire was literally raging alongside and following the course of the flood. In a floating tree next to him was the body of his eighteen year old daughter dead from no horror and exposure. Through all those horrible days he had been forced to sit idly by and see his daughter slowly dying before his eyes.

Although so few dead bodies throughout the flood region have been found as yet it was said that when the waters would recede the piles of wreckage would yield a whole army of corpses. It was pointed out that the swirling currents in the flooded districts probably would hold thousands of bodies beneath the weight of tons of debris. And it would probably be that the identifications of the bodies would be extremely difficult. The impossibility of identifying the more badly damaged bodies will mean that some fathers will wait for months, never giving up hope for the return of those whose bodies have long since been buried. The flood continues on however. A member of the City police when he reached Angelinia Agathia View bridge rescued a woman and her two little children who were starving. The children were wrapped in her blankets. One of the men who lives in the vicinity who afterwards was rescued from the upper floor of a house, declared that the woman was his wife and the children his. It made no difference in which direction one turned, the same stories were everywhere. Over in northwestern Angelinia State the situation at Angelinia city was almost as perilous and tragic as at Dorothy gale or Angelinia Agathia. For ten days it was impossible to secure any account of the real situation..... Following days and nights of awful suffering, pestilence broke out among the two hundred thousand refugees in the big refugee camps near East Jennica county, a combination of small pox, diphtheria, rabies, mumps, measles, Typhoid, and scarlet fever and every complication of diseases having been reported in a ravaging form with a forest fire bearing down on the camp to hot foot.

At first because of this fact a strict quarantine was being established, which included everyone there. Some priests and nuns were given an opportunity to leave the plague stricken districts of the camp before the quarantine was entirely established but they chose to remain there to continue corporal works of mercy.....

Worn out by the hours of intense suffering, several persons gave up their lives in the refugee camps, and the numbers of unfortunates who might have succumbed to the raging floods close by could only be a matter of conjecture. Six of the sufferers died in the same hour. One was a mother who had a few minutes before given birth to a child. One or two other babies were born during the night, and it looked as if the little ones would survive the awful ordeal, although their mothers hovered between life and death.

Added to the horror of the flood in this locality and of the plagues raging in this refugee camp, a high tempered forest fire which appeared to have swept the entire portion of the forested sections not touched by the flood, sent terror to the hearts of the sufferers, who fled from the threatened towns and villages. Many thousands fleeing from the town of Chila and many ill by the pith of the flood close to them strove for permission to get into the internment and refugee camps from outside with the forest fire heaving that way. Those still far from shelter of any kind while continuing to flee prayed for safety from the scourge. All through the night outside the camps could be heard the wails of the people who came fleeing up. And as the moans and shrieks of the sufferers floated over the superheated atmosphere, wails from those within the temporary refuge joined.

George Cassowary was rescued by two gemini members after most thrilling attempts. He had sent his wife and children off in a boat in which he said there was no room for him. The flood had driven him from his home and he was finally forced to climb a tree on the bank of the river or flood rather. Here he was seen by the two gemini members, who rode up and back and forth time after time and then floated down. Each time as they observed they could not even reach him, they asked him how much longer he could hang on. Finally half numb from exhaustion he shouted he could hold on more than five minutes more. The last time fortunately when the two gemini members floated down, the man fell faint into the boat.

At all points of the flooded districts a law and order league was to be organized, with the Mayor of every city and big town to be at the head of the league. Every city was to be divided into districts with a superintendent in charge of each.

But the question of the distributing of food was to be a question when so little of it was at hand. In every town or villages could have been seen hundreds and hundreds of persons marooned in second or third story windows of their homes, appealing to passing boats, for food, provisions and water. It was estimated that two million people have left the stricken towns for places of shelter, and are being cared for in refugee camps or in towns and places far outside of the flood zone but still apprehensive for towns said to be not in path of floods were menaced by forest fires every day. There seemed just at present no safety anywhere and the refugees did not know which way to turn. The relief committee is trying to discourage the influx of people who came to the stricken regions at any risk to bring help provisions and food with their own hands. The situation throughout both states is becoming more serious every day.

Railroad officials and the relief committees also are urging all refugees to accept the hospitality of every municipality outside the range of flood, and forest fires, and warning all refugees leaving for shelter elsewhere to go anywhere but not in the location endangered by the "red plague". They hoped to relieve or to be relieved of the temporary care of three million people by sending them safely out of the towns and cities.

The business district of Angolinia Agathia by the 25th of September began to slowly emerge from the flood, which was receding two inches an hour. The current was yet so swift on many of the streets that it was impossible to investigate in rowboats or other craft the districts in which may have occurred heavy loss of life. A story of a real fathers devotion and that of a priest unrivaled any heroism in the flood, and was related by several of the nuns of the St. Peter's School who were marooned by the devastating flood. The flood caught them all at school hours. Ringing of school bells warned them all of the approach of the flood. The children of the lower rooms rushed to the upper classrooms for safety. Yet one glimpse from the school windows showed them the school house was already surrounded by water. The priest who was in the children's school at the time went down in the lower rooms to see if any children still remained for fear or otherwise, and to secure some food. He had barely sent three or four children up, and had time to secure a number of food cases when the crest of the flood hit the schoolhouse. He nearly perished in the room, escaping to the upper rooms, the flood hit his heels, as he leaped from step to step, and he found the sisters trying to quiet the fears of the younger and even older children.

In that moment the picture of this good nurse, trying to cheer up the little ones, struck like a sword to his heart and tears came to his eyes. He pressed the box of crackers into the hands of the head sister, and then went up to the attic to see if he could make an exit to the roof in case the flood could reach to the top story. He seized an ax and began to dig a hole through the roof.

For ten days or even more, he the sisters, and two hundred school children sat on the roof and living only on four crackers a day. One of the nuns wrote a note, the others doing so also giving the identification of the children, and asking if their could be found their fathers and mothers if living could identify them. For four days the priest ate not a crumb of the crackers. On the eleventh day, a boat reached he marooned children and their charges and it took a whole day and night of many trips back and forth to get them off. It was the afternoon of the next day before a boat came back to rescue him. No story of the awful catastrophe could be complete that failed to note the work in behalf of the suffering Calaverinian and Angolinian states on the part of the many great newspapers of the cities of these states, as well as the war correspondents, and even busy foreigners and the like. The far reaching effects of the flood, and the forest fires and other disasters could on an account or in no other way be more clearly illustrated than in the reports of all newspapers, war correspondents and for the work of the many identification bureau bureaus established by the newspapers and war correspondents. The Pandora daily News in a report while hundreds and hundreds of cities alone not counting towns and villages were almost cut off from the outside world by flood, explosion horror, forest fires and the efforts of the enemy armies and tremendous battles, devastating raids and all the horrors of war says: "!!!!!!"

"We are still handling inquiries for nearly 200,000,000 people, inquiring about the 234,789,000 homeless, the condition of the country the nature of the quadrupled and complication of disasters, plagues, the forest fires and the like, and all of whom are trying to find individuals and families in every nook and corner of the disaster and war swept states of Abissinia, and especially of the flooded sections of Northern Angolinia State. The inquiries came from nearly two hundred and fifteen million inquirers, most of them Abyssinians, Conventinians, Bombobians and other residents of many other states, all residents of cities and towns not touched by disaster yet of any kind...."

And to make it stranger and more thrilling, the people for whom all the Abissinian newspapers are searching live in forty nine big flood devastated cities, four hundred towns, and forty eight bigger cities of all either reported in the path of the forest fires or totally destroyed by them of these two big states, and also in all the hundreds of cities and towns in the flooded states elsewhere not even heard from or from which the communication can be obtained.... obtained....

One of the nuns of St. Gertrude School at Yombi in the face of a emergency won credit and admiration by walking from Mombi to Jessica to the gemini of the Good Shepherd a distance of nearly eighty one miles. The nun walked all the way from Mombi to Jessica with two other teachers. All three were relieved at guests at the Seminary. They left Mombi early on a Wednesday morning and walked along the edge of the flood.

"I had no change of cloth clothing or uniform for four days," the sister said. When the blocks of building in Jessa Jessa was on fire, they thought the Seminary would be destroyed also. I therefore hurriedly gathered what clothing I could find and climbed to the top of the building. I crossed with many other sisters over the roofs of thirteen big buildings and descended the fire escape.

The first night we all sought refuge in a refuge in a big hotel with a big crowd of others, and cheering and consoling them without hardly a rest when they became apprehensive because of the rapid rise of the flood. I and my followers were the only nuns in that hotel, and they appreciated our presence immensely. I never for a moment thought anything else but that every one in that part of the city would be saved. I knew the other sisters of the school would be greatly alarmed about me. Finally we left Jessa and headed southward for Gertrude Angeline city. After we got there we again found we were stalled, as that city too was flooded and no trains were running. I telephoned my other sisters from there and told them that the city was in peril and that the flood had reached so far that every street in Gertrude Angeline city was good for boating. Many houses there were threatened. A priest in that city they told me worked day and night for forty eight hours rescuing many persons, and then had to be rescued himself. The priest himself told me that he rescued about two hundred persons and did so at great peril and difficulty, doing it himself all alone in his big skiff. He took about thirty out of floating houses in Gertrude Angeline and brought them to a hotel. There the flood overturned his skiff and he in turn was rescued.

Gertrude Angeline city, he told me was flooded for ten days already and the flood was increasing at an alarming rate.

No trains now could come out of the war storm centres in any direction to carry refugees from any section of the flood and forest fire territories, and the refugees that could get away went by boat, horseback, or by wagon automobile through points but that could be traveled and they were housed or refugees in other cities and towns told thrilling stories, described picturesque scenes, and gave wide views of the damage wrought, whatever disaster they went through they told, either flood, explosion or forest fire, even some with the glandelinians themselves. Many of these after many days of travel on foot reached Francis Atlanta, or Pandora to find flood here also. The situation they told was far beyond any comprehension. Some trains had tried to go out but were delayed for hours, even many days to reach some of the refugees.

When most of the stories told by the survivors were of the same tenor, all were were able to give a graphic description of the horrors, and all told of real to thrilling miraculous escapes from death. The situation being made because none of the railroads were able to get their trains through from any points could not aid by any measure the great influx of refugees from the war devastation areas, who had the good luck to be able to leave the stricken cities by boat, wagon on foot or other means. "Christian or Christina and others" written in the story book Pilgrims Progress had a good time in their adventurous travel in compared to the thrills perils and difficulties of all of these refugees. Many faced not only, peril from forest fires, flood and other dangers but also from landolinian vandals and no forth hidden in ambush. Many had to make long detours as they would have walked plumb into a glandelinian encampment. Some told of finding themselves dangerously close to ravaging battles. Battles then raging. Among those who told vivid stories of unusual horrors of the catastrophe were, Johnnie Anderson, on No 1916 south Forty Ninth Street Angelina Agathia. He made a sixteen day trip on wagon with only a single horse to pull it, and being compelled to beg for food on the way. The other was a member of the Gemini Henry Page. The reports of these persons agreed on the fact for this story that the loss of life while small had even then been somewhat exaggerated but that the losses immeasurable damage to property could not be exaggerated by any amount of the wildest reports or stories. The property damage they said was beyond a thousand years estimation.

Another said "we were on a large skiff and during our trip for shelter we were for nearly three hundred and fifty miles without a sign of land. We had a hard battle with the wrecks floating toward us and we had to avoid the floating houses. There was a strange darkness for a long time or always since the flood started which even up here still prevails. There were many dead animals and others along the route but I too believe that the reports received here will be exaggerated. In one town alone there was millions of dollars worth of property damage however however and no figure made out in this direction would ever reach the actual loss."

Herman Irvanna who fled from his home was another who passed through the flood and came all the way to Pandora on foot. He was in his home at Fombi when the flood was just at its start and he escaped a high place just at the nick of time.

He paid his tribute to the people of every city he saw as flooded. "The people withstood their suffering and rallied significantly," said Mr. Irvanna. "There were heroism displayed by men and women alike on every side in every town, city or village. It was a good showing of courage that was unsurpassed by any acts of heroism I ever read of in books. The dumb animals were not even neglected by any one and they even risked much to save their pets. One man followed me part of the way dressed in his underwear, and in his hand he carried a small kitten."

Again a member of the Gemini reached his own hometown from Big Girl Knool with a solitary Glandelinian prisoner held on a charge of attempting to blast a dam to increase the flood disaster. The Gemini Members name was Grandsonia Hens. He too gave a vivid description of the devastation caused by the flood.

At "At Big Girl Knool the waters covered the railroad tracks," he said "and it was necessary for the firemen of the engineers of a refugee train to station himself on the cowcatcher of the engine, armed with a long stick in order to determine whether or not the train could proceed without the water reaching the locomotive boiler. He found the further the engine went though slowly the deeper the water was. Finally the engine could go no further. The train carried food and clothing. The supplies had been picked up at Andrews, Grinn, and other towns on the line still open from the north to Big Girl Knool. These towns furnished large supplies of bread, many cases of eggs, and clothing, and medical supplies. At Mic-Hollister the train picked up a carload of boats for rescue work. The train reached within ten miles of Big Girl Knool and could go no further. Therefore what could be brought of the supplies were carried a cross a narrow strip of the flood on a temporary foot pontoon bridge, and loaded on another train furnished by the town of Little Girl Knool. But this train also could not proceed, and the provisions are still waiting to get into the cities. The number of dead in Big Girl Knool so far as we could learn will run about 456, y to 500. Fever and disease from the unsanitary condition following the high water might increase the number of deaths, and also it is reported the plagues caused by the past disasters is spreading fast. They say a 100,000,000 are ill and tens of thousands are dying every day. It is terrible."

We boarded an engine near the town and then we took some chances in going on but as I rode through the city where the water was not high... It was so dark even in the day time when we reached there, the sky being heavy with immense rolling clouds with hardly a break anywhere, which betokened the smoke of burning worlds when the end of the world is coming that as felt the same as if it was about to happen. We could not see any bodies floating in the water, but many of the marooned told us that all conditions were bad though the flood was not threatening to go any higher. But what added to the misery was the continued darkness. I saw day or night many persons wading in the water in the streets, and a few were driving baggage, and wagons about hauling supplies. Motor boats had been brought in to rescue the persons on the boat house tops in the flooded districts."

Another one who was interviewed by a correspondent said to him - "I'm from Gertrude Angelina city. The thing most needed in Gertrude Angelina city is continued pure drinking water. A special train loaded with water coming coming from the south was later sent out on the Angelina Run, but had not been heard from. More than 10,000 refugees from Gertrude Angelina City reached Pandora with us on the Friday following the flood. They obtained boats at the edge of the city, rowed to the Lake Angelina, and then obtained a train of refugee boats for Francisanna. At Francisanna they boarded a motor boat train for Pandora. The water rose so rapidly at Gertrude Angelina City that few persons had time to escape from the low section of the city and had narrow escapes from being drowned. In the city or courthouse there, were quarred nearly three thousand of the homeless. And the condition of the men women and children in that courthouse" said the refugee "cannot be described. They are crowded there with no food except a gallon of milk and a few boxes of crackers now and then. And then when the milk was served there was scarcely a tablespoon to each person in the building, when we left no arrangements had yet been made for the caring for the sufferers. The arrangements could not be made, even though Gertrude Angelina is not so hard hit as many of her neighboring cities are."

Three other refugees lost their lives in an attempt to reach their families in Gertrude Angelina city. The men left Jessica and reached a farm home in the flooded districts after a ride on the flood in boats, and of wading. A boat was loaded from a farmer and the three launched it in the water. As they pushed off the farmer ran down to the edge of the water shouting "Glandelinians, Glandelinians, look out." But it was too late. A squad of Glandelinians appeared and because the three mistaken for three Christian spies could not stop the Glandelinians opened a heavy fire. The farmer was the first to be killed. The pursued three in the excitement lost control of the boat, it struck a fence, the bottom was torn from the boat and the three men drowned in the swift current.

Henry Maxwell of Angelina Agathia, after reaching his flooded hometown after being twenty days late, declared the union Munson Mic-Hollister and Pandora depot in Gertrude Angelina City was flooded by ten feet of water when he passed through on a boat. "When we left Gertrude Angelina city the flood was rapidly rising and the streets were flooded, and men were making their horses swim through the flood. The river at San Standbury was a sea, when we crossed the highest bridge we waded in water. A hundred towns near Gertrude Angelina city were flooded. Marcucian, Viviana, and John, were flooded badly, and all roadways and tracks were under twenty feet of water. Just outside of Gertrude Angelina city the engineer stopped the train and was afraid to run further north. The passengers declared they were of course willing to take the risk, and so appeared to be in a long submarine boat of some kind instead of riding on a northward bound train.

Indeed the ash box on the engine was flooded, and the firebox barely barely escaped."

IIIIII IIIII. Indeed the usual useful consolation for any history or story book I beyond any power to describe properly, but it seems nevertheless that the forest fires were somewhat more devastating, and the floods had saved many a place from entire destruction altogether. The unusual thing about the flood, is that it covered more territory than all the other past floods combined, and yet the loss of life was nothing compared to the past flood disasters, the loss indeed even being remarkably small for the magnitude of the flood.

In the great calamities that befell Dorothy Dale city, Angelina Agathia, Big-Girlknool and other places, and hundreds of the more important cities the public lost sight of the havoc wrought by the exceedingly great forest fires, past flood and explosion disasters and rising of waters at smaller places. In an investigation a scene of desolation that defies a million books full of descriptions was uncovered between Gertrude Angelina city and Jessica by the slowly receding waters of the floods that even leaved the shore banks of the various rivers. Wreckage of the houses of once prosperous farmers and country folk was strewn for hundreds of miles beyond the normal banks of some of the rivers, and refugees could find little consolation in the inevitable prediction of such a small loss of life, because of the incalculable property damages, and of the forest fires cutting off all outside aid for them, and of the dangers of Glandelinian armies revealing Christian armies coming to take aid. And to intensify their suffering so many of their loved ones had fallen in battle or were in the army.

Not the slightest word or signal that might be construed to be hopeful was received from any big city for months after the flood. No word could be heard even from Gertrude Angelina city or Jessica, and it was feared the latter was no more. The latter is located on a site submerged to a depth of a score or more of feet by the immense tidal wave that swept the valley. Wire and railroad communications with the city were severed after the last bridge was swept away on Sunday a two weeks after the outbreak of the flood and that time water was entering the heart of the city. In fact it was evident Jessica was the more sufferer of all. At Glandelin the loss of the wireless had been accounted for but all of the houses have been swept away, others in the neighborhood also, and thousands are homeless in the town of Western Junction. 1000 towns are swept away.

It could be seen that for months no amount of telephone or telegraph communications could ever be established with any town or village. The small villages of Enricha mile east of the city of St Elizabeth was wiped out, and many other villages close by also, but some news brought from refugees gave the glad tidings that at least the higher section of St Elizabeth city had not been swept away though the city of course was hard hit. According to the story told by the refugee, he and his family and a number of refugees from the bottom lands near the city of St. Elizabeth city were safe in a farm house on high ground. The city could be seen from the haven and while the city was surrounded by a sea and the lower section of the city was beneath the flood the inhabitants could be seen moving about on high ground. A partly written note coming all the way from the city was found in the streets of Angelina Ughia begging for assistance for St. Elizabeth, and from this it was believed that many were perishing, but it developed that it was a plea for food for the refugees. Efforts were made to dispatch rescuers from cities not threatened by the flood with supplies, and these tried to cross the immense flood in boats, but the flood had isolated everything, and though telephone wires were only grounded by the flood no communications could be made with the city, needing aid so bad. The rescuing parties that ventured down or up the flood far above St. Elizabeth city reported that partly submerged houses were visible in the neighborhood of all sections, and in the neighborhood of Childstown. No telephone messages from the district were received, but the settlement was also widely scattered, and by eyesight only small details of the destruction or of possible fatalities could be seen or be secured.

Hundreds of brave men in boats cruised about in the still water above St. Elizabeth city, looking for salable salvage and for any bodies that might have been swept near shore, but they declared later that no corpses could be seen passing down stream from the districts above. Several attempts were made to reach floating objects believed to be bodies of victims of the flood, and when it was accomplished they proved to be floating logs. It was said that about sixteen hundred to five thousand towns and cities were not heard from and they too surely were in the path of the flood that extended for seventeen hundred miles in width. Here is another picture from St. Elizabeth where really no lives were lost but where the suffering was intense because of the rise of the flood day by day. Many teams of flat boats carrying twenty to forty boats apiece, and provisions were sent down the flood to the scene from Galveston. Our thousand well armed marines were on board resting with their feet out of their boots for the first time in a strenuous forty eight days, and told of conditions on the return, said the new number of towns and cities flooded was record breaking. They themselves in rescue work at St. Elizabeth and other places near by had been exposed to heat, and wet every where. They stated they had been on great heights and as far as they could see there was water everywhere like an enormous sea or ocean. Crowds of thankful flood sufferers gathered on the shore of the flood when it finally left the stricken city. Wet and splattered with mud they stood all of them thigh deep in water, and cheering the marines. An old haggard woman who looked very faintly tried to press an orange, which she had just received from one of the supply stations on one of the young marines. He refused it.

St. Elizabeth forty days later when the flood receded was a city under a black "bog". The "bog" was mud and slim and water soaked debris. The slim and sand lay from four inches to twelve feet deep over the city and so soft you could sink in the ooz and perish if not careful. All sewers were stopped, and the city water supply was out of commission, and drinking water had to be used from the flood after boiling as no other water could be had. All electric power was out of commission. In the business districts the streets were littered with the flooded out contents of thousands of stores. Lamp posts, and electric light poles were draped fantastically with weeds office furniture, furniture of all kinds, parts of furniture and great masses of half burned trees. Probably the flood in this locality must have devastated a burning woods somewhere with good effect.

Frame buildings which were swirled along on the waters were being extricated from the fronts of structures into which they crashed. Everywhere when on a high view could be seen nothing else but a vast sea of receding waters and debris and floating houses. In northeastern Angelina State, where immense districts and many whole counties disappeared under water more than four hundred towns and cities stood in an immeasurable sea of water, and 45,678,000 were rendered homeless there. The flood there was not hindering rescue work however though it was devastating.

Hans Henderson a street car motorman or motorman, who engaged in the first rescue work was jerked from his boat in Maxwell city when the current in a side street swirled him against the side of a house. He was washed under a fence, and carried onward by the flood. Despairing of being saved he was about to give himself up for lost when a rope was thrown to him from shore and he was sagged dragged to safety. The body of a ten year old child, a boy was found on shore.

In the northeastern part of the city of Turpe Junction which was twice menaced by the forest fire, and now a victim of the flood too, and where the tracks of a number of railroad lines including the Sendon, Mc-Holleston and Pandora, and the Abbeville and Galveston disappeared under the water, more than 10,000 persons stood in the shallow water to greet a small relief train that came northward from Southeastern Angelina. Indeed willing hands assisted the rescuers in getting the boat up into the water. The head rescuer put six men and a coxswain into each boat. Some trouble started when excited men and women pushed forward along shore and insisted upon assistance being given first to this marooned family and then to that. Several boats were sent out in response to these appeals, but one of them was accidentally upset by a Blenglomenean creature that sat in the the water and which it struck. The creature rescued the crew and swam away. The officers in command of the rescuing party decided much more good could and would be done if the work was conducted systematically. Accordingly, routes were assigned to the boats, and per a persons who knew the streets put in the bow of each. These men knowing the locations and number of persons in each house, directed the rescuers. The flood victims were then rowed up to the shore of the flood, and placed in wagons and automobiles and rushed to shelter on much higher ground. All of the houses in the neighborhood of the landing places were thrown open to the rescuers, and women served coffee and rolls to the men who tramped soaking wet all over. There was acts of heroism unbelievable among these men. In fifteen days they sent their large ten oared boats into the swift and dangerous currents, and made trip after trip to the landing places, place bringing back women and children, and men. At times when the rescue boats would draw up to the landing place men and even women could rush out into the water and lift the women from the craft and carry them to safety. As fast as the boats could be emptied they were sent out again. Small boats were also used which did service in many places the larger boats could not reach.

Fifteen hundred persons from houses to places of safety by the rescuers who had their boats and outers in the fierce currents of the sea flood, which made a river of every street of the city. Through the roof of one small house six women were released from a dark attic where they had sat for four days without food drink bedding or light, and ignorant of what was going on outside their prison.

Evidence from every section of the flooded country show that in all places the horrors and extent of this new flood was far worse than all the other past war disasters combined. The flood like that of Abbeville had been surpassed a hundred times. The destruction of property was immeasurable and worse than all past floods. Millions of acres of land were flooded. In all cases rescuers trenched throughout the flood carried out residents in boats. Even as far as could be reports by refugees coming from every section of Angelina State and other flooded states show that in many places all flood disasters put into one in the country during the past had been so far surpassed that even if the loss in property would be estimated at trillions of dollars that would only be a trifle. Thousands of cities and towns had been ruined in Angelina State. Thousands of cities were flooded with devastating effects. The loss in property was immeasurable and the news of it caused the Governments of every state and Abbeville too much concern and anxiety. It was the greatest flood on record and fortunately during the war to be the last of such magnitude. Many others happened afterwards but they were trifles.

Reports from every section of Angelina State, Angelina State, a portion of Southern Galveston and in many other states showed that in many places the high water mark of the Abbeville flood and other big ones just recorded in the early part of the war had been far surpassed all combining in one even. In one even. It can be said that probably millions, not millions but thousands of millions of acres not only ever in every river valley but elsewhere had been flooded. And since other disasters past thousands of acres of land had still even then remained under water from early 1912 until now and still showed no signs of receding. In all cases rescuers carried out the residents in boats. Usually of many disasters floods may be considered the most dreaded but just now for good reasons the forest fires raging on both sides and around the flooded area was the worse as it evidently was a frustrating all efforts of relief from the outside.

At Glorianna Junction where the coming of the flood forced five hundred thousand persons to flee from their homes, no attempt was made under any conditions to operate the traction cars, while at Chichadee where the flood made nearly thirty five thousand homeless and drowned three hundred, property damage was estimated at $4,750,000. At Gaudenden where twenty two were drowned the Marion River receding the waters of the flood ever its still remaining levees reached a stage of more than thirty one feet after rising a feet an hour. There the traffic was suspended as the town was threatened. The city of Evangeline St. Claire at the junction of the Evangeline St. Claire, the St. Ann's, Anna and Ava Maria Rivers was still flooded but not to an extent to force the inhabitants to go to the upper stories. However the electric light plant was submerged and the town was without light for three weeks. The three big pumping stations there were also put out of commission. The city to be famous for the big christian victory there just recently past was without fire protection.

At Pecora-Kekame Little Eva river receding the flood and overflowed all of its big protecting levees and companies of soldiers and national guards guards men and citizens patrolling the levees to prevent them from being blown up by the enemy were forced to continue their patrolling in boats. The water in some of the streets was eighteen feet deep and rushing like an enormous mountain current. The homes of 34,567 persons were submerged. No lives were lost but thousands of very narrow escapes were known. Here also the light, sewer water and gas plants and hundreds of important factories were flooded. Many persons were rescued from second and third story windows by the few boats available. Rafts could not be used because of the swiftness of the current.

The flood loss at Hurnton could have been estimated at about $1,500,000. The flood loss at Hurnton could have been estimated at about $1,500,000. The water flowed in all the streets deep enough to wash away all all the buildings had the current here been strong enough. All of the factory districts were flooded, and the stocks of all the plants destroyed. The headquarters of an enormous circus in this city was under sixteen feet of water. One graphic story can be told of the experience of twelve Belgiglonesean features in the flooded flood. They were at the time according to some witnesses lying half asleep or so in a broad valley. With the first two feet of water spreading over the valley, the large Belgiglonesean structures of which there were twelve, though surprised when down by the current of the flood and then got caught in the deeper parts. They were hurried through the streets of a small town, uprooting trees, and knocking over houses or frame sheds before they could recover themselves sufficiently to master their own movements and fight against the increasing current of the flood. They finally made it for made for shore and then stood in line looking at the flood as if they did not know what to make of it, and did not know what in the world had happened. Most of the plunging the young ones especially went floating down the crest of the flood huddled on pieces of wreckage or swimming with the torrent. All of them later secured the shore without any injury whatever.

An enormous unknown about two thousand feet long was last seen swimming in the middle of the flood pushing before him a jam of wreckage, and seemed not at all upset by being surprised by a flood.

At Henrietta Town two hundred and fifty five thousand persons were thrown out of employment by the raging waters of the flood, which arose to such an enormous height that all of the big industries were compelled to shut down. All of the plants suffered alike, and the loss to the industries by being first compelled to shut down and then be badly affected by the flood is enormous, beyond beyond comprehension. The flood was the worst experienced in Henrietta since the city's existence, and though it had experienced the floods of the other past months, and in this one many millions of dollars damage was done.

The sudden swiftness of the flood and how they brought such unexpected desolation to hundreds of thousands of bright homes and thriving communities could be told in a hundred thousand countless diatribes.

Here is one from Little Ann a pretty little northern Calvinian Town of about fifty thousand inhabitants. With fifteen persons reported dead, swept away in the flood, many others missing and even unaccounted for, and all of the entire number of inhabit inhabitants homeless, this town is cut off from all surrounding territory. Mayor Henryson of this town saved himself by catching hold of the roof of a floating house, and he estimated the number of dead as high as one hundred. The Mayor was marooned on the floating house for two days, and was rescued after great difficulty.

Many hundreds of persons were marooned in trees, on house-tops, on floating masses of wreckage, and other points above the water. Lines of their would be rescuers desperately tried to reach them and shouted words of encouragement to them. At the beginning of the flood a wall of water twenty feet high rushed through the main section of the city as all bridges connecting the main sections had been rapidly washed away, and this made the estimate of the number of dead and damage done almost impossible. As in all instances during the flood everywhere else reports have come in that whole families had been wiped out existence by the score, even in the first rush of the waters, but no one could however prove these statements, as the rescuers found no bodies. As darkness of the sixteenth day of the flood gathered in weeping women and children lined the west banks of the flood sea, either waving handkerchiefs to their loved ones marooned in houses for days and trees in the swirling waters, or prayed for them and begged rescuers to help them. In one tree a dozen people had been clinging for two days and repeated efforts to throw them a rope was made, but the rope could not be made to reach them, as the current of the flood pulled it away.

Elsewhere nearly fourteen families were thrown into the flood, when a big house on whose roof they had taken refuge gave way. All were rescued, one being carried down the course of the flood for eight hundred yards and then being rescued by a dog who pulled him to shore. Just as one of the bridges was swept out, a girl clinging to the roof of a small house which was being swept down stream waved a red cloth at the people on the shore and then was lost to view, as the house crumpled when it struck a wreckage jam. By climbing into a good strong tree Rev Tony Gengene, Pastor of St. Anne Church had rescued six children and three women. Taking a rope with him the Catholic Priest fastened himself securely to the tree and threw the rope down to a man who with the two or three women and the six children were being carried down stream on a house. All were hauled ashore. One little girl was rescued as it floated down the flood, another child was seen in mid-air in the middle of the flood but could not be recovered.

One of the probable first real stories that should be and could be very... very interesting, if not exciting and scary, was that related related by the Head Member of the Gemini himself, Hendro Joseph Dargay, the famous of all the Christian spies when he reached general Vivians army which was encamped about forty miles west of the flood and watching Manly's movements near Cronia village. He had been in the flooded country for over twenty four to twenty six days. In his watery adventures he missed great spying and scouting and other duties in Big Girl Knoll roads and Rood's Junction, and barely made his escape with some of the heat of his members.

"It was terrible, terrible," he said holding his head wearily, when he left general Vivians headquarters, and ran in a rode in a sort of daze to his own tent. "I'm going to retire early, for I'm so worn out and tired from my experiences, and I'm sure the rest will do me good. This tent is as good a camp of well you say, call it heavenly rest."

On a long wagon train which reached general Vivians army from the locality of locality of Little Big Girl Knoll after detouring over plank and dirt and other roads and risking the chances of encountering the fierce "red plague" were William Schloeder, and about ten other of his chief staff who had been gathered up on the way. All were exhausted and their horses about prostrated from encountering and enduring the fierce heat of the distant forest fires.

"Your Little Girl Knoll we hold a special council of purpose of proposing what should be done concerning the disasters of the past, to have investigations made to see who were responsible, and then having our plans well made, went to bed well pleased," said general parger still holding his head.

"We did not know a big flood was raging again, and when we were to start for general Vivians army having received by wireless the whereabouts of his camp, we were told that all railroad tracks and roads were gone, and the telegraph and telephone gone and that all of northern Angelinia state and many others were experiencing the worst flood of all time. I was surprised. Nevertheless we were directed to a new detour and while endeavoring to run around the flood came face to face with a big conflagration. Forest fire you say? Don't talk about it. It was a world fire. We found we might possibly get a wagon train by going to Chickadee Junction thirteen miles away but fearing the forest fire was coming on the town doubted whether we would get there ahead of it. But we decided to try. We got together five small wagons, loaded our members and some soldiers, and prepared to start. The forested plain below us burst into a great sea of roaring seething flames and smoke with the roar of a great applause from a million people, and from the night and noise one of the team burst or bolted down the road and smashed my rig. For the rest of us was the flood.

We loaded again in the face of the heat of the distant forest fire and continuing on our way again soon reached the flood just west of Turnburg. Then broke upon us the real fullness of the horror, for we saw a sea of yellow swirling water at our very feet, and at many points of the turbulent flood were tossing many whole houses with persons screaming from the windows of the roofs. I was spellbound as I watched for a long, long, long time. Then back we went to Little Girl Knoll, the horses exhausted, and one of the carriages broken. We arrived at the clock the next morning after an all-day flight before the increasing line of the deluge, and nothing accomplished.

We set out for Grainsburg that following day being a Thursday by driving forty miles to a genterville, southern Calvinian. Where we were not fugitive of the flood we were of the fire. I remember going through one ravine where a branch of the flood was rising through filling it with rushing water four feet deep, and this partly saved us as a wing of the forest fire over took us and we had to remain in water or for safety. So all allowed ourselves ourselves to be as wet as possible. The others laughed. I didn't. I prayed. And when we reached Santa ville we were no better off, for all the roads were gone, and though the town was safe so far from flood the forest fire was forcing itself ahead and toward the town like a sea of molten flames.

And then and then we got to Gladstone city. I nor my followers cannot tell you how, except that during the trip we lost nearly all our of our baggage and so never recovered them. Then secured an old only then running train but the engine and tender ran off the track, and it took twenty four hours to get them back. Then we crawled along to the village of gl. jansen. There we hoped to find a telegraph wire open, with the hope to snap off a message to Angelinia. But our hopes were in vain. We however finally beat it, and it took us more than four days to make the trip, leaving no time for rehearsal. And if you do not believe the completeness with which the raging waters performed their work and how little they retarded by man bridges and all kind of levees and barriers it is only necessary for you my dear air to go through the experience I had when before entering Angelinia Agathia I came to the little town of Chickadee Junction and saw that man suffered, and the anxiety they felt about those around them.

We got there after much difficulty, and found the flood had reached its crest at this little town, which was cut off from all the rest of the world by washed out bridges, which prevented all trains on its six line railroads from reaching the town from any direction. As a consequence it has had no newspapers or outside news of the flood.

When one of its citizens by a small stroke of luck came into possession of a Angelinia Agathia newspaper, he was the hero of the day. The whole town assembled in the top floor of a large building and the man for their benefit went through every page and item of the flood news. For a read the news.

there as the building threatened to go to pieces. "I would have fallen into the hot water if it had not been for daddy." "....." exclaimed the little girl, who was first of the four to recover sufficiently to talk. A large frame house was soon floating down with the immense flood. Four women and six children were in the windows. As they neared the Big Bend Street bridge they saw a crowd at the crowds on the edge of the flood, and the building struck the pier. There was a great crash the bridge collapsed, there was a swirl in the muddy waters, and a little further down stream the debris of bridge and building appeared, but none of the women and children. And everywhere everywhere the men whose duty it was to face the angry waters found their places again unflinchingly along the edges of the raging inland sea....

Two hours after he arrived home from Aberdeen, Angeline Vine State, where he and his men rescued sixteen nurses, twenty eight marines, and fifty seven Nuns and eighteen hundred children from the Central State Catholic orphan asylum, he saw many men under Captain James of the City's War Department life saving station doing all they could to to rescue the children, and he joined in and saved them all. Tragically at the orphanage at St. John's Town was followed by hysterical joy upon the arrival of a large number of marines to the rescue. A short time before volunteer life savers attempted to rescue the occupants of the orphan asylum and two boats with three nurses and fifteen children aboard with the volunteer life savers aboard were struck by wreckage and set afloat, and all but one child drowned. Following that fatal accident no further attempts to remove the Nuns, Nurses and children were made until the arrival of the Marine and government life savers. Huddled in the rooms on the top floors of the building, of which the first two floors were entirely submerged, the life savers found six hundred and twenty children, sixty Nurses and Nuns, and two of the employees. But two boxes of Unadorned Biscuits remained in the pantry for food. And they had been marooned for sixteen days.

Since all the other disasters of the past had occurred and with this following big one, one of the big problems caused by the tragedies in millions of homes and great numbers homeless and ill from plague, and many millions more added to the homeless because of the "Red Fire Plague, and of such a problem which the authorities of the whole nation including all including the states and cities had to face everywhere, inside, and outside was the method of getting provisions and of feeding the immense army of people made homeless, who were still homeless, from disasters of the past and who were marooned in their homes, when no kind of communications could yet be established. Indeed a record breaking famine was ensuing and hundreds of thousands had died from starvation owing to the terrible list of those who perished in the disaster. In the southern California part of the flood and the immediately surrounding territory a picture of the situation there was furnished by a Jesuit correspondent who was in the center of the water swept district.

" Hundreds of thousands of families, May millions in all flooded districts of that State alone spent nearly a score of days going hungry, terror, terrors by the ever rising waters, and in all instances absolutely without a cent for their longest hard earned savings. Everything is isolation, devastation being everywhere. In a district of 10,000,000 acres of country not a single Man can be said or attended and all churches and all contents have not been saved could be saved. Not the History of the nation has a flood brought such a disaster, or such complications of disaster and no aid can reach any one as both river and forest fire cut off every communication whatever, so try boating in the flood is tant amount. Millions of billions of a acres are still under water from the old floods alone and twice as many trillions of acres of land are under water because of this new one. May the whole nation is suffering from floods and from the most inexpressible plagues come cries for help in vain from countless thousands of families still imprisoned in imprisoned in the worse flood on record. Hundreds of trillions of dollars in the loss. Relief crews can be at work only in the larger cities affected by the flood, and they can do little. They try to work where the disaster is the greatest at risk of their own lives, but their work is progressing slowly and there is no hopes whatever when they will be able to answer all the calls for assistance.

"The former firm themselves a million men fighting them cannot stop. Two hundred towns already have been burned up and scores are afire. In cities less affected all the schools, fire stations, hospitals even big churches, refugee homes orphan asylums and the like have been burned to the victims, and every effort is being provided to make succor as rapidly as possible. Hosts of strong men are working in the stricken cities, food from higher stores not endangered by waters is being supplied in small quantities and volunteer workers are thronging to the assistance of the police and the national guards which are doing their utmost, but this is not even able to be in ordinary cities. Only in Angelina Agathia, Big Girl, Kool, Jennico, and Dorothy Dale can even this little be accomplished. In all other sections no aid can be done for each other by even the biggest of the American

The section flooded is as big as the far away country of the United States and Canada. CANADA combined and the deepest waters is said to be nearly three hundred feet, and all river courses of smaller streams are being obliterated or wiped out of existence, and bigger rivers are running swiftly moving seas.

One of the most serious problems or phases of the flood of the past disasters and of this past or future one raging now in the proposition of feeding the 500,000,000 people in the flooded regions, those still humans by past floods, and the extra 10,000,000 made homeless by forest fires, and in many cities and towns of smaller places that were taken refuge in the upper stories of their houses and refuge to sea or leave. Nearly four hundred persons took refuge in a big hotel at Aberdeen, Ga. and all plans made to carry them a motor boat full of sandwiches was of no avail, when the reader can therefore consider the vast expanse of country affected by this miser flood and of the vast territories that are still under water, and baked & by immeasurable forest fires, and which disaster came by explosions in the sea banks following the battle of Evangeline St Clara. It seems that instead of the enemy doing it, that the very heavens had opened their flood gates. In the beginning the horrors of the situation at Angelina, Acutha and the conditions at Dorothy Gals, and points elsewhere down the flood zones, and of the many places singled out by forest fires ad attracted the attention of the world that they almost lost sight of the disastrous results that followed the flood horrors of the past, despite the frightful loss of life caused by them. This flood was a "miracle" considering its immense size, great property loss, and yet so small a loss of life.

The great state of Anguillia doing all its best in holding out its hand to the suffering humanity in five other states, and the five worst states and explosion shaken, terrible territorial misadventure, and to give aid to both our own and northeastern Anguillia states toward which the flood was extending, was itself obliged to pause and count the cost of a part of the flood in herself caused by the rising of the beautiful genuine Miami River and other streams within its borders which receiving the northward flow of the immense flood was unable to hold all the water and literally flowed over the lowest lands. The disaster was extending immensely and blasting was done at other towns to try and release some of the water and prevent a complication of disasters there. In northeastern Anguillia state bordering the eastern corner of California, and the southern boundary of Abu e Abu, within its hundreds of cities and towns and other points were turned into water at once. All streets were made into canals, magnificent buildings flooded and the basements filled with water; fires in furnaces and engine rooms put out, drinking water supplies put out of commission or cut off, telephone and telegraph communications interrupted with, railroad traffic in that section now hindered also and the thoroughfares filled with muddy water and slime. "....."

Here death anywhere did not stalk in the muddy waters but the filth that was washed into the towns and cities by the raging waters threatened to precipitate an epidemic and caused grave fears. It is estimated that the loss in Abyssinikila Abyssinikila City is $10,000,000, in Baidoa ville from flood and fire $22,000,000, and in other places $100,000,000 or more. Abyssinikila city suffered from lack of drinking water, lights but lack of water was more than any other thing. All bottled water advanced twenty cents a bottle of small size, and there was not nearly enough to supply the demand. The Governor of Angeliinia State met the situation by taking up with the Angeliinia Agathia state government Commission the matter of bringing water from that place, until the filtration plant could be repaired but found Angeliinia Ag. Agathia could not even help herself.

In all cities and towns the inundation of the filtration plants left all cities and towns in the most grave danger of an epidemic of typhoid fever. Lack of clean warm filthy water caused through the mains of every city and town, and all the health authorities warned all citizens to boil water, but nevertheless the water was so filthy that even after boiling it many were afraid to use it. The majority of the people found it almost impossible to buy water in the cities and many went again into the unflooded sections of the country for a supply. Many of the big highways, bridges at Peloton, and others at Gunnings went down and the railroad bridges recently built across the Mc-Gilester Run near at Abyssinville Junction was damaged beyond repair. In the vicinity of Pine bridge some rural districts suffered severe damage.

Residents in those flooded sections passed many days and nights of misery in semi-darkness even during day time. Cellars were flooded and the houses damp. The police and others were besieged with demands for help and the city officials furnished food to those who sought it. In Gannings the water in many places was ten to twenty feet deep. One third of Abyssinikila gate was submerged. In ~~the district~~ ^{the town of} Resenbung city across the river from Abyssinikila city much more damage and suffering was caused. The loss of logs from lumber companies being swept away amounted to many millions of dollars, and the damage in the lumber district near Abyssinikila city was exceedingly heavy. The first loss of life reported in northeastern Angoulina came as the result of the flood was reported from Hendros junction. Many houses were swept away, and a hundred were reported drowned. The flood situation in Northern and Northeastern Angoulina became acute. The city of London with sixty thousand inhabitants was cut off, while all of the city of Caldwellville was a thing of the past and half of Carnation village was inundated. Because of receding the flood waters every stream in northeastern Angoulina and southern Abyssinikila Abyssil Abyssinikila broke through their protecting lee levees or overflowed them.

Many villages x villages in the valleys between the Evangelina St Clara and Angelina Agathia Railroad line were cut off from railroad and wire communication and many of them were swept away. The property loss can be estimated at many millions. Glendale, Orleans, St. Louis, and Galumau, Alhambra, Hottin and many other cities added to the numbers that suffered nearly as much property damage as Angelina. Agathia and her fellow sufferers. In the eastern end of the state of Abyssinilia the Gentile and Hobart valleys experienced the worst flood in the States whole history. In the city of Turin all power plants were put out of commission, street car commissions and cars and barns and tracks wiped out of existence, many buildings destroyed never to be repaired, and schools and factories filled with refugees wrecked with a great loss of life among the refugees. The south end of the city was wiped out, and many had rescued residents there in boats.

In Guimandu the water front street streets were submerged to a depth of thirty feet, whole districts of buildings were swept away or piled in wreckage, a new Galveston horror raged here for thirty days, and there was immense property loss with a life destruction estimated at seventy two thousand. Scores of thousands were homeless. Walterand reported her highest streets under ten feet of water with the flood running the speed of a mill race, with all the citizens marooned in those the upper stories. Two hundred were drowned here.

The many huge plants of the Hanson and Vivian general electric and Abbieannian Locomotive Companies in Turin city were wiped out with an immense loss. The whole country was being paralyzed.

CHAPTER II.

THE MIC-HOLLISTER AND ERMINIE RUN LEVEES..... COM-
ED TO DIMINUTE TO HAVE OTHER CITIES..... GREAT ATKA IN NORTH-EASTERN ANGELINA STATE, AND SOUTHERN ABYSSINILIA LAID TO WASTE..... BLENDING-FROM CREATHER DRIVE AGAINST FLOOD TORNENTS..... BLANDINIAN CHOUUR NOT DOWN..... SITUATED ON A LARGE FLOATING ISLAND..... A LEVEE BREAKS
BEFORE PRESSURE OF FLOOD..... DEPERATE FIGHT TO THE HILLS..... STEPHENOUR
MYSTICUS DAYS AND NIGHTS IN NAPOLEON..... ARYSSINKILIAN FLOOD TOUGHER A MAN WHO WAS NOT AFRAID..... COUNTLESS DEATHS..... ONE WHO KNEW OF AND PREDICTED THE DISASTER.....

The unexpected and wild rise of the great Mic-Hollister and Erminie Run Rivers, a thing never heard of in these Galverinian states before, because of continually receiving all the waters from the slowly receding floods and the new and bigger flood combined, and which for days and days nay months threatened and did exceed anything ever known in the history of streams of world disasters by rain only, and not by Galverinian Flood conditions made it finally necessary for the authorities of the States through which these rivers ran to adopt extreme methods along the whole many points on the States of Abbieannia, Dandobia, Tripontonia, northern Galverinia the levees were ordered out and explosives were used to form a breach which fortunately relieved the pressure at Sacramento, Abbieannia State, Pandora, of same state, and other big river towns along the frightfully flooded Erminie in which was even overflowing the levees at some spots.

A survey of the conditions along both the big rivers which was made with great difficulty on October 2th a month after the flood disaster began could be a basis for the following report showing the general situation:

The levee was ordered out at Sacramento, Galverinia State north, to save life and property as the Erminie threatened that city and many cities and towns along its whole stretch, and at this point where it was commonly a river six miles wide it was already twenty miles across and moving like an express train, the waters roaring like a Niagara Falls. Dynamite and T.N.T. was used to make a breach with the result that the pressure was considerably relieved.

The Big Pandina, Galverine and Pandora levees which protected the main drainage district and which was abandoned, went out to the northwest of its own accord and this was of some benefit to the cities near there as the high waters were thereby released. No cities in that locality were affected as the levee separating the main city of Sacramento itself from the drainage district, remained intact.

Long before the big Pandina, Galverine and Pandora levees went out the water had climbed up two to three feet over the railroad tracks, and the Executive Committee at Sacramento, considering that further preventive measures was really useless abandoned that district to its fate. It became well wrecked so far as dwellings were concerned, and half of the town was being deserted, and many big commercial houses suffered great loss. The Brandern levee on the Abbieannia State side, a large affair also went out, and another was blasted. The enormous levee in front of Hansons Lake, Felon Kauffmann Concentinia state, was reinforced with rock gravel and crushed granite and limestone. The region however was flooded, but a general break there now it was said would mean the flooding of about sixteen hundred counties, and would give impetus to the already swift current of the Mic-Hollister and Erminie run and other rivers and probably would mean great destruction along the upper and maybe lower Erminie Run Levees.

Mayor Henry Quier of Sacramento city, Abbieannia state issued the following statement at the critical hour:

Prospects are considered to be to be slightly favorable to successfully take care of approaching floods at our sister city of the same name in Galverinia, now coming out of the Erminie Run River, which waters is coming from a flood which is greatly exceeding the floods of the past months in Galverinia Galverinia, provided levees to the south and elsewhere hold or where no future levee breaching will not need to be necessary.

Flood conditions in northeastern Angelina state and southern Abyssinilia with hundreds of miles of land being laid to waste, and elsewhere and flood conditions along the Aronburgs in that neighborhood were declared by the oldest citizens to be the most desperate in their time. The waters from the flood rose the river the river itself two foot to four a day, and stood only two feet and one inch from the top of the concrete walls built at Levee No. ten. The rise was much faster than ever seen during the effects of even a cloudburst in those regions. The disastrous flood conditions because of rainstorms threatened to go before the disastrous waters of this flood. Every city and town in this locality threatened by the immense flood sent its women and children out on every train while the men remained behind to work on the levees to raise them so the floods would not overtop them as it was evident they were withstanding the flow. The weather was so far as smoke from distant forest fires are concerned was rotten, hot and smoky. Unless men acted as switchmen, loaded baggage, unloaded sand, clay and olay and lumber, while every one else, clerks, office employees, citizens and even priests, the Cardinal, bishops, and every one who could work handled shovels to strengthen the levees and dikes. Then men went to work with hand pumps to keep the streets clear of seepage water which came under the concrete walls. The water rose in places in the city of Alto to a depth of a foot.

The situation in this city became very precarious as all railroad communication was cut off by flood and fires. First the Groverton and Bainbridge railroad went out of commission, then the Abyssinikian and Calvinian and also Angelina, entrail railroads, and finally the Evangeline St. Louis and Angelina Agathia, and a score of other railroad lines were shut off. A food famine threatened here also as a result.

The inundation of southern Abyssinikia and northeastern Angelina was complete and very disastrous. The flood waters rose to a level with those of the main flood, and with those in the Erminie and other big rivers, and fortunately were prevented from flooding into the Aronburgs run only by the San Salvador and gautaulamaula levee. There were in Abyssinikia alone from 1 to 1,700,000 to 9,000,000 acres from 17 to thirty feet under water, and fifty towns were entirely submerged. The greater number of industrial plants in the cities in this section were submerged up to the third story windows, and smaller houses of any number were completely under water. Hundreds of big and small Hainigilomene an creatures caught by the floods while asleep swam the flood waters either in condemnation or delight but struggling a hard at times to swim against the current of the torrent. One of the most thrilling of the stories of Perryville Junction southern Abyssinikia was told by Colonel Hunsdon, Regimental officer of the Abyssinikian National Guard. They were rescued on a raft from a section of the San Salvador levee, which is 10,000 yards long and forty feet wide, and floating down the flooded Aronburgs run when a portion of it broke away. Thirty hundred men were on it, they claimed were on the main levee section, and were marooned with the water rising higher every hour.

Captain Munder of the City Naval Reserve at once arranged for a big and most staunch raft, and started out to rescue the Abyssinikian soldiers. A man who understood the course of the rapidly moving flood, went along to guide the rescuers.

There was a very swift current in the flood at this point and the safety of their men caused the commanding officers much worry. The regiments were on military duty in the town which had been threatened for many days on account of the spread of the flood, and the race in the launch drawn raft furnished a thrilling adventure seldom equaled and never read in fiction. A large subway which was the only passageway from Perryville Junction into the drainage districts was blocked to save the city. The place was boarded up and hundreds of carcasses of sandbags placed to hold it secure. When the workmen abandoned the levee of San Salvador to its fate they were brought brought into the city and set to work on the river front. Ave. H. corner of the St. Vincente Catholic Church who also had charge of relief work in former flood disasters again was appointed to be at the head of the Relief Committee. He had about two hundred and forty assistants, and a large temporary hospital, which was arranged in a large refugee camp on the shore of the flood.

Sacramento City is situated on lowlands fork of the two rivers Erminie run and Micopolistef run. Rivers. The safety of the city fully depended absolutely on levees from all sides, and there was no way however by which people walking or on trains could escape at all except by going back into the drainage districts. Consequently hope is always placed in boats and prepared rafts in case of great trouble. About three quarters of the population of the people mostly women and children left the city on the first alarm. At a meeting between officials of St. Francis County Abyssinikia, the city of Sacramento General Francis Henderson of the city of Sacramento and General Francis Henderson of the Abyssinikian National Guard it was decided to place the entire situation in charge of the general himself.

As soon as the authority was given to the general he detained squads of soldiers to go along the levees of both these great rivers as far as the drainage district and compel every one who is able to work and not already engaged to help reinforce the levee. There was no need of this however. Engineers were called into conference and asked for descriptions of weak points that special attention might be given them. The Abyssinikian National Guard which had headquarters in the woods near the city, moved its equipment to a large train of wharf boats which had been brought down the flood. This placed all quarters of troops on boats. Two additional Regiments, one from an Abyssinikian army near St. Marys, and the other from the Fifth Infantry were sent to Mounds Abyssinikia, where it was said a critical situation was developing, but on the way they were ambushed by a force of Glandelinians and routed. Nearly every home in the lowlands was deserted and wagon loads of furniture, trunks and households and other effects of every description had been taken to the railroad station, to be sent along with the refugees, but all this was seized by Glandelinians who took what they could use and burned the rest. Women and children were insulted, and the state troops in strong numbers were sent out in large regiments, each accompanied by a small battery of machine guns to try and round down these raiders and put them out of the region altogether but they too got the worse of it with dreadful loss and their officers killed or captured and sixteen standards and their artillery and ammunition to one regiment there was a division of Glandelinians. A Glandelinian army was believed to be concentrating here. One of the purposes of closing all places which did not handle goods needed for the comfort and necessities of the homeless people was to shield them from raiding Glandelinians and to give opportunity to get out the strongest working force possible. All employees of closed concerns responded willingly for duty, and reinforced to a great extent the work along the river front.

In this calamity as well as we know of those first in the past there are men among the Glandelinians with hearts of stone, Glandelinian vultures, and ghoul, or parasites, who prey upon the victims produced by the disasters of their own making, and this flood disaster was not without their quota of these strange war monsters. Not satisfied with making disasters, they must also rob the helpless refugees, the dead and broken houses. And when they were ruthlessly shot down by the army later was under a three day siege by the Glandelinian armies near Sacramento. A Glandelinian looter was found cutting off the finger of a woman drowned in the flood to obtain a diamond ring which could be turned into cash to carry on the successes of Glandelinia, and he was shot down where he stood, but as it happened other hidden ghoul shot down the soldiers.

To punish Glandelinian vandals was like punishing ghoul with only your hand. It was on a Thursday afternoon, when at Sacramento city the flood was receding but still high in many parts of the city, and the first bodies were being recovered. A body of a young woman but not a resident of Sacramento as could be proved, but which the flood brought into the city was discovered in the debris along the street a short distance away. The body was only partly dressed, but there were several rings on the fingers. It was apparent that the woman had slipped them on with the first alarm of danger in an effort to save what valuables she could. There were a number of soldiers and citizens taking part in the search for bodies at that point, and other bodies had been found near by. So the body of the woman was left where it was found until the undertaker with his wagon should arrive. One man was seen stealthily approaching the body. Then he was seen to stoop over her, and some one shouted one shouted to the soldiers that the man was cutting off her fingers for the rings.

The soldiers heard the cry, and hurried forward. The man who ever he was when the soldiers started to run. The foremost soldier yelled to him to stop, and when he kept on running raised his rifle and shot. The looter dropped at the first shot, and rolled over into a ditch. Then from doorways and windows of some ruined houses a fusillade of shots came and the soldiers sixteen of them all fell dead killed in ambush.

The body of the looter was picked up by a rush of strange men who fired and fired so the citizens kept under cover. Somewhere else another Glandelinian ghoul was captured and in his possession was found a woman's purse, a sack of diamond rings, and water soaked watches. He was stood up against a building and shot dead within a minute after he had been searched. He was not asked any questions either, and not permitted to say a word.

According to witnesses the sergeant in charge of a patrol took charge of another Glandelinian ghoul, shouted to the soldiers, the man was backed up against a wall, and riddled with bullets. An elderly man was killed by a Glandelinian sniper for revenge. The bullet of a rifle coming from behind him. The ghoul was proceeding laboriously along the muddy street, the mud being filled with all sorts of valuables. A report of a rifle was heard and he toppled over dead.

The ghoul left the city and reported to their commanders what had happened. The city was besieged and raided and set afire and the citizens driven out. Four weeks later aid came but not until the Glandelinians had looted a million dollars worth of damage.

In one place for fourteen days in northeastern Angelina fourteen people were marooned in different buildings, the refugees being kept prisoner by the rising waters on an upper floor of a hotel and the others as much as prisoner high up on the roof of another hotel. Haines knew whether the others were living or dead. The prisoners inside the hotel managed to catch such a box of some canned goods that came rushing along the water near one of the windows.

When the water receded the people inside the hotel waded to the hotel across from them and found only the others there safe. In the village of Haines during a robbery by Glandelinian ghoul was a Glandelinian who was trying to get away. He was arrested when police arrested two Glandelinians who were trying to get away from the town with a satchel containing one hundred dollars in diamonds, two hundred dollars in bills, and a million in jewelry which he had stolen with the help of his companion from jewelry stores in the shopping district.

fi fried a number of whole hams which had been previously sliced, cooked about a hundred quarts of rice-de-mice, made tea and coffee. She had a young girl acting as helper.....

Sister Ann carried some of her things by boat to the main building. I carried the rest of what I thought we might need, not thinking of our trunks, which were in the back attic. Sister Lena had a number of the girls help her and the priest clear the chapel and carry the vestments, altar linens and candle sticks to the upper floors of the main buildings. When the water started to rise to the top floor, Sister Angelia called carried the Blessed Sacrament over to the attic of the main building, Sister Helena and myself carrying the candles, and ringing a little bell. My heavens I shall never forget this sight, boating to one house and another with our own river craft we possessed, boating on water one story high since morning when it was only two feet and seven inches.

Sister Mary Ann, and the girls and many of the children cleared the convent. Sister Camilla was almost overcome before the blessed sacrament, where she had to arrange an altar or stand..

Sister Mary Jane and myself were busy afterwards of clearing out closets of eatables, such as canned salmon, corn, tomatoes, soup, prunes, raisins, coffee tea sugar, salt, butter, bread, and even candy, and fearing the water would soon give out, the girls were requested to fill pitchforks and other vessels and carry them and carry them to the attic, where everything and everybody would soon be stored. It so happened that we had a three hundred pound of ice in the enormous ice box which three men and I carried to the third floor, hoping it would give us a good supply of fresh water for a number of days.

All of us including myself took down religious pictures and all the window shades from the first floor, had all these and the furniture taken from first floor to third. The girls carried the table linen, silver cooking utensils and anything we might have to cook with..... We had to cook by candle light night and day, and were very glad to have it since the electric light and gas were out away.

Just think of being perched in the attics and hearing the roar of the water, the crash of waves and the crash of timber in its hurry to meet the way. Our six outhouses in the back and one in front, and two on the right glim I gilded from their foundations before our very eyes. The darkness which was strangely lit up in the sky far off at night did not let up sufficiently at day to enable one to read or write without a light. After clearing everything we could from the lower floors, I was the last to leave the dining room, the first floor now being filled with water, so that it lifted chairs and other lighter furniture and blipped them against the ceiling.

I was in the pantry at the time in search of a can opener to open our canned goods. Then it struck me I had better make good my escape while I still had the chance to find the stairs. I had a mad race with the water but succeeded..... We ate dinner in the great retreat room. The girls ate theirs in a bedroom. The orphans were fed wherever they were assembled in the attic. As many as could be stayed stayed before the Blessed Sacrament. The main building was filled with water so rapidly that Sister Ann thought it best to call the Sisters when the girls were not present. We all went before the Blessed Sacrament, and kneeling for a few moments in profound silence, we repeated the act of resignation to the holy will of God--to meet and await death at any moment and to offer our lives if possible to save others from perishing.

Oh such days and nights of horrible fear. With every steady hour of the floods rising with evident intention of driving us all even to the very roof, and yet threatening to engulf the building altogether, the children could not be quieted. They screamed and cried, cried, prayed and hid under beds, or covers, or hid huddled like frightened mice in the corners. Go to one window you would see where once before there had been countless buildings, now a vast crashing rushing sea of water, houses floating by, go to another, two or three planes, go to another sideboards and rafts and houses with people on them, in fact there was everything from an egg shell to a dead woman man or child rushing by. The houses of our fair city seemed to have disappeared entirely. It seemed we were in a few orphan homes standing on a submerged island in the ocean during a storm.

So such prolonged darkness day and night was never seen in this country before and to me at first it was mysterious. I never had the thought of forest fire smoke in my mind. There are few lamps used here, since in this country electric light and lamps are so cheap and plentiful, consequently when these were cut off, we were without means of illumination entirely when our carefully used candles finally gave out. The place for keeping sanctuary oil and candles and the like being in the cellar of the main house it was the first to be flooded, cutting off all access thereto. In desperation we had to take candles we use for the altar, and those that happened to be in higher house for cooking our meals.....

For many days and nights we remained in the attic not being able to go down as far as the third floor. During the afternoon of the fourteenth day the children were requested to take their mattresses and bed clothes to the better parts of the roof in case the flood would reach the attic and drive them there. We Sisters took what we thought we might need to the same place. About six o'clock we had a little to eat. After night prayers, which were said in common about eight o'clock. Truthfully speaking not one of us had to be reminded of such a duty at such a terrible time, as we were praying day in and day out--especially especially when we were not praying. There was not a prayer in any of the prayer books that was not recited many times. We sang the Salve Regina, the O Human, we had night prayers, and poetry upon poetry and continual litany of all kinds. Sister Rose thinking that perhaps the crisis was at hand, told the children they could go to the roof, go in boats if they came or stay with the nuns and watch proceedings. As with one voice they said: "We will stay with the sisters the sisters. She then told each to take a blanket and pillow and find her own mattress to lie on while the sisters would be on the watch..

Being a cripple from an injury received before the flood had reached its height for a over a week, I could not hardly move... I was beginning to stiffen so thought I would lie down---this being ten o'clock o'clock o'clock was awakened by mice resting on my chin and breast. On the horrors of that awakening.

Prayer has not ceased since the Blessed Sacrament has been deposited in the attic. Even while eating, some one or many are before the blessed Sacrament in prayer. Every morning we would have prayer at five o'clock followed by meditation....

Then we would string up a tea pot and a coffee pot to the rafters in the main attic, placing two candles under each to boil them. Not having any ground coffee one of the girls threw in a handful of the whole beans.. You may guess the kind of coffee we had. When I came on the scene, I took a bowl of the coffee beans, and placing them in a clean towel I trampled them to pieces, helped by Sister Ann to grind to powder anything she also might step on.. When this was put in the coffee pot we had coffee.

Then we had some strange soup when we prepared for dinner. Sister Camilla, was master this time of ceremonies. One of the girl workers proceeded to hang a kettle by a rope to the rafters. This kettle made of strung strong aluminum one inch thick all around, holding about eighteen gallons, was placed over six lighted candles, somewhere in the neighborhood of twelve thirty. There was everything in the soup from potato skins to whole turnips. When the kettle was hot enough it was taken off the candles, and we partook of it good and hearty.

After supper all started to say night prayers in common when all of a sudden there was the most frightful whistling and calling from window to window to put out the light,, as there was danger of us being blown up, as there was so much gasoline and other oils floating upon the water..

A week later while I was still sick in bed the flood began to rapidly go down. As leaving the convent soon. Afraid of the Glandelinian vandals, who step at nothing even rob the dead by the grave, and even living persons and houses. People said we were in paradise compared to them we were up so high. I am soon to feel fine. The flood is receding. God be blessed.."

The tolerance of the reader is asked in this chapter because it is almost an interpolation. It had no place in the original compilation but the conditions that developed in every city and town hit by flood and forest fires, justify the presentation of this strange nations horrible war calamity in its true nature to the entire Glandelinian made catastrophe.

This is the appeal-----the wail of sorrow that issued from that disaster torn country of Calaverina, and her sister states more than a month after the flood has subsided, and the forest fires have grown to frightful intensity.. It is not in the sense of the word supposed to be a story filled with thrilling rescues, probably I really should have left that out entirely, as we all know deeds of bravery always occurs in time of disaster but the portrayal of dire conditions of which the very world learned little for months because of all communications being destroyed because at the height of the disaster, and the results of the past disasters, and of the now raging forest fires burning over thousands of miles of forests, the striving wail of the World Community in Calaverina and Angulinia Ag-thia was entirely shut off from the world..

It's story did not reach the public and foreign news paper correspondents could not find means to send their stories on, and in fact were cut off the sea. The Red Cross representatives, after a canvass reported that few Red Cross members could accomplish anything, that 10,000,000 people of this new flood alone, were in dire need of rehabilitation, and one team of thirty five thousand people had no houses left to them at all. The Red Cross having few nurses and doctors were jeopardized, and though the armies were forced to send doctors Red Cross nurses, and so forth these were not enough, nay there were not enough doctors and nurses in all the country, and the plagues caused by past disasters were running wild by now, so were the forest fires. There was also a report of a new flood of great intensity breaking out somewhere else. This is the appeal (in vain) made for the stricken states, the like of which has been made in the interest of the few nearest communities.

THE WHOLE OF CALVERINA needs help and if not aided soon the population affected by this disaster and the disasters of the past will be wiped out altogether. Not only are the plagues raging everywhere with a fury that nothing now can be stopped, but starvation and lack of water causes immense suffering and people cannot leave the flood stricken communities because the forest fires cut off all escape, and prevent sufficient aid from reaching them. Even the Capital seat of Foreign Communication, the Recognized world center of News and all over the world is sent and relayed relayed, is prostrated, no, not prostrated, but a thing of the just, and all great manufacturing interests, the greatest producer of manufactured paper in Angelinia and of all of Abbieannia, in Angelinia Agathia, one of the most active industrial paper and news centres of the whole Abbieannian country is prostrated, as well as Angelinia, Agathia, and every big city in South Calverinia and parts of Northern Angelinia, and other states are prostrated also as no town or city has been prostrated since the great devastating flood and explosion disasters of the past.

In the great swirl of record breaking disaster which overwhelmed Southern Calverinia so many cities and towns were devastated that it has been hard to differ properly but we will say and it is a founded truth, by the truthful predictions of our Bishops and priests that if this disaster had been sudden as those of the past, the loss of life would have made the death list of those of the past combined together in one a mere nothing. Angelinia Agathia and Dorothy Gale, suffered woefully worse than any city of the past horrors, but proportionately Jessica and Lucille Rickson cities suffered five times as much, while Heidi Junction was wiped out. This is not presented to the world because of the conditions which precluded the proper dissemination of the news.

But Jessica has no false pride. She wants it known. Lucille Rickson and Angelinia Agathia want it kept secret. As bad as they are devastated they believe they can help themselves. But not so Jessica is figuratively upon her knees supplicating. To make matters worse her sewerage system, her light plant her sewer water works system are destroyed. The sewerage system in Angelinia Agathia despite the fury of the flood still is said to be partially safe.

Her sewer water works are not harmed though her light plants of course though not damaged is without communication as the wires are all down down, and her strongest buildings though not fit for habitation are still standing.

In Jessica the paving has all been swept away by the water. In Angelinia Agathia the paving remains firm. In Jessica all the strongest houses have been torn from their foundation, all of rich people and working men, many overturned in the streets, or swept down with the flood. Not a wall of a church of the city remains and the priests were not able to save anything even the blessed Sacrament were victims of the flood. The biggest loss of life ranks here.

The loss of life was five thousand five hundred. No one were effected by the explosion shocks here not even a building.

With no desire whatever to make comparisons that would in any way minimize the seriousness at Angelinia Agathia itself, the statement is justified after visiting Angelinia Agathia, Dorothy Gale, Mombi, Heidi Junction, Lucille Rickson and Jessica that no city in the flood state suffered even in the slightest degree comparable to Jessica. One even now immediately after the recession of the flood might walk through the streets in Angelinia Agathia, in Jessica there are no streets just a wide stretch of drowned wreckage which is there. It is necessary to climb with a few buildings protruding through here and there. Every bridge connecting with all sections of Jessica was swept away. The Post office, the Court Building, the expensive banks worth many millions are swept away. The loss of life is considered over five thousand but no one may know how many human lives were lost because 10,000 more are missing.

There were many witnesses, including the Comid Gemini Chief Members, and the Supreme Person Hendro Dargar who in succession made a voluntary statement to all authorities of Abbieannia and her states, in which they stated that the property loss and the loss of life in Jessica was greater in their opinion, than then that suffered in any other city throughout the flooded districts. Even Dargar concluded the statement with this: "The present paper in drawn up with a view to assisting the very government of the Nation in securing financial assistance that is desperately needed. The undersigned has no interest in any way and this statement is unsolicited." In desperation the Jessica Relief Committee, headed by George Hur, one of the leading men of the city considered the advisability of appointing a general committee to wait on the Government Officials in Abbieannia and ask government aid. Before taking final action this committee by wireless attempted to call up the governors of the stricken states, but even through this this means could not get any communication whatever. The governors however had secured outside committees that they would do everything possible to afford relief to stricken people of the cities and towns.

Jessica lies in the centre of one of the richest farming and forested communities in southeastern Calverinia. Even all its manufacturing interests are of international institutions have stood at the head in the nation. A perfect National Wall Street.

Now all is wiped out, and more lost than if New York and Chicago put together with all their financial interests together.

Emperor Vivian, that is the main Emperor and father of Violet and her sisters, and by this illustrating even the desperation of Angelinia Agathia also, of her situation, the Emperor stood in the bread line for three days and nights to get enough food to sustain him until something can be done so he can move of and take charge of his armies. The Citizens committee even made requests that these facts be presented to the newspapers that the world might know.

Nevertheless this is also the case with hundreds of bank Presidents of every city in the country. Jessica's distress however is infinitely worse than that of any other city. Jessica is in tears and appealing. Jessica needs help and needs it now, and yet no such help is forthcoming. It cannot come to any district flood stricken. The general opinion at first that the city and many others would recover in a few months from the flood was completely shattered after the committees had had time to make a tour of the stricken city and see for themselves what the damage was. The plan to the newspaper men not to paint the picture of the flood so black because the business houses of other cities and towns would be working in a couple of weeks, was changed to a most frantic appeal to place the exact situation before the world. Hundreds after hundreds of districts of houses had been wiped out. Millions of people have been completely ruined. Thousands of rich people have lost all. Business houses have either been washed away or crippled so badly that it will be years before they resume operation. All of the population of the city is without a cent in the world and no place to call home.

Indeed Jessica was the hardest hit city in the flooded sections of the country. The Abbieannian Secretary of War, the Head of the provincial Military government, Frank Turner, and many others who spent two weeks in Angelinia Agathia say that while the loss of property was great in the "Emerald City" of Abbieannia, yet Jessica, equal to her size and population was the worst of any. At first it was said that fifty thousand were drowned. Since the floods recession the bodies of fifty five hundred victims have been recovered and ten thousand others are missing.

The appeal for aid could never be made too strong. The conditions too depressing for any one to exaggerate. Everybody in the city had been hard hit. Families so separated for eternity, losing their all property, and even health. The city is far worse than even at first comprehended. Even those of Angelinia Agathia and the Mayor of Angelinia Agathia himself and the Emperor said that Angelinia Agathia has suffered nothing like her sister city Jessica.

The Mayor declared there is no comparison between the two twin cities. Every house in Jessica sustained total losses. Five thousand five hundred lives were wiped out. 10,000 are missing. Maybe they are dead and will never be recovered.

Men who had plenty before the flood found themselves one week after the flood without a thing in the world. All the factories and stores were completely ruined. The people thrown out of work will find it hard to get along for years to come and to avenge their losses plan to join the army and fight Glandelinia. The people of the whole country realized that Jessica has passed through one of the worst floods ever known of or written.

Emperor Vivian himself, when he had the opportunity had the following letter mailed to his brother Emperor Hanson Vivian. It ran as follows:

"To my Hon Brother, Emperor Hanson Angelic Vivian, Pandora Abbieannia;

Your Gracious Majesty---Our message from you brought by a man in a boat was the most encouraging message that has yet come to the people of this stricken city of Angelinia Agathia. Our Community of one million three hundred and thirty four thousand people is prostrated. Desultory reports indicate to us that other big cities have suffered are more greatly than even us even Lucille Rickson, but we can conceive of no conditions whatever worse than those that will confront us and My Royal members in Jessica itself. In the judgement of Hendro Dargar, and the head of the Provisional Military government and others also, all who have visited all the stricken cities, the property loss in Jessica is greater in actual amount than in any of the other flood stricken cities of southeastern Calverinia.

This judgement also is confirmed by many newspaper men. The flood had entirely covered the city. All the houses, business houses, factories and Churches are gone. The sewerage system, street paving, light and water plants are wiped out. All bridges spanning the rivers are gone. Our greatest industries are paralysed for years, and have incurred tremendous losses. The most critical estimates in my own city Angelinia Agathia in business and factory place the loss at from $100,000,000 to $500,000,000 out of a total of $40,000,000,000. In Jessica it is estimated the loss of factories and homes and business places cover the losses in Angelinia Agathia. The loss of lives will certainly run into the many thousands. The statement of facts will acquaint you with the needs of the city and all other cities and towns. Eventually we will recover, but you will realize that our sources are at this time exhausted. Jessica and her sister cities needs help in the worst way. No false pride can restrain this appeal. We want you and the whole nation of Abbieannia to know. Most respectfully yours;

Your Loving Brother,
Emperor Robert Angelic Vivian."

General Hendro Dargar also sent a letter to Emperor Hanson Vivian explaining the Jessica situation. The general arrived in Jessica on the last of October. In his letter he wrote to the Emperor he said:

"The undersigned has not been able to make any estimate of the awful damage there but it is fully evident that the whole city is entirely prostrated. Food and clothing can be received only in the smallest quantities, and no aid of any kind can be forthcoming. The situation is awful."

Back.

Probably a most interesting part of the chapter can be added to the statements regarding the flood situation in northern Angelina by Amfess Vivian, and aided by the chairman of the National Abbelesman Red Cross Relief Committee. In a report supplemented by one also made by Her own Red Cross representatives in Northern Angelina it was shown that two weeks after the new flood, 6,789,999 persons in that state alone were in need of aid for rehabilitation in the various towns and cities in the following proportion of greater disaster, while a greater number were homeless in southern Calvernia as a result of the same flood: Miami, 103,000, Hanesville, 111,000, Hanesbury, 220,000, Angelina Agathia, 10,000,000, Dorothy Gale, 1,888,888, Beladon, 50,789, Fultonia, 100,000, Rufenia, 123,456, Jessica, 9,889,000, Delacarrion, 87,884, Franklen, 456,000, Fullments, 17,000, Galladale, 19,000, Remmert, 176,000, Ironora, 100,000, Laurleton, 10,000, Maltata, 14,789, Maaden, 45,678, Mic-Hollister, 100,000, Marie Kornmann, 450,000, Jenniesburg, 20,000, Big Girl Knool, 1,567,000, Middleknool, 10,000, Ottusian, 125,100, Piquian, 14,000, pass, 174,567, Portanert, 17,000, Sidneys Graves, 125,898, Griffin, 20,000, Tret, 200,000, Besty Hobbin, 20,000, and Juneaves 200,000. All other cities and towns too long to list were 3,456,666. These figures do not even cover the suffering in other states.

The ability of Abbelesmans to meet emergencies, to do the best that can be done in any situation usually is emphasized in the story of recent great disasters, but on this occasion they are stuck. The hundreds of thousands of big tents sent by the War Department within a few short hours after word of the great floods reached the federal Department in Pandora, the hundreds of millions of dollars given with free hand in every section of the country, NEVER REACHED THE PLACES DESIGNED FOR BECAUSE OF THE DAMNABLE FOREST FIRES BLOCKING EVERY PATH WHERE THE SUPPLIES AND SO FORTH COULD AND SHOULD BE SENT. THE SITUATION INDEED IS ----- TERRIBLE.

Only thing that was done and only within the flood zones itself was the great acts of kindness, and the brave deeds performed by men and soldiers and even women and elder children in all stations of life without urging, the ingenuity that the militia men and home guards and police and deputy sheriffs displayed, should and would be written down in the records as worthy of being remembered in the minds not only of the Fiction Abbelesmans but to all Christians in real life.

Who in instance but a real christian general would have conceived the idea which was put into effect as soon as the thought was made up of trying to print a paper in the flood bound city of Angelina Agathia to convey to the citizens information about conditions and carry directions and instructions to the city city militiamen, volunteer policemen and rescue workers.

Such a good bulletin was issued under the direction of the Governor of Calvernia, from his own headquarters, which for a time became the executive headquarters for the city, state and government. And in the hour of need the Calvernian Governor, with the name of a trained newspaper writer, sat down and over his own signature, sent to the world by a courier by boat a story of the flood and forest fire conditions, which would open the purse strings of the country still more, and bring relief to the millions whose very all had been taken from them by the great waters and fires. But the work which the nation was compelled to do was still prevented by forest fires. The relief that could be sent was terribly slow, by means of boats down the flood and river only, and the situation after the disaster had subsided was becoming more acute every day. The Greatest Horror was the threatening of a most Record Breaking famine, with elsewhere a wildly raging plague sweeping off hundreds of thousands per month. Outside the flood zone, (not counting the general big forest fire) a hundred new forest fires were burning, and what communications was not cut off by the fire fires was directed and in the hands of the enemy.

It was evident the enemy intended to crucify Calvernia, and persecute Angelina and her sister states.

The forest fires, the enemy engineers, and the movement of raging battles of such inconceivable violence are also given as the cause of the floods of the past and present, according to the statement of Burgar Henderson, director of the Abbelesman Weather Department. Nothing else but the enemy has anything to do with the floods, he said. Otherwise Science he said, is at a loss to determine the cause of the floods by this forest fire now raging, which is beyond the field of observation.

"So far," said the head man of the Weather Department "the situation of the forest fires has not been found to have anything to do with past floods. Ever the heaviest rains of last spring, and the melting snows have nothing to do with the past floods, although many experiments have been made on this line. The rivers making this new flood have been before this acting partially merciful by slowly and carefully draining all the waters of the present floods, and some lakes also, especially the Big Mic-Hollister Run River, the Erminie The Norma Run with their general and beautiful tributaries. There had been no inadequacy of river engineering work and therefore that these big rivers relieving the flood waters of the past disasters, and which were taken it to the sea should burst their levees because of the concussion of the forest fire explosions have the real reason for the flood. Investigation shows the levees did not break apart on this occasion. They were lowered by the concussion to such a degree that the water of the river then displaced them in city. Jessica is in tears and appealing. Jessica needs help and needs it now, and their aid, and being were hard to build on with this kind of a flood. 183 going on the levee could be built strong enough to prevent the disaster that occurred. He declared that, as living near inland lakes and rivers have been uneasy since the floods of the past as the, knew the enemy was mean enough to do anything, and was so considering consideration for any, as one when he wished to gain his success in the war.

183

A little boy was rescued from the third story of a house where he had been marooned for days by men in a boat. He was a five year old child, and was alone in the house when surprised by the flood. The flood drove him to the top story where he was without food, clothing and pure water, when taken out he was suffering intensely from hunger and exposure.

At another house six women and one man and many children were rescued from the roof. They had broken a hole through the ceiling into the attic, and from there they succeeded in attracting the attention of a rescue party, in a boat.

A large hold was put in the roof and every one were taken out and lowered into the boat with the use of chains and ropes. People leaving on the edge of the flood on a stretch of ground much higher than the levees and just beyond the flood zone took turns at working day and night rescuing survivors from their inundated homes. At that time the water seemed to be receding and it was hoped that every one would be taken out of the valleys. As night drew near again, those that were on the hills renewed their efforts to rescue those still marooned because it was feared that those in the flooded houses if left in the flood could not survive much longer. Many rowboats and motorboats made trip after trip into the flooded district and each would come back with six or seven survivors. These were taken to private homes immediately and given nourishment, and put to bed. Most of the survivors were cared for in private homes and that each a house outside the flooded district had its large number of survivors.

About three hundred and sixty eight people were cared for in holdens big farm. Here many survivors were being fed and kept as cool as possible despite the heat. However there was no organized relief work, but nevertheless every one was doing his or her share. It became necessary however to remove about 2,3456 persons from the refugee camp at Gertrudes Creek. Here a relief station had been established, but before the pressure of the flood a levee broke, the water reached the refugee camp and steps were taken at once to remove the people from the camp. This interrupted the rescue work in this locality a after this.

section of the city, a fine view of the city and the bridge. When in the branches of trees could be seen which were not broken. Beside these showed the rage of the water, and the fierceness of the water. Every one could be seen the crazy vagaries of the current that seemed to take delight and malicious delight in sparring the frail, and cracking its fury upon stronger talkings and rowers. In a still street the boat was pushed against a third story window, of which both sash and frame were gone-looking within, after the breeze became used to the change of light, as it was even dark enough outside, two bodies were seen, that of a man and a woman, (girl). It could be seen that the man's arms were raised through the range of the overturned chair in different corner of the room, (where the woman was lying, but his wild staring eyes were turned toward the window, elevated from that had once evidently seen his eldest daughter, and it was in the death agony he yet thought of her and wished it not that they meet again, at least, as good bye.

A black cry came farther along, a cottage altogether lower from its foundation seized and swept upward by the current. In one room were the bodies of at least ten little children, the youngest being little girls six, the rest boys and girls between nine, ten, and eleven up to twelve. They were lying in groups or side by side and in the loose water that a lined floor side to side over the floor of the room tossed and rolled their toys—once gaily colored balls, dolls of all kinds some broken some intact, some once home art, now right side up, now all kinds some broken some intact, some once home art, now right side up, now all kinds some broken some intact.

The opposite, now all aglow with an under-aid projection of arched light. In the dining room of the cottage were the bodies of eighteen adults, and nearly two thirty other children much younger, too late were all in various manner clothing. The whole tragic story was revealed—foolish neighbors leaving their own and seemingly more insecure houses, probably lower down, and seeking what they fondly imagined as a haven that proved far otherwise. In all there were 58 bodies to be counted. Three were in the water, others on porches, and the rest imprisoned within their floating towns. And over all the strange twilight darkness continued as if a worlds tragedy had been to turn into the terrible results of the coming of the worlds end. One of the survivors met on this sea of water in North Angelina Agatania a trying experience, while he was trying to reach his own home, where Agatania's wife and children lay dead. His wife and children had perished as a result of the flood, before they could be reached. It was with great difficulty that the man and a companion reached this North Angelina Agatania home. They found the wife and child buried in the mud and mud which settled on the second floor. Another family which had a strenuous experience while the surging waters were about to wreck their house escaped their lives with their lives however. They had been forced to retreat to an attic while there the waters were creeping on them. Their appeals for help were heard and assistance rendered them.

Appeals for help were heard and assistance rendered them. Center Street was still in the appeals for help were heard and assistance rendered them. Center Street was still in the forced to retreat to an attic room where assistance rendered them. Appeals for help were heard and assistance rendered them.

Another refugee living on North Center Street was still in her home looking after the goods and she had been there some eight days during the full month she was a prisoner on the attic floor. The most terrifying thing she said she observed was a six year old child floating by her window. She said full from its mother's arms as she was being rescued. The coat in which these people were trying to get to shore yesterday during the night was still after such a long time.

The mother herself sought out to speak with the police and to stay there for several hours until help came. Then the family and mother were able to hold onto the rooftops and later all were rescued. It was not until after three months before the family were released.

[illegible][illegible]

not badly in need of food from her longshoremen's friends when so many were without food. After spending time and money in the attic of their home on Market Street in the flooded district, a whole family was taken out and removed to the care of relatives home the same for their long imprisonment. The father and the mother and husband are alone at home when the floods came and with many others at first was inclined the high waters not to leave and would be like prove provide floods just at that time. They went at first to the second story of their home where they removed plenty of food, and later to the attic where they carried their children and a supply of new bedding and clothing. They had coffee at every meal, because the husband likes a coffee pot over a candle and boiled the coffee at every meal time. One family of their neighbors was with them, and they spent the dark days with more comfort, and with a little assistance, their home not being flooded, threatened at any time because because because the current was not anything, it was too directly, or strongly.

They were away until the flood receded, hundreds of families were finally reunited at the various relief stations throughout the city, and the lot of persons that swarmed the city, despite the "21" guard somewhat lightened the night and was a consolation that appeared on Loretto Gale, since the flood came 40 ft. here.

aided by the hot weather produced by the distant forest fires more than anything else the authorities succeeded in reaching the last inundated buildings in the stricken districts, and all those who wished to leave were taken to relief stations or high land. Many however rather remained, danger having passed, and therefore the mud and brown water was busy in the mud filled houses of the flood areas.

As the smoke cleared miles looked down on a gruesome SIGHT where the mud caked dead, crews combed the swirling drifts and masses of debris that extended the full length of every street and for miles down the river. Steadily the death list grew as body after body was dragged from the wreckage or fished from the swirling waters. In many cases the bodies were lodged so tightly in the wreckage of wreckage that they were accidentally mangled by the working men who disintegrated them. Many of those recovered were almost beyond being recognized as a result of their trip through the battering debris.

The water and the walls of mud that contained the wreckage and debris together hampered the work of the searchers and led the authorities to draw the conclusion that the part of the wreckage could not be searched for many weeks.

Thousands of the survivors taken from the flooded districts returned later to their homes especially when the flood had abated entirely. The receding waters left the city completely free from flood, and the efforts of the militia, were redoubled to prevent the looting by disguised Ukrainian vandals of houses left deserted.

Simultaneously with the identification of some of the 'blood victims', there is an instance of three persons who perished in one point. A man first fled from the onspringing waters to the hilltop, and then seeing two others in peril swam back through the swift current, and successfully persuaded the two to desert their no-exit way were overcoast of their muffled and stoutly insulated, that they were provisioned for a long siege, and that they were not at all afraid. All three were drowned.

One man taken 4 partly gunken, and the cold not remember his name, a r.p. man of twenty, one year old was found lying of illness and exposure in a large house on the floor torn western section of the city, of Angelina Mathis. He could be found who could identify him, and he was taken to an Indiana asylum. Another incident of a family who prepared against an eruption when the flood started to inundate the city it came from the City's Catholic Orphan Asylum Asylum. When the Sisters saw the flood coming they, perimaded the cows belonging to the lions to enter the main kitchen, and sheltered them. Outside about ten of them, where they gave them them a private room. They also laid in a supply of corn and hay and hay. Result, a plenty of fresh milk and some to even spare to outsiders who faced starvation.

Another home, but for the aged mother home but for the aged took their chickens in the house, and not only saved the chickens, but had plenty of fresh eggs. Eggs, a man was taken from a tree and supposed to be dead and removed to the temporary morgue in one of the refugee camps and laid with the few corpses to await identification. A small girl standing by thought he she detected a slight motion in the mans body and called a doctor who made an examination. Then resuscitatives were quickly applied, and after heroic work the man was returned to consciousness and taken to the home of friends.

hardly no pictures could compare to be presented to the eyes of men or others like that which was made visible by the receding waters at Angelina Agathia. Among many other places, when the great flood had subsided and the waters began to fall the sun then did not come out and darkness like twilight continued to spread over the middle waters that filled all of Angelina Agathia most favored straits. A description of the scene and conditions as they were then revealed even in the twilight darkness could be given credit if told as so, probably as they really were not so word as becoming them fully. Yet as the waters that for so long over a month had engulfed Angelina Agathia and hundreds of other cities and towns began to recede they left a sight which ever grows worse and worse with the receding. According to the testimony of many war correspondents Angelina Agathia in the worse, unfortunate City of Angelina and other California States lies in its rusted setting, broken twisted, and amidst the refusal of the coming of the sublime or of everything in great all the time passed it seems no longer will, came to their old time sparkling coast with the terror of old but not still, and miserably look involved and darker than the slate gray skies.

The naval militia in guard at the approaches of Riverside were strict in their absolute refusal to allow any boats or persons to land.

millions of times they would fail to reveal in comprehensive detail the desolation of the stricken city. Whole streets and every one of the streets are heaps of splintered timbers, twisted steel and brick and mortar. Residences which were once magnificent and beautiful could have been seen upturned and broken into parts. Districts and a districts of houses could be observed jammed against one another in baffling confusion. Every thoroughfare are littered with debris for all their distance and about all is a sea of mud and water.

Many survivors told vivid stories of the terrors and suffering accompanying the flood. Many who survived were witnesses to the suffering and bravery that marked the struggling of the city folk in the grip of both flood waters, and consuming fires. Some said they saw a score of bodies. Another man said he saw eighteen persons rescued from flooded houses and heard some most terrible stories of suffering. One family of Calvernia was preparing to leave their home. The flood swept against the house tearing it from its foundation. The father was holding his three year old child above the water which was up to his waist, when rescuers found him on the fourth day. Another rescuer stopped at a partly submerged house where many people were culling frantically for help. He took four in a boat but it was cut by a current and upset. The rescuer was the only one who was saved, by others in the house whom he had been bent on saving himself. Everywhere possible people sought refuge in the tops of houses, trees and on roofs. A man and his wife and two children were thrown out of a boat that was upset by the current and all were drowned.

One of the descriptions of the scenes witnessed in the flooded districts of the Angellina State was related in Big Girl Knoll by a man who is a patrol member of Emperor Angellina Court and whose home is in Pandora, Calvernia. He left the Pandora City when news of the flood came to search for his parents, and wife who live in Dorothy Gale City, North Angellina. He was said to be among the first of outsiders to be allowed entrance into the flooded district, going in with troops sent by the Calvernia Governor. He was allowed entrance because of his high rank. After a perilous trip Baron Hands reached Dorothy Gale City two weeks after starting out and found his mother safe, but learned that his father was in Angellina Agathia and his family too. He at once started for the latter city with several companions of the militia, walking down the west shore of the flood to Alto City, and thence by handcar to a point sixteen miles below where they were forced by a washout to abandon the car. Alternately rowing and walking the party reached the edge of Angellina Agathia two days later at five o'clock in the morning, and immediately rowed to the main section of the city, but avoiding the sections that were burning.

"The night that met our eyes is entirely beyond description," declared the Baron. "This shows what kind of a foe Glandellina is. However, the water had greatly receded and we could see the full extent of the disaster. At the main railway station I saw crowds of refugees on top floors who had been marooned there for days. At one place fifty bodies lay intermingled with a mass of household furniture, dead horses, and cattle and debris of every sort. I feel sure that the final list of dead in Angellina Agathia will exceed three thousand," he declared. The Baron found his father safe in a hotel but could not find his wife anywhere. He feared she had perished. Yet she had survived and the description of her rescue was told by her to reporters. She was visiting her parents at 1915 Vivian Avenue in Riverview, near the scene of the main rush of the flood, and spent thirty three days in the attic of the home on small rations and little water but mostly wine before being rescued.

"On the first day of the flood," she said, "the warning was sounded in Riverview but as of course did not hear it. Half an hour later we were aroused by observing an unusual amount of water coming into the streets, and at first we wondered, as there had been no rain in this part of the country hardly all summer. We removed all the lighter property to the third floor but a day later the water was up to the landing of the second floor stairs, and on the morning of the next day we had two feet on the third and last floor causing us to go to the attic. There all of us about ten spent more than thirty days until our rescue on small rations. We could see the glare of the far distant forest fires. It seemed as though it came from the heavens. So long were we marooned that we had lost all hope of rescue and believed the end was only a matter of time. After being rescued we all went to the relief station and received help. All the time we were marooned it seemed like a long nightmare. During one day we saw an incident which we'll never forget especially I. Directly across the street within view from the attic was a three story brick building. On one afternoon it was carried away with a whole crowd on its roof drowned. With the rescuers I walked for miles looking for a safer place. At the suburbs we reached the refugee camp where I asked some one to send news to my husband that I was safe. According to volunteer misunderstandings among undertakers as to the disposition of the bodies found hampered the work in many of the stricken cities. In one case many many undertakers even secured orders to get the bodies of people who later were turned up alive and well at some far distant point.

The citizens of the city of Dorothy Gale determined the city should be built up again, but there was no means of beginning work to that end. And they had even demanded that the city widen and deepen the river channel and construct bigger levees to make it impossible for the enemy to make another disaster. They also hoped the promise that the bridges would be rebuilt overruled would be made good as soon as possible and that water and street car service would be restored. The Mayor of this city ordered closed all stores in the flood district and took precautions to see that they remained closed until conditions grew normal. Also this precaution was taken to prevent those action taken by soldiers whose places were closed. Following an inspection, the Secretary of War, and Major General Francis Vivian, reported to Emperor Angellina Vivian, that typhoid fever, pneumonia, measles and many other diseased were following everywhere in the wake of all the flood disasters of the war and the situation was becoming terrible. The Emperor decided upon an enrollment of all flood victims to find out how many were homeless, but it was feared it would take a year for the accurate numbers to be known. Let the first cheering news to the Abbelemann War Department from the Government Relief Train, under the direction of the Secretary of War, under Major General Vivian, read as follows:

"River near Angellina Agathia still about maximum height, but flood receding swiftly, and river able to resume its former course. Mic-Hollister gun still an ocean but its waters keeping within its bounds now and towns on its shores being relieved. Major General Hanson Vivian, under general supervision of Francis Vivian, at Dorothy Gale, will look after the situation immediately north of Angellina Agathia, and the river situation to the north and east.

The difficulty of difficulty difficulty from now on, to the north, east and south is going to be to reach the refugees with provisions and help, the restoration of normal sanitary conditions, and prevention of the terrible spread of the awful epidemics. Great evidence of evidence of frightful suffering for want of food or shelter which cannot be met with on the ground was continuing, as most of the approach to the flood swept areas was cut off by the heat of forest fires, and the dreadfully heated ground left by their passage, and hot boiling waters of the rivers. Quicklime and other logs were boiling like water so hot they were, and a lime stone cave where the forest fires raged fiercely were like molten lava. The Abbelemann Secretary of the Navy ordered all river warcraft not needed just now in the war storm to the flood district to distribute food and clothing.

The Commandant of the Naval bases at Pandora and Sacramento Calvernia and other cities of Abbelemann was also direct to give all possible assistance in sending ships and furnishing men for handling motor and other boats, for purposes of rescue throughout the flooded districts, while all aided bodies men not enlisting in the army, in every city or town was flocking at to aid in the desperate work of fighting down the worse forest fires now on record. A great host was working against a forest fire raging all along the banks of Mic-Hollister gun and spreading over the vicinity near Heidi Junction, which in starting had caused the injury of general Concentration Arbours and Walter Starring, and almost trapped his army.

Despite the fighting which was fierce and without respite the fire continued to rage beyond control and if it should cross the Mic-Hollister gun toward where it was heading, everything would be gone and a fire bigger than any would be raging.

Surgeon general Robert Camps, of the Abbelemann national Public Health service organized all his forces to prevent the spread of disease in the inundated regions. A sanitary survey of all regions afflicted by flood had been made from time to time, and many expert sanitary officers were dispatched to districts in which the reported plagues were growing worse, and those who got through wrote many thrilling experiences on "Fighting their way through the Hot Red Plague, of the forest, and desperate battles with flood debris."

Dispatches of continued dreadful fatalities, in every plague stricken district of Calvernia, and environs cannot even be greatly exaggerated. "many of the assistants of the Surgeon general would truthfully state. The danger from greater infection, lay in the polluted water supply, and the increasing warmth throughout the states caused by the tremendous forest fires adds to the dangers of the spread of the diseases. It seems evident that Glandellina intends to wipe out the population of these states, so that she can have "Red Room" to fight us "Christian dogs" and we'll give her plenty of room. In fact we'll give her all the room, than empty egg shells. Every Doctor in cooperation incorporated with every health department everywhere operating as hard as possible to stem the progress of the awful plagues. The Surgeons however at Angellina Agathia were able to report that the conditions there were excellent.

Many other Surgeons were delayed on their way to the flooded districts, either by forest fires or washouts. The Post Office at Angellina Agathia was completely flooded, all the fixtures and all the supplies being ruined. It would be many days indeed before even partial service could ever be resumed. All of the registered mail, postage stamps and funds of the office were totally ruined. However there was a loss of life among the post office employees at Angellina Agathia so far as could be said. It was reported that the basement and three floors were flooded and gas power machinery in the basement under water. About 212,000 plain envelopes were ruined as well as other supplies.

What the war did, and how the situation was met, makes an interesting part of the story, and their work has been appreciated by the whole Abbelemann Nation, who otherwise have given little previous thought to the war. Operations of the national Abbelemann Government. Emperor Angellina Vivian himself, expressed his intention to go into the northern parts of the Angellina state when the floods were first reported, but later he found that he could not leave the command friends whose safety or for whose safety they were concerned, but none other were allowed on them. Some were given transportation and others orders which the railroad had to have before selling tickets. Naturally the Red Cross Society performed heroic service in behalf of the sufferers since the first of the great disasters began, having drafted women to be sent as nurses, and also sent surgical supplies, and through the various branches raised a large sum of money. Many Red Cross nurses and doctors in armies and mobilization camps not needed for war yet came out to aid, and fighting armies had to spare many too at the orders of the War Department and civilian too, ever since the beginning of the disaster more than two hundred billion or trillion dollars had been raised for the sufferers in all the principal flood centres of the past, and added millions and hundreds of millions for the greater flood disaster of the present, every large city in the sections not stricken sending as large a contribution as it was in the possibilities. Thousands and hundreds of thousands of tons of supplies were prepared to be shipped by boat into the homeless and hungry from every railroad centre not in the path of war disasters, and even some extra rail railroads though suffering most enormous losses themselves and working under great difficulties in the flooded sections, did what they could to transport everything to the relief points free of charge and gave the merchandise preference in transit.

Count de Biff was one of the first to place the loss at Anguilla Agathia at about 2,000. He had reached the city after the greatest difficulties. The thirty five boat he rode in was equipped with every device for life saving, and with a capacity of carrying over forty people in addition to him and its crew.

The Count himself said,...

"In order to reach the city of Anguilla Agathia we were compelled to make our trip down and through some of the eldest sections of the flood for nearly a hundred miles with our boat on a raft raft. We then rose to quieter water, and then went overland to where we hoped to find the great Mid-Hollister River, but found a mad sea, but so finally made to the scene of flood, a sea and devastation, reaching the outskirts of the city and landing near St. Peters Street. All along the route we made many and careful inquiries. Few deaths they told us had occurred, and the people of Anguilla Agathia had been amply provided with provisions, and what was more precious than diamonds, good wholesome drinking water retained in some houses. During our service we patrolled Anguilla Agathia through every nook and corner, and for this reason, maintained that my estimation of its dead was more accurate than that of those who summed the fatalities by guess work. The mistake was made, I believe of course by many figuring on accounts of wrecked houses, who had reached safety. Also it included the people of North Galverinia Junction, a suburb of Anguilla Agathia, who were all alive, and who had been said to have perished.....

We distributed about six hundred and forty two baskets, each containing twice good meals. And right there the leveling power of hunger was as exactly exemplified, for the rich men enjoyed the sausage they contained with a much gusto as the laborer. We saved about two hundred and fifty people, but there was not a nobility nothing startling or thrilling in these rescues. Of course, the rule, women and children first was as strictly enforced as elsewhere. Cattle and horses and other animals suffered with their masters. In one place we saw a horse suspended by his hoof in the girder of a bridge. At another point near where sixty horses were said to have drowned was a large Pterodactyl-like creature swimming leisurely in the flood waters. We rowed up close to him, he looked us over, and then with a friendly grin continued on. By keeping women and children out of the houses in the flooded districts during the cleaning period, by boiling all water used for drinking purposes, and by the prompt cleaning up of all houses as nearly as possible the yards, by cleaning the walls and seeing that the filth is removed, the danger of the spread of the awful epidemic of diseases to this city and its neighborhood may be avoided.....

Throughout the flooded region in all instances the health officers passed out the word to the women who were working around houses, that they should not under any conditions whatever allow the women and children to come to the houses until after the cleaning up had been accomplished, and the houses had been dried out. In Dorothy Gale city parents were asked to send their children to some place outside the flood district, and they cheerfully said they would do so if safe transportation would permit. One suggestion by health officers, which they also regarded as very important indeed was that home be supplied for the mid covered district, and used in aiding the residents to clean out their surviving houses. It was said that with the use of the reducing apparatus, and the water which was available from what survived of the fire hydrants, work could be done in a very short time, which otherwise would have required many hours, and possibly days, and every surviving house cleaned, they pointed out in preventing the spread of the disease in the stricken district....

The authorities of Anguilla Agathia suggested that as much garden hose as possible be sent into the flood districts. There were many surviving places in which residents had the small taps used for yard sprinkling purposes but in most instances the hose was not long enough to reach neighbors houses. With plenty of hose, so that water in one yard could be used in the next as much as Seventy injured persons were found in niches formed by the debris, where they had crawled for safety. They were on enmeshed by the conflagrations, that gripped the town. At Anguilla and St. Vincent Cities, Anguilla State especially in the latter city, a mad freak of the terrible forest fire, was to destroy all the buildings in the city except the St. Vincents Church..... Here seventy persons went to their deaths, and two hundred and seventeen were injured. Over in the districts near Anguilla Junction and in the surrounding territory for unknown numbers of miles the story of record breaking devastation was told with countless sad and most striking features. At Beebe, Beebees, a mother superior of St. Elizabeths Convent was fatally injured. She was the daughter of Count de Biff's Aunt, whose three daughters son and husband were killed at the city of Leona Meldon whose three daughters were virtually wiped out in population by the explosion. Kinknell which was virtually wiped out in population by the explosion. A peculiar feature of the Meldon family experience in the same town because of the explosion horror, was that the father was found more than a mile and a quarter from his home and was found unconscious with nearly all of the clothing torn from his body. How the concussion and air waves did this was a mysterious incident and miraculous. Heavy and unusual property damage was sustained in the cities of Magnolia, Henrietta Junction, Blackbird, Toucan, Mid-Hollister Valley and Gloria Counties.....

But the most and pathetic and the most horrible did not end with the explosion disaster. Anguilla Agathia and Dorothy Gale Cities, marked as the center on which the angry forest fires for two weeks and three days threatened to concentrate their destructive fury, became two cities of the dead, over which the bells tolled and the nation shed tears of sorrow and of rage. Even on the third week after the explosion disaster, more than 100,000 funerals occupied the attention of Anguilla Agathia alone, and hundreds of thousands were engaged in paying their last respects to friends and relatives suddenly called to the wall of an "other world"..... and having as many masses and other services said for them as far as their money would allow.

Thousands upon thousands of the bodies recovered from the wrecks of the explosion shocks were cared about only undertaking establishments but elsewhere, and the greater number of funerals were held at any particular place. Wherever possible friends of stricken families took care of bodies and had them prepared for burial. In many instances war churches were demolished in the districts affected so as by the explosion shock and others were so badly wrecked as to prevent them being used for burial services and therefore either improvised or alters were erected in the street streets, and masses said for them there, or the bodies were sent to churches in districts not disastrously affected by the explosion.

And what countless stories of sorrow and hearts anguish lay behind the putting away of those bodies--whole families laid away together, thousands of brothers and sisters separated for life, husbands and wives torn asunder, numerous numerous children turned into orphans and happy parents made childless because it seemed that the very Governments of Anguilla in all their wisdom and power were not just now able to cope with wicked and crazy old Ghouls and nor quell her men made superhuman and preternatural disaster disasters by force.

The Nation full of awful heartaches could not end with the burial of the armies of victims of that awful explosion and other disasters past and present. Unusual hardships terrible tribulation followed in the wake of the awful devastation. The survivors were in constant apprehension and all various fire engines were continually at the fire plugs ready for the first sign of the "Red Plague" sweeping upon the city. All women needed to be housed clothing provided and food supplied to those left homeless homeless through the vandalism of an insane nation. Since the warning of fire danger all men folk and even courageous women and elder boys and girls had flocked to the outskirts of the city watching for the near approach of the "Red Plague" to give it all the fight it defies.

And so in the readjustment there could have come millions or millions of stories that would have affected men with the hardest hearts, or deeds of bravery that thrill the hero, and secure the coward's stories of faith in the restoration and hope and thanksgiving like the never heard of before and like that contained in a letter received by a priest from his mother whose parents were caught in the war horror. In this case the priests mother Mrs. Mrs. James Winifred during early November sent to pay her sister a visit the latter being ill in Aberdeen south Galverinia. When Mrs. Winifred's sister recovered both went on a visit to their aged father George Winifred of Glen Street Meldon Kinknell Town. Here they started an experience a day and a night through every big disaster in southern Galverinia as follows: At Hensdale Hens Hensdale, a narrow escape from death and were were a thing of the past by floods they had in the month of October to November trapped for days. Later in the same year and in the month of October to November she was caught in the devastating fire at Schoeder or Schoederstown and lost all their belongings and where their child was killed in the ruins of a falling house. They went through the horrors of the Lake Selicia disaster flood and fire and saw with their own eyes all the dreadful scenes as resultant of the flood.

Bach

to donate a thing thing of what she had planned to give. God bless such a good woman. I gave a pretty little girl a number of cents. It was a beautiful one but after looking at it a while she returned it saying, "Some body else will need it much more than I do and mother will get along with what we have." When she went away I had her shawls and later the party came back and told me the child's house was now clean. Her mother was warmly impressed to receive relief. At this point nearly thirty to thirty thousand persons were cut off from the women of the district maintained a large relief station. And this station was at considerable advantage as those in charge knew most of the people in the stricken districts. They found it very hard however to get many to accept help. The relief committee established twenty official relief stations but that even could not begin to tell the story of the enormous amount of aid that was to be provided and given. Everywhere in the disastrously shaken districts of Angelina Agathia, churches, churches that were left intact were thrown open to those who were homeless, and the refugees were supplied with cot, bedding, tables, clothing, and cookingstoves and other articles. Clothing poured into these places very rapidly and was given out to any one who applied.

The necessary work from the churches was largely confined to the churches and congregations in contributions, and so on as they are the best known to the workers. The number of kind hearted contributions, proved of great benefit to the war-torn community and then all ready to give their share and it was with all the necessary equipment in place and working order. Some very sad cases were detected by shadowing at few of the stations opened for relief, and they too were almost forced to accept relief. In one case a very old lady entering a woman's house upon which she evidently was praying told a most pitiful tale of the suffering of a neighbor next to her place as a result of the concussion. Showing her permit she was supplied with a large quantity of food and clothing. Something in her attitude led to suspicion and the case was planned and fully investigated after she had left the station. She also was traced to her home.

It was found true about her neighbor but that the concussion had also entirely demolished her home killing her husband and injuring her children. And despite her hard lot she was keeping two orphan children in a little ragged improvised tent the three of who also were badly in need. And she had sacrificed to aid her nearest neighbor who were considerably better off than she was. They had refused to accept, and she had insisted firmly saying she could take care of herself. Relief was brought brought to her.

The family of Montalvo Atillio who lived on forty sixth, and Pine Grove, town tell one of the strongest of all from frames of the concussion. The members had barely time after the first crash to reach the basement of their home when the house in which they lived collapsed into a heap. Sometimes before the explosion occurred a bottle of Nitro glycerine had been placed on a shelf in the cellar of the house by some boob. After the uproar had abated Mr Atillio emerged from an open space in the wreckage and one of the first sights that greeted his eye was the bottle of dangerous dangerous fluid standing upright in the yard. Hot broken and the half open cover in the same position in which it had been placed inside the house a short time before.

Both in what should tell the story which ought to mark the restoration of the wrecked buildings. But how could it go on. Within five days from the fearful day 30,000 carpenters were called for and set at work in the city of Angelina.

Agathia rebuilding buildings not totally destroyed by the concussion, and more than twenty thousand laborers began clearing away the wreckage from the demolished buildings. Hundreds of roofs were being restituted and the work of replacing many homes to the foundations from which the concussion twisted them had begun. The main problem debated on was whether the city limits had enough lumber to rely on even if there was price enough to buy it. Other kinds of building building material was another question to be debated. The destroyed portion of the city it was hoped could be rebuilt better than ever and so far as it was the speed with which this task was to be accomplished would bring a measure to the rescue of thousands of the homes badly damaged.

Efforts were made to raise as high a rate as possible the efforts of the restoration funds to an amount that ought to be ample enough to reconstruct fully the destroyed of both Angelina Agathia and Dorothy Dale cities were taken with building and loan associations and other leading interests with the expectation that they would be leading in the work. Also local low rates of interest on money were intended for reconstruction purposes were also made and large amounts of money requested and made available for loans.

Nearly thirteen families were given relief by the relief committees after the concussion while girls of many various theatres, churches and Societies sold paper papers for the benefit of the general relief fund. Half a hundred thousand houses were provided with rent paid for more than two years and three months in advance, and furniture, clothing and other household necessities were given out without charge.

Thousands of families who were left homeless as a result of the concussion permitted their love and compassion for unfortunate neighbors to keep them from the relief stations until they first had been secured, and the committee put to work a corps of searchers to reach and relieve this class of sufferers. In all the surviving cities and towns general supply depots were established to supply the various relief stations.

Front

TERRIFIC AND FATAL EXPLOSION ROCKS ANGELINA

AGATHIA WITH DEVASTATING EFFECTS. HUNDREDS OF HOSPITALS OVERFLOWING WITH INJURED IN RESULTS OF FIBER EXPLOSION. 100,000 HOME TOWN HOMES. ONE TWO HAN MARCH ESCAPED AS MANY ARE KILLED. MANY BODIES LIFTED FROM ROOF. HUNDREDS DROPPED TO GROUND. DOWNTOWN ANGELINA AGATHIA ESCAPED. HOUSES OF BUILDINGS RUINED FROM FOUNDATION BY SHOCK. BIG CLOUDS OF MISTAKEN SMOKE TURNED DAY INTO NIGHT. HUNDREDS SAVED IN WRECKAGE. MANY ELECTRIC WIRES ADDED TO PERIL. BODIES BURIED IN EXPLOSION SHOCK AREA. HEADS CRUSHED IN DEBRIS. FLYING ROOF KILLS A BOY IN A CHURCH. WOUNDS MANY VICTIMS OF WRECKAGE.

On September 28th it was said by many fire fighters that famine threatened the many refugees who had fled before the conflagration, and there was the vital necessity of immediate aid from all agencies. However there had been desolation because of the fire threatening famine was terrifying all the homeless survivors. A message declared that hundreds of thousands had been already made homeless by the terrific forest fire sweeping the big-polluted San Juan and that for the time towns injured or destroyed the cost of relief and reconstruction would probably run into the scores of millions, and this being told in at the Abbeismian war by attempt by coast to bluff. The communication which also was in the nature of a report to the United States department was as follows:

A forest fire of great destructive fury and intensity swept hundreds of miles of dense woods for two days already and is still spreading. Proper details is impossible at present, connecting with Angelina Agathia and all parts of Angelina and California all telephone and telegraph communications, and all other means of such communications destroyed. Roads innumerable as evidenced by walls of flames. No greater loss of life reported so far among inhabitants of towns but destruction of homes and property immense. Practically all frame structures burned to the ground.

Hundreds of thousands of people already are homeless. Local assistance well organized already outside of the fire zone. No information regarding city of Big Hedda destroyed. Injuries to crops, fruit and sugar cane and tobacco because of intense heat and smoke intense and terrible; very great, almost total loss of life. Cases that were swept up California forests, and full relief and reconstruction will probably reach into hundreds of millions.

The navy department of California also received a wireless message from Santa Monica, which described the very cities and towns in Santa Monica county with eighty per cent of its best forests gone, cities and towns all in flames, a million people fleeing by train or car and such or on foot panic everywhere, and terrible devastation everywhere. Houses not burned and untouched by fire hurricanes.

The message also reported damage to electric light, power telephone service and all communications which all were seriously disrupted. The power companies estimated they would be months without power. The message also reported that the fire hurricanes of scorching hot winds was estimated by also the weather bureau observers in those towns to have reached a velocity of one hundred and fifty miles an hour and blowing fiercer fiercer until the sky burning world of flames came upon the loss of life as far as known occurred of the inhabitants of any of these towns. The message however declared that three great cathedrals, one the Holy Name, the big Sacred Heart and the St Anne were partly blown down, the fire wind just before the towns burst into flames. All the region was flooded as to say with flames leaping skyward to an unbelievable height, and the roof of the railroad station of the town of Carey was demolished. The office quarters and children's home barracks were consumed by fire and the soldiers had only a minutes time to escape. At Santa Monica fall upon a sudden home. The Abbeismian relief parties moved to extend as much relief to the stricken districts as possible but government action was held in any way until more information on the extent of fire damage was received. Count Dr. Bill himself and many assistance assistants were ordered to the stricken region, and the present of railroads at lines still in operation ordered trains to stop by at any of the endangered towns to carry endangered inhabitants beyond the reach of the terrible forest fires. St. Peter's hospital at Big Hedda was destroyed in the forest fire hurricane which swept the town yesterday, according to a telegram to the Abbeismian hospital headquarters of the St. Peter's Catholic Church here disclosed on the night of the first. The dispatch from Sister Camilla superintendent of the hospital read:

"Frightful forest fire consumed the town hospital turned to the ground. All saved with difficulty. Fire swept on little Hedda town."

The hospital was erected in 1910 and valued at $1,000,000. Little Hedda is a short distance from Big Hedda, where as at Big Hedda from previous reports of damage have come in on the Angelina St. Clare Railroad. It was said that by the national observatory at Big Girl Knoll that the forest fire then traveling at a rate of more than twenty miles an hour would strike the general big-polluted forest regions by morning, becoming an immediate conflagration, and that the forested regions around Angelina Agathia was threatened.

Urgent appeals for help was cabled to the Angelina Agathia associated press by many towns men one and may a personal survey within seven miles of Big Hedda. "It surely is impossible as yet" he said to claim fully the damage caused by this devastating forest fire. All communications for hundreds of miles are terribly paralyzed. The entire south of Angelina is suffering terribly, added by the other big forest fires elsewhere still raging. I have personally seen some of the damage within a dozen mile district of Big Bend city. In this area all buildings are smoldering ruins and all of the inhabitants are without shelter having fled to the valley, the only hope of safety from the flames which were overbearing them. All water supplies of the town managed still by fire but not hot but have been interrupted. Streams are thick with floating dead fish and in some places the water is boiling hot.

Because of all the immense forest fires of the past, known still existing, and this one and all other disasters disaster building material are insufficient to replace two per cent of the buildings that have been destroyed, and medical supplies, food and shelter are needed at once. Within the area observed by me, all forest plantations have been destroyed, and the losses will reach many millions of dollars. Many lives have been lost and further deaths are in prospect from disease, and famine unless relief becomes available at once. Immediate action is virtually impossible."

During the near approach of the forest fire upon towns very close to the city of Angelina. Angelina the forest fire burning beyond Big Bend was said to have struck the city causing blasting clouds with many millions in the explosion and these blasting fire, fairly erupted into the air with terrible noise and concussion again producing one of the worst record breaking explosions.

It was no more that the effect was terrible like an earthquake in Angelina. Angelina twenty thousand persons in factories and mills mostly women working in place of the men who were in the army were killed that awful morning of the 24th when the concussion of this blast only forty miles away, affected the Angelina district a manufacturing district on the southwestern edge of the city. Every large factory was demolished or leveled to the ground by the vibration, and many others including thousands of dwelling houses suffered heavy property damage. The smoke stacks of the factories though they did not fall toppled up and down during the concussion. The loss in factories alone was estimated at $4,500,000. It was said about twenty thousand working women alone, not counting families in the other houses were known to be dead or trapped in the flames when the ruin caught fire.

Hundreds were missing, and of survivors throughout the city one hundred and fifty thousand were injured. Two thousand of the dead were working girls and older ladies of the hotel, booking and printing company, where they with others than one hundred young boy employees were caught under tons of debris, when the shock of the concussion tore away the roof and hurled down the walls of the building before the thundering crash subsided.

A hundred mining also were employees employees of this printing company, a company for catholic books and religious reading only. Their bodies were believed to be under the mass of wreckage which through a mysterious cause became alive. About twenty working women managed to get out alive, for a check up of the company's pay roll showed they had escaped from the falling structure, and were in hospitals or in their homes.

That that night, handicapped by intense heat of flames and smoke and of equipment with which to go about the rescue, the crews of fire departments, and police and hundreds of men were fighting the flames and digging in the smoldering ruins of the factories in the hope that they would find some of the working girl girls alive. Watching them and offering help, and yet held back by the intense heat, and aided by policemen and National Guardsmen and House Guards, and members of the Angelina legion were thirty thousand more. In this crowd were many who feared relatives were in the ruins, probably daughters and sons.

Two children were killed out in the street having lost their lives when they were struck by a detached roof flying at them by the concussion in front of their home three miles from the factory district. One man was struck down by a flying brick outside the city limits.

At Angelina hospital a total of fifteen thousand persons were reported dangerously injured. Twice as many more it was estimated by the authorities had suffered minor injuries because of the concussion. And the congestion was so acute in the hundreds of hospitals that thousands of those who under ordinary circumstances could have been held for treatment were forced out to make way for those whose hurts were relieved in the sudden unusual disaster.

The explosion and concussion occurred in A or near Angelina Angelina at about seven A.M. in the morning. The concussion affected the southwestern district for eight miles with total destruction and shook the whole city with aftershocks. Besides the factories and mills, the common common destroyed, many other industrial plants with great loss of life, and damaged more than sixty thousand homes.

One of the remarkable features of the explosion was that despite the sudden demolition of many of the private houses, churches filled with members at early mass and in other buildings in which the residents were either eating their breakfast or just rising, the fatalities recorded thus were much smaller than at first expected though heavy enough.

Preceding the explosion and concussion was a darkening of the skies when the smoke of the forest fires covered the sky over the city like a tornado cloud. A gloominess like that of midnight hung over the doomed districts when the roar of the explosion was heard and the concussion felt. But it was too sudden for any one in the factories to save themselves. The workers just starting at their benches or at their machinery heard the falling of houses, the rattling of beams and bits of metal hurled from buildings as they rattled against the walls of the factories. Then the walls began to shake, and if was just as if some great hand had suddenly grabbed the roof and rattled it for an instant. There was a rush for stairways and exits in all parts of the factories, but things happened so fast. The third and fourth floors and six floors of many of them came down on the second, and others, and then the whole masses dove into the ground. Many women trying to escape were caught and pinned down, some managed to fling off their weights and stagger out but others, hundreds of them per factory were buried so deeply beneath the huge beams and wreckage of all descriptions, and the stiffer supporting the floors that there was a hope for them.

The earlier rescue efforts formed as soon as the news of the awful disaster reached the center of the city resulted in the saving of a number of those who were not too deeply buried. In one factory which did not burn rescuers dug desperately in the vicinity of a stairway and brought six employees to light. The exact number could not be determined but most of those in hospitals came from factories and mills.

Following the destruction of so many factories and homes came a deluge of strange materials falling absolutely from the sky. In all the city electric light wires had been thrown down by the concussion, and streets were filled with wreckage. The police immediately ordered the power companies that were not wrecked to shut off the current. One main line was cut off. Then after crews of experienced electrical men had cleared away the live wires, the police, firemen, and volunteers made their ways to the factories and started digging. It was not until many hours after the disaster that anything like an accurate check of the number of missing was made. One policeman and others gained possession of the records belonging to the ruined factories.

From the pay roll they obtained the names, sending messengers to their homes the investigators by morning learned that more had perished than those who had escaped. The loss of life was dreadful.

At midnight however parts of the organized effort at rescue came to a halt, because of fire, and also that the searchers lacking means to dig on a large scale had to content themselves with listening at various points in the piled up material in the hope that some message would be obtained by from those still alive. Wherever a sound was heard feverish efforts were made to reach its source. Two hundred and fifty other factories were also wrecked, each worth over $200,000. Parts of the Virginiana lumber works were shaken down and a panic was narrowly averted at another factory, when the rear of the explosion was heard by the employees. One of the foremen blocked the door of the plant and prevented the workers from rushing headlong into the street where they would have been at the mercy of a falling wall on the opposite side.

Twenty thousand houses of families in the factory districts were unroofed or hurled off their foundations. Scores of wagons were flung many yards by the concussion, during the height of the concussion which was like an earthquake many huge beams and sheets of iron were whirled through the air. The streets were deserted except as pedestrians in all parts of the section noticed heavily affected fled to cellars or for any other available shelter. The concussion fortunately failed to effect disastrously within a block of many schoolhouses where more than 10,000 pupils were preparing for their early studies. Immediately after the concussion subsided the surrounding streets were filled with frantic mothers searching for their children but none was found to have been injured. Wire communications were totally disrupted and officials of the telephone companies estimated that the damage to equipment would amount to hundreds of thousands of dollars. Many electric companies also suffered more heavily.

Squads of city nurses were organized to assist in giving first aid to the many of injured. The head of the City's red cross offered to call out as many units as the local authorities considered necessary, and did so but these were not sufficient. A day or two after a check up of the property loss by the Angelina Angelina Trades of Commerce indicated that probably $25,000,000 would be the figure touched among dwelling houses alone. The factories may reach hundreds of millions, and that few were thrown out of work because so many were killed. Of all only 1,000 may be surviving and out of work. The Mayor of Angelina Angelina said: "So far however we can care for our own people; that we do not need to get any outside aid. We have already started a subscription for the benefit of those who are the heaviest losers, and we think we can get enough in this city to handle it all. Given the factories, owners and executives will meet on conference to come to lay plans for rebuilding the damaged structures to morrow. It was expected that many of the men still remaining in the city will also be engaged in this work. The full force of the concussion was visited on small towns also in the southwest of Angelina Angelina. Many farm houses on the outskirts were damaged severely.

Near Port City, where hundred persons lost their lives and property damage estimated at several million dollars was caused by the same concussion that affected Port City. The worse of the shock was felt at Angelina Junction, Texas, where killed in one house, and a thousand or more farm houses and three schools were leveled. At Port City, Texas the concussion also was severe but no communications could be established with her unless no one knew what occurred there. The effect was felt also on the eastern section of Panki, and northeastern Kremling city, centering near Port City, Texas, however some struck by falling objects, and the streets were littered with debris, during the following night residents of the western area in Panki and Port City were still seeking in only pretty close to Seven O'clock in the morning but because of the forest fires the smoke covered the sky thickly over most of the country so that darkness like the dead of night still prevailed. The morning daylight failed to a pear appear, except for the strange dull copper color of the fire's reflection along the horizon far away. When the explosion occurred its flashes in the darkness showed for an instant on the northwestern horizon, and the thunder of the blast rolled like the thunder in the sky that follows a terrific dazzling bright lightning bolt or sky splitter.

It was said by some of those who were near enough to witness the cause of the blast that the long wave of fire bounded along with the speed of a hurricane with a hissing roar of millions of sky rockets and that the flames burning pine and turpentine and popular trees thick to impenetrable density with dry leaves rushed forward with incredible speed. About five hundred men for two days had fought hard by chopping down many trees, and making breaches and trenches with the hope of checking the course of the flames from the immense sheds of explosives, but the fire an instant or so after its approach was observed so close vented its fury first upon the town of Hinsdale close to the sheds. It crossed the southern section of the forests first in a series of long broken swaths, then everything else catching became one dazzling sea of fire, and the very burning town was enveloped. The sheds went up in flame before the fire a rock then so great was the heat, and according to one of the witnesses the scene he described was as—"I saw the town enveloped by the fire as if a sudden flood of water turned to liquid fire burst upon the town. The fire was a mile away from the sheds but I was surprised to see them start to catch, first to smoke then to blaze. There were four others of us on a high rise of ground witnessing the scene, the fire not having us just then in its path. We did not know at first what was in those sheds thinking they were common barns or believe as we would have run for it before the blast occurred.

As we watched the sheds turn into huge bonfires, one of my friends said: "Some fire coming on eh?" He had no sooner spoken when from the sheds there was a terrific volcanic eruption of flames, and we before we could say Jack Robison found ourselves rolling down the slopes of our shelter like barrels thrown from a wagon. We went all the way down into the valley, stunned and slightly injured, and flaming boards and other wreckage showered around us like rain. The burning town had fell in before the concussion, and hundreds of good sized houses left their foundations and were hurled to other lots by the concussion as we observed after ward from better and nearer view from our lower elevation. The fire was then crossing the northern section near the town in another series of broken swaths, burning whole forests of trees at once in as many acres of rushing fire, and new fires started far ahead from the flaming wreckage falling among tree tops from the shattered barns to sweep devastation further on. One three story wooden house was hurled forty feet from its foundation as I observed while rolling, inverted, and then dropped upside down. The noise of the explosion was like observing a terrific sudden volcanic outburst less than half a mile away from the crater, and we were ten miles from the scene of the blast having observed the burning barns through my opera glasses. Knowing which way the fire was moving we went to a contrary direction and got easily out of its path."

In Angelina Agathia the house of the Mayor himself was telescoped by the concussion. The Mayor and his three daughters, and wife later had been hauled out of the conglomerated debris not hurt beyond slight lacerations and bruises. One of the daughters had been hurled under the kitchen stove by the concussion before the house collapsed and escaped without a scratch, although the stove, then being cold had been heaped with tons of wreckage.

From St Peters Street to Sacramento Avenue, a distance of one hundred blocks, everything was a tangled mass of debris hurled sections of roofs, innumerable pieces of furnished houses blasted in, strangely uprooted trees, the magnificent results of smaller houses playing leap frog, or popcorn jump snatched off telephone and light wire poles and the remnants of what had once also been handsome street cars. One street car from the concussion was found in the hallway of a large mansion with tracks still under the wheels and the trolley stuck tight in the ceiling, with the passengers still in their too badly hurt to move and some killed, and the conductor and motor men found injured under wreckage of another house. This could be called a miraculous freak indeed.

Also under such magic of the tremendous explosion concussion other street cars according to witnesses had become for an instant liberal flying machines. Three of them by the strange vibration were hurled crazily high into the air and whizzed crazily above the housetops still filled with astonished and frightened passengers. Yet the cars alighted on housetops and no one was injured. In addition to the "flying menaces" other street cars found themselves into the basements of homes, another crashed through the walls of a house, and one street car jumped like a frog over a two story house to land on the roof of a barn further on, and still remained there though half way into the building. High tension wires had been strewn in all directions, and gas mains had been opened in all places.

The Chief of the Angelina Agathia fire departments one of the first to arrive at the scene immediately sent orders to the Gas and Electric Light Companies not injured by the shocks to shut off all power in the blast stricken territories.

The debris in the streets impeded the arrival of the rescue forces, and before even ambulances could reach the scene in the remaining darkness, with the strange beginning of floods gang of workers had to clear a thoroughfare, while telephone repair men were rushed into some of the districts to restore temporary communication lines to facilitate co-ordination of the various rescue corps. Many of the electric repair men had also set out hurriedly to carry lines for arches to those sections where the rescue workers would be on duty during the darkness of the smoke clouded sky. The total damage completed in the city by the concussion was in the twinkling of an eye. The blast shook scores nay hundreds of other towns with devastating effects including Dorothy Gale and Big Girl Knool but as communications were broken no word could be obtained from anywhere outside of Angelina Agathia.

The Concussion accompanied by a fierce conflagration affected and swept through Grand Held causing damage more than $4,000,000, and leaving a trail of burned wreckage and smouldering ruins and skeletons of forests for scores of miles. Damage estimated at three hundred thousand dollars resulted to the St Michaels Orphan Asylum near the outskirts of the town, when the forest fire struck first and ignited it. It was a large wooden and log building. Fifteen hundred of the children girls and boys, most of them of child slaves rescued during the war were forced to flee to a deep and wide ravine where a stream ran through. They went through a hell of horror, and stifling heat while surrounded by a sky full of dreadful flames but all escaped, by keeping their clothing wet and fighting blazing embers and trees that fell and rolled down into the ravine.

Many buildings in the city not burned were wrecked by the explosion which occurred half a mile from it. The roof of the Aberdeens factory was hurled off, and hundreds of thousands dollars worth of stock ruined by falling materials that threatened to set the building afire. The damage to this place was seventy five thousand dollars. Less than two blocks away the concussion hurled the roof of the Hendro Company into the street a block away. The damage to the structure which also burned was $100,000. The Angel Guardian Orphanage was damaged to the extent of fifty thousand dollars when the roof was torn off, and the outhouse tipped over.

IN WAKE OF FOREST FIRES.

ABERDEEN (SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA) --- Latest checkup of Forest fire horror of September 1th casualties reveals one hundred and eighteen dead, and many others believed lying dead in the charred ruins of the town. Damage $4,000,000. -

THEOMAS VILLAGE. --- BOUNDARY LINE --- All of buildings said to be destroyed. And many thousands homeless.

BATRESK. --- BORDER --- One hundred ten dead, 7000 or seven thousand homeless. Enormous damage.

HEIDI JUNCTION --- CALIFORNIA --- Forest fires sweeping toward city. Uninhabited warned in expectation that fogging up of smoke and unusual darkness coming on at mid day forecast arrival of big conflagration.

"Little Girl Knool, and Evangeline St Clara. --- Scores of thousands homeless.

The terrific forest fire that since the first of September has spread such desolation across large stretches of the Mic-Holleston Run Woods, along both sides of the Mic-Holleston Run River, and the forested regions around Lake Selicia causing many deaths, demaging millions of dollars worth of property in towns in its path, and hundred upon hundreds of millions dollars worth of trees, leaving the threat of terrible famine and disease in its wake, was raking or burning the forests near Lake Angeline on the fourth day of September.

Unless it should change its course, or burn itself out it was due to catch the forests dangerously close to Heidi Junction on the morrow. All observatory bureaus expected that such a change of course in either direction, might occur on the fourth or fifth day of the month when the conflagration was due to reach the Bavarian section of the woods. A swift swing of a branch A swing of a branch of the fire to the direct north which was threatening would sent the main forest fire roaring and rushing between Big Girl Knool and Kittens pl-cherts and Jennie runner and also Angeline Run and Gertrude Angeline city, and the southern forest strip near Mildred Greenburg city with possible damage to the latter city, and a curve still further would point it toward the main cities previously mentioned where it would menace the entire forests altogether and threaten the Marie Osborne and Mic-Holleston wooded countries. This was the fourth day of the tremendous forest fire and it was proceeding with undiminished fury along its northward and southeastward trail. The night of the third day it passed over two hundred and sixty miles of Nollens forest, destroying valuable trees and causing wholesale damage to a score of forest villages and the morning of the same day it was raising terrible havoc throughout the southern fringe of the Marie Osborne woods near Heidi Junction. The message from that latter town reported that the hurricane of fire struck the town a preceded by a wind of terrific force, and that all the inhabitants were the first without shelter and without food, and still flowing before the sea of rapidly advancing flames and half stifled by the smoke that kept them partly enveloped. The passenger train of a line then running known as the Nelsio loaded with fleeing refugees from the town of Little Heidi was partly wrecked. Each coach carried fifty passengers and there were eleven another train which had come to take these refugees onward was reported lost with all passengers and all members of the crews.

The big city of Heidi Junction hovered twin twice by floods which failed to ruin forested country also in path of floods at that time, reported that new communications erected since the floods with Big Girl Knool to Angelina Agathia was lost shortly before noon of the third of September. A large town called Handlier and about fifty miles south of Heidi Junction was believed to be in the path of the conflagration. Trains were ordered toward Big Heidi to take away inhabitants in case of necessity, while at Heidi Junction other trains were being prepared. A strange southwest wind hot and stifling with smoke occasionally was blowing at Little Heidi Junction, while a seventy mile an hour wind was reported from the straight south at Heidi Junction, and the temperature registered registered about 110 with no sun shining and the sky dark as if with the approach of a black thunderstorm.....

The refugee train on the Sandon a long freight loaded with many passengers fleeing from the town of Porte Michio was wrecked by a derail caused by the fire, and another train had to back in at great peril to take them away.

Two other trains of the same line had not yet been accounted for up to noon on the day of the third. They were two refugee trains.

Interruption of communication with the ravaged areas was still growing worse and it was even now impossible to tell to what terrific totals the lists of huge property damage and loss of life might eventually rise particularly in the many places wiped out by the sea of fire. Thirty were killed in the small town of Pouncee, and twenty in Dorfil, and damage to property would be for those places alone many millions of dollars. Seventeen thousand were reported homeless from one of these towns, and many of them in refugee improvised huts pitched. With their rich harvest of turpentine and tar forests leveled by the seething flames, their own forest towns burned to the ground, and hospitals shattered by the fire hurricane, the country was still more afflicted by complete destruction of available train lines, and cessation of all kinds of country water supplies. Many thousands of ran ors from everywhere, and many of the men inhabitants of various towns were battling the fires but to no avail, and appeals for assistance from elsewhere said that help must be sent at once if the Red Plague at any time must be checked, and the appeal was being many remaining people from other towns and cities to help, and standing armies of soldiers not needed on the field of battle also were sent to fight the forest fires.

The headquarters of the Abbeisennian Red Cross received a message on the third day of September from Sister Rose at St. Ann's town saying that a "devastating forest fire" had hit there, burning the inhabitants out of house and home, and appealing for assistance. As reports of the further progress of the forest in Northwestern Mac-Hillester woods reached the National Headquarters, the Red Cross decided to extend aid to other sections if it had to draft members for the work, or draw others out of the vast armies in the drama of the war. Assistance was also being offered to Little Heidi for sufferers at Turpe in response to their appeal for aid. The message said "Terrific forest fire. Fire looks like the promised conflagration of the world by fire. No communications with any town known on the map. Hundreds of thousands homeless. Need clothing and food."

One of the survivors of the Angelina Agathia horror gave the first account of those brief moments of terror he experienced on the first or second of September in the morning. This was of a matron of an orphan asylum. All were at breakfast when something like a big gust of secondary wind came up and slammed the doors and blew loose things around the dining room. The matron told one of the children to shut the windows. A little girl started for them, when there was a distant deafening crash like thunder, the floor gave an awful quiver and the dust stirred up suddenly from the corners, the dining room floor started to tilt, tilt dishes slid from the tables and the whole house started to settle. Everybody in panic thickening a eye, one was raging bolted for fire escapes and stairways. And then the whole building twisted and broke, and fell down but fortunately the building settled gradually without any one being injured though many were buried. Strong winds believed to be part of the forest fire hurricane nearing the city caused the walls of ruined houses to collapse and brought all attempts of rescue work to a halt on the morning of the third. Workers were ordered out of the wreckage and the grounds were cleared of spectators. Some street car service had been renewed that afternoon after more than two days probable without electric power. Damage to water and sewer mains were rapidly being repaired, though lower sections of the city was experiencing a new and growing flood. The new governor of Calvernia approved of an order directing Division B of the Mobilization camps to guard the ruins of Angelina Agathia devastated districts. The concussion of the explosion which on the morning of September 2th destroyed large sections of the city of Angelina Agathia was known to totally take a toll of 38,000 lives with an estimated damage of $150,000,000 according to estimates on the fourth day after the disaster. And even then scores of persons out of the many thousands of employees in the many factories were bowled over by the shock were still missing, and hundreds of survivors were in local hospitals seriously hurt, while hundreds of others less seriously hurt were removed to their homes. Those still missing were still believed to be buried under the tons of wreckage of the factories and other mills or in private houses leveled by the concussion and in the ruins of churches. For four days and nights rescue workers were playing huge searchlights on the many demolished plants and churches and all other ruins in the city amid rising flood waters, among them hundreds of relatives of the missing workmen and other persons. Sometimes when the rescuers shouted inquiries into the debris they fancied they heard faint cries in reply. Yet the rescue work was proceeding slowly due to the gigantic task facing the workers, who working in gradually rising flood waters were forced to tear apart the remains of the factory buildings bit by bit, cautious not to allow the wreckage to fall further and crush any of the missing who may be alive still, or trap the rescuers themselves. More than 10,000 guardsmen stood guard those days and nights with loaded rifles as the relief workers continued their efforts to find those believed to be buried in the wreckage caused by the concussion of such a terrific explosion and so near.

The explosion as seen many early risers in higher buildings described as a volcanic eruption at night that flashed upward and then swooped down as it shook the city seemed to be southwest of the city but far away, to the Aldren highway three miles from the distant forest fires. The explosion sound came from the southwest, affecting with its concussion the whole south and western section of the city with devastating effects as stated before. In one small hotel the concussion of the explosion was felt and it swept the structure off its foundations and the walls of the building bulged out, the west portion falling into the street. The concussion hurled the structure thirty feet from its foundation. Most of the guests however escaped when the building was wrecked but it was not said how many were able to get out of the building where power lines and tottering walls afterwards made new work extremely precarious. Rescuers however found thirty in the wreckage dead and injured many of which died in the St. Joseph's hospital.

A flying roof of the same hotel struck among a huge crowd of people watching an early morning fire and all were killed either instantly or died in the hospital. The body of another man was found in a chicken coop on the street which he had been repairing in front of his store. His was struck by some board his skull being fractured. Improvised hospitals were also established at the scene of the disaster and nurses from hospitals worked frantically to relieve the sufferers.

There were thousands of miraculous escapes to be heard of everywhere. One man of the wrecked hospital St. Ann was treating a patient when the shock occurred.

"The eruption was like a fire flashing in the horizon," he said. "I thought it was the end of the world. The wreckage of the hospital covered me and all the patients, and many of us were rescued with difficulty. But no one of us was injured. Some of the more able bodied patients and also nurses and sisters who escaped from the hospital told of beds sliding along the floor, and then crashing against the walls. Some of the patients climbed out of the windows, stating they had to dodge wreckage and flying splinters.

Many had lost their lives during this disaster but at this time because of so much communications being cut off the real loss of life was undetermined, and so many doctors needed to cope with the situation were mostly in the army and could not be readily gotten. This disaster of forest fires it was believed may surpass all the other past forest fires combined. Reports of the deaths of hundreds of persons at Fort La Grange and unconfirmed reports of other loss of life were also received by the Angelina Agathia authorities. One dispatch said they could hear calls for aid from an unknown source, and also from Sandon but the Sandon could not hear Angelina Agathia. Count De Biff dispatches an officer from Angelina Agathia to report on conditions. And he declared two days later that no wires or any kind of railroad and other communication were operating any direction west south or north of Angelina Agathia.

Also a wireless dispatch from Appleby picked up by a wireless station said two persons were killed, and five hundred injured as a result of the enormous forest fire that isolated the vicinity the following night and day. The message also added that an unconfirmed report from Bullen south of there said forty eight persons were buried in the burning wreckage of a cabin which collapsed as the fire wind hit it. Another report from Evergreen village said hundreds of people were being trapped by the flames. The city of Aldren was in its path, the message added, and that the fire was racing on with great speed.

Count De Biff himself telegraphed to Emperor Vivian himself declaring he had received the following message in the morning of the fourth day of September from the location of the town of Buttercuppppp Buttorcup;

"No one is reported dead, but undetermined number of persons injured in flight before fire hurricane which struck the town at eight o'clock in the night of the 3th. Whole town burned. Hundreds homeless. The message continued:::/"

Many towns great distances from forest fire were filled with refugees from the burned and burning towns and villages. The heart of the forest fire was believed to have struck Glorianna Junction twenty miles south of Heidi Junction. Estimates of the damage could not be made as communications were cut off. The story of the destruction of Glorianna Junction could be given in some detail.

The expensive post office building in that city too was burned, and hospitals destroyed. There was no wire service of any kind into any section of Calvernia these days on account of the forest fires the lines for a mag hundreds of miles having gone down shortly after the fire hurricane started its work. Relief forces were detached from Angelina Agathia though an explosion sufferer following unconfirmed reports of enormous loss of life, but Angelina Agathia and also Dorothy Gale were isolated from all wire communications, and no report of any kind had reached the outside world even if couriers returned from the forest fire area. North of Angelina Agathia and Dorothy Gale City is the lack of communications extended to Calvernia, more than three hundred and fifty miles while conditions south also were not known owing to the failure of the failure of the fire into Angelina Agathia. Even Emperor Vivian was unable to get into touch with any wireless and telegraph station because of lack of power. Yet it was believed the forest fire disturbance on the fifth day of September had apparently turned northeastward over the whole part of Northern St Pauls County county as was reported by forest fire rangers at their headquarters at Eleven P.M. This placed the big town of Glorianna Junction fully in the path of the tremendous fire causing the temperature to rise register sixty miles from that city over 110 though later had risen twenty degrees higher in the city itself. The highest wind velocity at the time was forty eight miles an hour and growing hotter and stronger, and driving clouds of smoke through the streets of the town. The people receiving the warning by telegraph and wireless wireless began heavy preparation for exodus, some using wagons and dumping into the wagons what they could have time to save from the houses, others taking the trains that backed into the city for the purpose. It was the biggest city yet in the path of the forest fire, being a town of over seven hundred thousand inhabitants, besides including 100,000 refugees that before hand had come there from other towns and who were now forced once more to resume their flight. An hour after the warning the conflagration had come upon the city before two quarters of the inhabitants had gone, and the remainder had no time to save their household property.

The wind blew a terrific hurricane hot and scorching, tearing roofs off the houses smashing in windows, buffeting the crowds of poor people and hurrying flying wreckage among them. The heat was so terrible on the forward side of the city facing the forest fire, that the car tracks melted in the streets, and the buildings by hundreds started to burn. No report however on any possible loss of life had been received from this doomed city, but among them among the unconfirmed reports reaching Angelina Agathia was one made by the Mayor of the town of Glorianna Junction stating that the wind came on with a velocity of one hundred and twenty five to thirty miles an hour all of a sudden and that roofs of buildings suddenly were flying in the sky by hundreds, the building facing the oncoming forest fire burst into fire in ranks, and before all of the people had escaped from the town nearly the whole city was a raging furnace sea. The trains worked like mad to take away the people, scores backing up into the yards at great risks but the majority were all saved and taken away without any one being injured though many had partly burned but wet clothing on them. Out of a population of 789,000 besides the added 100,000 only 25,000 had time to save their household goods. Many relief units were dispatched to Glorianna Junction and west Glorianna Junction which were being destroyed and before communication lines went down many messenger reports indicated that most severe damage may have been inflicted and all power lines had been interrupted. Also a United of Holy Sisters left Angelina Agathia for the location of Glorianna Junction to render aid if necessary. Units in many other sections of the forest fire swept regions had entered the areas as investigations proved without a doubt that abundant aid was needed. Before it was destroyed the Mayor of the city reported that mobilization camps in the vicinity which had prepared to take over relief measures there and prepared to any emergency was also hit by the fire and ruined. The inhabitants fleeing on trains were warned to stay inside the box cars and it was believed if overtaken even by the fires the trains would be able to run through with considerable safety as long as the trucks remained firm. Many inhabitants of other towns in the vicinity of the big city fled for safety to open plains, streams, ravines and low and wide rivers or for large clearings in the woods. Residents from Heidi Junction, Big Hedda, Mic-Hollister Run, Evangelia St Clara, and Meldon Ricknell and scores of other places joined the terror stricken floods of humanity after the warning on the 5th that the fire was coming like "a sea" and were said to have filled hundreds of box cars being pulled out by various trains to taking them to open country. There was more excitement and confusion during this time than all the volumes in the world could describe and many of the trains though saving the refugees and bring them out bringing them out of the fire zone did not escape entirely unscathed. Many farmers have having property in the dense forests sought safety by driving southward up the east bank of the Mic-Hollister Run. The majority of the skilled men folk of these towns however bravely remained behind to help in the work of combating the fire. All or while all kinds of plans were being made for what possible relief work could be effected regarding the tremendous drain caused by the past awful war disasters, of which many millions were yet homeless, Emperor Vivian offered to go personally into the district to aid in the work but was warned by wireless that he could not make headway in any such attempt as all means of communications were cut off, and that the fire was spreading toward his own city, and that only an ensuing flood produced by the explosion and which would flood huge districts in the country of Angelina, and still spreading would alone in some probabilities prevent the fires from hitting the city.

Before striking into Glorianna Junction the forest fire apparently passed near Mic-Hollister City isolating that big city (Chicago size in number of houses but more inhabitants) from communication with the outside world, but that the city so far was not menaced, though the temperature was unusually high and twilight darkness prevailed for days. Two telephone operators from there had been vainly calling for Angelina Agathia but had not received any response from any line, wireless even. Two refugee trains loaded with people from burning towns were forced to run the gauntlet of fire. One was headed for Pandure, and the other for Zannagatopolis. Nothing was heard from these trains they apparently being lost. They finally came safely through but had experienced great difficulty in making headway and the box cars on the outside were badly charred, and the passengers were almost so suffocated by the heat.

THOUSANDS DEAD IN PATH OF MIC-HOLLESTER WOODS FIRE HURRICANE CALVERNIA FEARS FURTHER AND DISASTERS AND ALL ACCOMPANYING HORRIBLE. FROM PAST DISASTERS THIRTY THREE MILLIONS FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND FACING FAMINE AND DISASTERS.
JAMES HAYOOD.

Though the main city is reported so far safe, west Mic-Hollister was said by wireless to be center of destruction, and that thousands of refugees forced to flee from the place on foot took refuge in ravines near streams and by lakes and forest clearings but went through a purgatory before escaping. Reports hints on world record breaking destruction. Tremendous forest fire of unknown size and immeasurable heat racing for Lucille Rickson Town, Gosa and Topsy said to be burning.

Angelina Agathia, Heidi Junction, Big Girl Knoll Dorothy Gale, Mombi, and Pandora a Calvernia, Francis Atlanta and hundreds of other big places completely isolated.

Mobilization camps at Lucille Rickson afire, and hundreds of thousands of soldiers out fighting forest fire, but making no headway as they cannot stand the heat within ten miles, with seventy eight mile an hour wind blowing. Hundreds of thousands of inhabitants fleeing from Lucille Rickson and Glorianna cities. Heavy damage feared at Lucille Rickson by wind. Whole River valley of Mic-Hollister Run threatened. Leaping flames into sky seen at Francis Atlanta seventy miles away.

Big Girl Knoll threatened, though Francis Atlanta message indicates change in direction of fire storm.

Inhabitants flee from hundreds of villages by train, boat, wagon or on horse back. Great terror and panic everywhere. Lucille Rickson city in almost night darkness and temperature indicated as 134 in shade and still rising. City enveloped in smoke driven from forest fire by high hurricane of winds.

Near Angelina Agathia and Pandora.

Dead among forest fire rangers, and refugees estimated at 111,567. For remaining refugees of all other disasters not counting forest fire horror, famine looms for over thirty three million. These refugees in danger as fire men menace their refuge. Howless because of forest fires believed to number 4,567,000.

Damage to towns and villages and cities by forest fires exceeds nearly $400,000,000.

Forest damage $ 567,899,999 and still mounting high. Whole southern Calvernia and northern Angelina State isolated.

North Angelina State.

World record breaking flood ensuing. Angelina Agathia flooded but by flood cut off from danger of forest fire. Flood is spreading through regions not forested. Hundreds of towns in danger of inundation.

With the death toll caused by the enormous forest conservatively estimated at over eleven thousand and the specter of famine was still more appalling throughout Calvernia these horrible days, among the millions still homeless because of the disasters of the past, and now. At least thirty five million people were stated to be facing facing starvation and the plague of diseases was threatening.

spread. On the sixth day of September the death list was increased with the confirming of reports that at least two hundred and twenty nine persons were killed in the town of Grave White. The Mayor of that ruined town reported that the bodies of thirty two other persons were discovered near a fire swept ravine by a searching party which was seeking the bodies of seventeen members of lost fire rangers known to have been trapped by the forest fire in the vicinity.

And to make matters more strange no alarm of any kind had at first been felt for the safety of those bodies that have been found. The Mayor expressed the belief that more dead would be found in the neighborhood of this town.

Half of the population of the town of Lauderdale was thought also to be homeless, and that in that town alone the property loss would amount up to over $100,000,000. Declaration of Martial law requisitioning and rationing of food and drafting all able bodied men among the many refugees to go back and fight the forest fire was urged upon by the new Galverinian Governor Hendry Helto. The group in a petition asserted that even the Galverinian and other Governmental authorities could because of all communications being destroyed by the past disasters could take the proper steps for proper relief to prevent sickness and starvation or to ascertain the facts as to immediate needs. Others of the National Guard had been ordered out to help guard property from looters and also to draft members for forest fire fighters.

About sixty miles south of Francis Atlanta seventy six towns, and three cities reported to be destroyed by the forest fire were found to be safe fortune only the fire having changed direction. But communications with many others was lacking, and it was believed that it would take months before accurate reports could be received from any section in which more than seven or seventy per cent of the towns were destroyed by fires.

Nevertheless all physicians and others familiar with such conditions said that a death toll of some many thousands as a final figure was a conservative estimate.

The rangers who were combating the fire near Gloriam Junction had been already on their fourth headlong retreat, times with excitement, and now were preparing for another effort about seven miles from the head of the fire but a little off its course. It would be exceedingly dangerous for them to place themselves directly in front of this fire flood. On every side the officers beheld the gathering civil men citizens of other towns come to help them in the desperate work, enthused over evident successful mere members.

The head men were shouting as the fever of the work grew apace. Those of the hardest fighters tried earnestly to suppress their impatience while the main leader offered them a final word.

"The rangers on the left will take the offensive about a mile from here," the officer told them. "They always do, so let them go it go to it. And if we can't corner the fire let them go back. But mind boys what I say now--even if the north branch of the fire nod noses ahead a stretch--don't let her get away from you. James good luck to you, and let every mothers son of you do his best."

After he had gone they became restless. Larry himself who tied a see senseless tune, and Van Dunt kept up a line of chat or that commanded no ones attention. Even James Bonifacio manifested symptoms of uneasiness. Hence tiller his mate alone seemed not to be disturbed. With calculative eyes he regarded the movement of the conflagration, and at intervals he over and over observed the smoke covered sky once more, and then the tree tops, and finally the water of the river. The results of his observation apparently did not satisfy him, for his face clouded though however he offered no remark.

"James my friend," suddenly declared a ranger whose name was Fred in an attempt at railery to dispel the tension--"what's the fire going to do,--turn off or come our way!"

"For a moment James did not speak--then turning his eyes from the tree tops, in a listless tone he informed his friend--

"It's going to turn the other way--but there's a big town in its path and its coming upon that town as sure as shooting."

"Never mind any gloom about the town just now," the Ranger said almost impatiently. "We don't want anything but successful fighting now. Save the blues for the losing crows, after we have beaten the 'red plague'."

"Yes but our wishes are not always accepted in heaven even in a cause as good as our country has. It may be altogether different up there."

"Great guns James what if that is so," Fred exclaimed with unconcealed naivety. "Are you forgetting James that prayer usually brings success. And never mind about the fire progressing toward the town. Just put this into your head--we are out here to win. Hear that James and all the rest of you. We have lost six good fights against this forest fire in six successions, but as this is the seventh we must win now and by all the might of every sinew in mine and your arms we are going to win, and all you must pray while you work, and not merely pray but PRAY. You fellows remember that. Some thing they can win without prayer but that is like sticking your expensive shoes in the mud and expecting it to come out clean. Most of you had been routed by this confounded 'red plague' six times already and fought against the fire a losing war. Not so this time--not while I am in charge. Before I'll retreat I'll burn."

And Freds blue eyes gleamed with positive assurance, and his knuckles glared white in his clenched fists. He was always like that, Fred Golden the Forest ranger, yet not overconfident, not self certain, though very determined. The words of others never prevailed against him, and his determination was only secondary to his ultimate success no matter what the venture, or fight. Even in his child hood fortune took kindly to Fred and his continued successes ultimately left their impress on his character. Accustomed to the responsibilities of high offices, Fred always isolated himself from the advice and suggestions of those near him who knew little about forest fire fighting, so that he asserted brazenly more than once that he solicited help from no one who did not pray or had no confidence in God. In such a frame of mind it was only a matter of time, failure or success that Fred usually forgot to do anything else to his liking but pray for success successes for the good of God and his soul, and he was just as faithful in God as all the Abbeonians usually are. Yet in spite of his slight bossy ways to his men, Fred liked them very much for their goodly ways of working with him and obeying his every word without murmuring and complaint. Yet no one knew Fred any better than James, and James well knew that Freds mother had begged him to obtain any other kind of work than going out fighting forest fires, and it is probable that Fred would have given in despite his headstrong will, when he usually subdued parental objection when he felt sure he is in the right but on this occasion once his own home town was in the path of the forest fires of southeastern Galverinia and so he entered among the rangers because he was determined to save his home.

"I'll tell you Fred," James had said more than once. "We would never need to be out fighting such fires if it was not for the glondelinians. Since its my vocation now because of their wicked vandalism, I am mighty proud of it, but thinking properly the army just now is the proper place for you and me. I'd give anything to shoot down general John Manley this, for I'll ten twenty dollars against your O that he is fully responsible for this wanton cruelty and devastation of Galverinian property, by fire, flood, and explosion and heaven knows what else."

Mrs. Mrs. Bolden's principal objection for her son to go out fire fighting in the war fire swept forests was that Fred, placed himself in dire peril every time, yet his knowledge of his peril and his want of fighting such perils caused him on all occasions to be more devout to God and His Blessed Mother, caused him to increase his religious duties as much as a Sister or a Brother would, and whenever he went he received more spiritual training of which in such circumstances he was always in dire need. He even was a daily communicant. As the months wore on her fears were being truly realized, for four times he worked hard in rescue work during the flood horrors, narrowly escaping drowning fifteen times, and once because of injuries and burns received in fighting forest fires he had been laid up for three months. With no one but patient and obedient James to watch and guard Fred, the caution of the forest rangers was steadily and increasingly increasing his church obligations. Yet the perils Fred faced worried James a great deal, and the days before this terrific conflagration took place, he told Fred as much. He finally suggested that both of them attend Mass the Sunday morning of the eve of the fire horror.

"Really Fred," James said quietly. "Do you know you have been taking great perils since you entered the Ranger service. You have missed death by a narrow chance every other day it seems for the last three three months. Honest Fred do you think it is fair to your selfish it fair even to your mother? She could not afford to lose you!"

"Suffering cats. Can I help it. Will you listen to reason James and understand that it is the enemy who is responsible for these plagued fires explosions and flood disasters and that the country drafted me for this job and I therefore cannot neglect my duty!" interjected Fred. "Was I not forced to fight my very body to pieces to save my mother and my own home from the ravages of the southeastern forest fires confound it still raging even now. I'd like to know why in the name of Sam Hill the enemy didn't take up the miracle of blowing the whole world to pieces and pull all the stars down from heaven while he is at it. And now don't get vexed, James old scout. I'll not wait till next Sunday but I'll go this morning sure as my name is Fred Bolden. There is no time for us to lose. Piety and prayers are better for us at this perilous time and at Mass we can offer up our Holy Communion and the Mass for the intention that we'll pull our adventure through."

He did, and now the fight was on and a dangerous one. Fred had lost twenty of his men already who had been trapped. And now while the long lines of forest rangers waited on the alert, hearts bounding pounding, muscles taut, James whispered a prayer, for he was as uncomfortable about the forest fire as he was about his cat captain. Already uply black clouds, mingled with white, brown and sandy and yellow colors were piling over the far distant tree tops, and a snarling hot wind came in fitful gusts thrashing the bushes, and ruffling the rivers surf surface and bring forward fogs of smoke. The starters run went off with a sharp report that echoed across the Mic-Hollen Run. Freds senses responded to the firm signal, and every man he kind and before him and on each side of him fell in at the work of sawing and cutting down trees with axes and long crosscut saws with a thym that manifested great and most strenuous training. He heard the shout that went up, and he heard the snorting wind squalls as they ever increased in force and the smoke coming thicker and thicker.

Johns immense crews took first place in the work from the very beginning while the other three kept almost abreast of each other in long lines of men hard at work until at the end a stretch of clearing was beginning to show for a length of a good number of miles and half a mile wide, while Freds crew began to edge up on Johns crews. Yet all down the wide river along which they fought the water became more untroubled as a steady hot wind raced down with them

Presently a peculiar dusk fell over the land and the tree tops away in a fury of unrest, while a growing heat was felt making the warriors sweat until their clothing was wringing wet. With each moment the racing between the four sections of rangers became more arduous and yet from the conduct of the weather Fred began to sense a growing fear in his heart. Suddenly he became conscious of the fact that the long thick line of men under Captain Qr Ardale was no longer alone alongside, and he shouted through his trumpet for them to recall as he shouted--

"Fire coming like hurricane. For heavens sake be careful Ardale or you and your men will be trapped. For God's sake Hanson go after them and bring them back."

Every one of his men were working with a zeal that thrilled Fred to the core but Ardale had his apprehensions. The light of the wave of fire along the horizon already revealed itself as strong as a glaring red sunset and the smoke was getting thicker and the wind stronger. John still trailed behind and then Hansons followed, but Ardale remained steadily ahead, but out of sight in the smoke fog. A strange sentiment of horror filled Freds heart. Now Fred could see the James Seminary boys and rangers and the clattering swing of the axes of porters crew all putting their hearts blood into a task that was positively hopeless for them. From the benignating every one knew the prize of peril would go to Ardale or to James, and Fred again hollered through his trumpet--

"Come back in line you fools. You are getting separated. You'll be trapped and cut off. For God's sake come back. The fire's coming like crazy. Can't you hear?"

With a start Fred suddenly observed far to his right--forested ridge of long side and not very high when he first looked at it--it was bare of fire. Now it was a mountain of flame smoking like a huge orally erupting volcano at the top and sides and the heat could be felt from her there.

"Good God" he gasped. "Have mercy on them and preserve them."

The three mile march was passed, and James was now trailing ahead of Ardale unconscious of the peril to himself and his men. Henry Larry another Captain began to shout through his microphone--

"They are going at it hard--good and hard--Ardale is fighting to keep ahead--but it is fatal if they do not come in. Some one go give these warnings--I sent some one for help. Fred, Fred you too look out. The fire is flanking a part of your line. The fire is edging up fellows. Come on back. Come on."

Beneath the ever increasing fury of the wind the water of the river fairly churned, and the rangers nearest its shore were surprised to see multitudes of dead fishes floating on the surface, and one of them catching the water with his finger found it nearly boiling hot and it was scalding badly. Fred raised his own axe for his last stroke which was to fell his tree and then he waited for the response as the huge tree crashed to the ground. Then he felt the shock of it and for a moment through his body swept the sensation of glorious victory. The black water of the river swished onward, the wind beat against the rangers, the trees away more menacingly and roared like thunder and the multitude of distant flaming embers flared against the ever darkening sky.

"Good. Good. We've got the fire checked now I'll bet--the flames would leap this breach." Captain Larry told his crew. Slowly surely as men were creeping up laboring alongside Freds long line, chained on and on--and then the lead. Never will Fred forget that cheer that rose and rolled over the way water of the river and went echoing back when it was evident the breach would check the tremendous conflagration. Sometime however the wind shrieked like sirens in the trees top or howled like the clamor of automobile horns and trees away and twisted and the air became thick with flying branches.

"Good. Good. The fire won't be able to leap this breach. The flames cannot stretch across this opening." Fred told the men nearest him. "Hurry!"

It was evident that Fred was pushing his men to victory. He was pushing it to the goal. He was going to conquer at least this part of the forest fire for the first time since he entered this kind of work. James's crew and his own crew he told himself was making a success out of a forest fire fight, that had failed often before. It seemed like Fred for the first time to credit himself too early and to take upon himself the credit of a victory. It was just his nature even though he never was over confident yet even now it made his belated prayer had no place in his life. If while fighting fire he did not put his whole trust in God his intercessor in this cause and his best friend. He always intended to succeed just as now more by calling for Davine assistance and if he failed now he would blame no one else but the forest fire and the enemy. For never had his crew been forced to face such a "burning world." In his station there suddenly fell a fatal note. Her perceived it at once, so did Larry the other captain, and James too. Fred heard Larry's cry, but he did not know exactly what Larry was saying and the tumult of a hurricane of wind starting to ravage the very tree tops like a roaring tornado. His heart too was suddenly too overwhelmed with the crushing menace, not of a possible defeat in his efforts to conquer the fire but a defeat now when victory was within their very grasp--but he and his crews was faced with irreparable disaster. But now some section of the line had failed,--some one had broken under the tense strain, and the fire was overlapping some portion of the battle line. Panic was in the heart of every forest ranger. "Great guns and little fishes. You--You--Come on Van. Now'll Turner. You shakers. You cads. Come on. Get to fighting harder. Once more at it with your axes and saws, chains and picks. Ready. Go."

Larry's exhortation brought about some semblance of order. Freds men still went at it harder and longer, and the rest of the rangers took up the fight once more lengthening and trying to widen the breach. But alas in that dismal moment, brief as it was, Ardale's men came through the smoke shield on a terrific confused retreat--the head of a flight which for him was never completed.

For as if to elude the fatal blunder as if to shatter Freds premature elation the fire stems broke with a suddenness that was fearful to behold. The flames came along in a wall as far as eye could see fleeted through the smoky clouds as if determined to destroy the whole forested regions and every city in the world, now to turn the very world into a fiery ball, and as the flames ate them through countless trees fell here and there, and some among the fleeing rangers like thunder crashing and searing and howling with a clamor that filled the stoutest heart with terror. The fire was only across the enormous breach made by the rangers but from that distance the heat was terrible.

Aid the rangers Larry screamed out some unintelligible orders. Fred could only catch a passing word. The wind hot and parching seemed to wrench them out of the chief leaders mouths.

"To the river! Every one of you. To the river--the shore--never make--fire two hundred yards away coming like a ocean of flame--for heavens sake--"

The wind pulled before it a thick wall of sparks and blazing embers with a hiss and roar, a torrent of wild leaping downward flames mingling mingling. So thick was the smoke now it was impossible to see ten feet ahead. The wind filled the air with clouds of flaming branches being hurled far beyond the breach. My heavens the fire leaped the breach. Then suddenly came a crash, and a tumult of fearful cries!

"A number of men of James crew is caught under falling trees all ablaze."

shouted Fred, his black eyes a glow.

"Some of you men go to their rescue." James yelled in his high voice rushing toward the scene only to be driven back by the fierce heat. "They are all under blazing trees. God have mercy on them." James and a number of the men strove to go to their rescue but to turn back was utterly impossible. Like a dense sheet and tongue of dazzling lava the flames enveloped everything within their sight. Every one fled before the scorching heat.

Then was who was always emotional, van fatigued and spent broke down and cried like a little girl. He was hysterical, and Fred was afraid others would follow his example. Into Freds heart crept a sensation of despair, a spirit of overpowering fear.

His own men surprised were rushing and running through a Niagara of rain and flying sparks and embers, and the wind hot and fierce was behaving like a desert cyclone. The river could not be more than a few yards away, when a giant cedar having been like a torch for fifteen minutes fell, and in its very path Fred himself had rushed. The tree hitting him hurled him into the river and went into the river too with a sizzling hiss. When Fred came to the surface finding the water uncomfortably hot but not enough to scald him he was chiefly concerned about his two shoulders. They apparently pained with the agony of a thousand toothaches. He was almost ready to surrender to the torturing pain and give up the struggle. Exhausted from the desperate work, bruised and battered by the trees, a soaked in hot water and and gasping for air, Fred felt he had come to the end of his own life. The river however shielded him somewhat from the tremendous heat for he was now between a gullion of walled flames searing every tree within view, and in the swirling swirling sparks and flying embers in this tragic hour, the unroar of flames and wind he repeated again and again "God help my men. Have mercy on them."

His heart was overwhelmed with the awful sacrifice of the past disasters made by the glandelinians and now he and his men were to perish in this. He recalled his kind patient and loving mother, and her gentle urgings, which the government had made him do though she steadily opposed. And he her only son had once saved her, and now he was in danger of perishing himself,--and all his men. He and all the rangers had failed in the fight.

"Mother, mother," he whispered and every atom of strength in him rallied to the words. The thought of him and placing more than ever his trust in God gave him considerable vigor as he clung to the limb of the scorched cedar that was now sliding down the river on the rushing stream. He even forgot the torturous ache in his shoulders. He was actually stunned to acknowledge the emptiness of men in such a critical hour, when the wrath of glandelinians had made disasters apparently swept him and over the earth in a hopeless passion. The sky over him was nothing new but black. It was terrible hot and the flames roared the river and on shore the trees by hundreds burned through tall hissing into the stream. What except the power of prayer could mitigate such an outburst of fury. What was man and animal or bird in the face of such a tempest of fire. Now indeed he needed prayer more than ever before in his life, and he sure did pray. He had always been true to her. How she would miss him if he perished. He never had a thought for himself--as long as some one else was safe. Gratifying his good desires--realizing his own country's sad and holy cause he had found his sole aim in life, and he had never been foolhardy enough to believe that everything was possible without prayer, that he could gain anything or win anything without spiritual assistance. Grieved by the wind the sparks sometimes beat against his already heat so scorched face, and one burning leaf dashed into his mouth and a burning branch struck him in the eyes, and hurled by the wind small gravel face, closing his eyes as if eager to crush and burn him and claim him a victim. The rushing noise of stream and wind deafened him, and the thunder of falling trees, and the sea of flame enveloping everything made him believe that the final day of red reckoning had come and he was a doomed soul under the fire. He was not prepared. Yet only the very few hours before that morning he had been at three Masses in a little country town and had received Holy Communion only the water saved him from being burned and scorched to death for it did not heaten any more than he feared. The warmth of the water he could stand the fishes could not and fishes floated about him in droves—dead, and nearly cooked. Fred continued most ardently to pray as his mother had taught him to pray. He prayed as he had that morning at Mass, as he had at the parish school, when a child lay under the benevolent guidance of the sisters. Like a gleam of heavenly light through the decreasing fire walls the very old time prayers came to him, and his heart became more restful, and as the air began to grow cooler and the wind had stopped his hope grew, and he felt that all was not lost.

Above the tumult of the torrent, and the wild crackling of flames, Fred suddenly heard a voice. Someone was calling—calling his name. It was James. James the old faithful comrade, was still alive and searching for him. Tears swamped his eyes and his throat felt uncomfortable. Good old James.

"James, James. Here I cannot see you the smoke is so thick. Where are you? I'm all in—I'm all in—James." gasping for air and weakening from the agony of ever being rescued. Ever loyal and dependable, James finally reached his comrade. The tree had unexpectedly become tangled in some debris and other fallen and still burning trees near shore, and for a moment remained stationary. Welcoming strength, his clothing was almost scorched from him and he was bleeding from a scalp wound but he came in time to Fred's rescue.

"Freddie boy. Oh Freddie. Are you all right? Here get your knee up on this. Steady. I'll help. The fire has passed and we'll find some safe spot from this smothering smoke and heat."

And Fred, Captain Bolden—helpless, exhausted, weak as a kitten—Fred the great forest ranger and Abbeismian hero lay motionless on the bole of the half burned cedar.

"Come on Freddie, we can't rest—not yet. We must seek land even among the fragments of trees stuck in the rushes. Come on, get up before it is too late, before the current gets us going again."

How they ever made the rivers bank, James or Fred never fully understood. However it was more through the effort of James than through Fred's, and Fred of his injured shoulders, and the heat of the nearest blazing tree trunks and beyond endurance, they threw themselves on the wet hot sand, too tired to care, too exhausted to hear the turbulent commotion on all sides of them, the horrifying thunder of trees still falling and hurling blizzards of sparks. They could hear nothing but the crackling booming noise of the fire, the endless purgatory of fire, a seething, hell, and the dying wind in what was left of the flouzing trees still thousands of torches, and the rolling rounding steaming fish covered river. Where they lay the strip of sand was broad and kept them some safe distance from the conflagration and the falling trees.

"Fred—w—lost—we lost the — fight against the fire, but all our crows escaped safely thank God, and his Blessed Mother."

In the glaring light—in the raging chaos, Fred grouped for James's hand. He found it and gripped it hard and held it for a long time, while he said:

"James you good hero. You have saved them all and my life. I am weolast but it is gods will."

For a time Fred or James did not speak. Then he said quietly:

"Fred at Mass this morning I prayed specially for you. My prayer was in answer out of this hall. We will soon be out of this and in camp. Thank God."

When they released hands, James hand was wet—wet with tears—the tears of the captain of the forest fire fighting rangers. Then they were led away to a camp to receive treatment for their burns.

When the forest fire tricked and routed the six thousand fire fighters, and almost destroyed them and their sixteen leaders and heroic Fred Bolden the conflagration in approaching us written before Gloriamia Junction lost none of its unspeakable terrors for the general public of that city and neighboring towns through the fact of the repeated news given of the horror and terror in the smoke of other great "Red Plagues" then sweeping the land. The panic of many other towns was not allayed when the dread "red hot fire disease" of the forest appeared upon Gloriamia Junction reawakening the horrors of the awful visitations recorded upon towns by raging fires elsewhere. The population of the town had often heard that the country was ravaged by three big Natural plagues of horrors great visitations by the enemy, various diseases sweeping mankind, and the scourges of flood, explosion, and fire. After warning the rangers the fire was said to have appeared on September 3'd (Though as soon from the bulletin at Angelina Agathia, the fire had appeared one day later—) the epidemic of fires appeared on September 4th about two o'clock in the afternoon like a hurricane scourge. Writing for the Ana Angelina Agathia Daily Times the correspondents and witnesses declared:

"Gloriamia Junction is an unfortunate city indeed. Its misfortune as well as that of hundreds of others have become a source of National alarm. The eyes of the nation are turning with pity on us unable right away to render aid. On the scourge of these our disasters. The forest fire scourged the country severely. The city is doomed. Hence on the first announcement of the approach of the "red plague" all who could take things with them prepared to fly for their lives. The city heated by a stifling smoke laden atmosphere with a temperature of 110 was in a state of great crazy confusion and terror, there was a general stampede worse than if yellow fever started there. The banks were besieged, and the railroad officers were crowded by the excited people old men women and children.

The banks stood the run on them and none failed even though afterwards the buildings went up in flame. In their anxiety to get away from the endangered town many were trampled down at the railroad depots and elsewhere even in streets, and others hung on to the cars to take them out of the city all threatened to standing back to their homes to salvage what could be saved, or fled toward our suburban regions.

In a few hours longer there would be no escape for the fugitives of Gloriamia Junction city, trains would be compelled to stop running, as all surrounding villages were already being swept by the wild racing crazily burning fire plagues. The terrors of the country people were bordering on madness for never before was a country like this so visited by disaster. From far and near during the awful panic the militia of standing armies was called out for duty by order of the territorial governor, and the national Government replied to all concerns for aid to the depopulated cities burned to ashes by the "red plague" sweeping nearly thousands of miles of country forests since 1912. Some of the citizens who escaped began to organize a committee of safety, forming an executive committee from the Committee of Safety, and therefore they maintained order near the scene of the disaster and surrounding town and villages some distance from the passage of the Red St. George. It undertook to maintain order, protect the people from Gloriamia Junction and provide for those who would go to the conflagration and other scenes established outside the "fire zone."

This committee had at its disposal the sum of only $60,999 the residue of some of the other post disaster money sent to it previously and which was known as the Xhini Charity fund.

An interesting factor in the efforts of checking the spread of the epidemics of forest fires, was the volunteering of all the men folk found in the many refugee camps outside the conflagration zone to go out and help in the battle against the "red plague." Their establishment however and also maintenance were something of a task in the face of the general and record breaking panic prevailing among the millions of people of the vicinity as well as those who the camps meant to harbor when the forest fires moving onward threatened even them. The terror which the announcement of the wild spread of the plagues of forest fires created among the country people was uncontrollable.

They dreaded the approach of the forest fires more than the assault of the must savage of the Gloriamian armies. At some sections their terror delayed the establishment of a camp by the authorities for they would not stop in their flight from the raging flames, even though thousands of farmers and forest people prepared to defend the territory against the approach of the tremendous forest fires. The attempt was therefore abandoned, and the hundreds of thousands of people made a "living" movement to many other spots, by train, wagon and on foot. After some opposition by the approaching forest fire a camp for the people of Gloriamia Junction was established being formed about sixteen miles from the river apparently on the site of the forest land out of the reach of the forest fire on the Rio-Hollesler and Pandora Railroad. This camp was to be a refuge for all classes of people but this camp had to be moved a day later when the fire threatened it.

A very camp that could be established had a number of priests, among these who had been unable to get away from the burned cities and town by train were thousands of poor people as well as all other virtuous Abbeismian and Galverinian people who had fled by carriages, on horse-back, by boat or on foot. One of the witnesses said referring to the still raging plagues of forest fires elsewhere turned to the Priests of all remaining churches for advice and assistance whether Hendro who had been the soul of the flood refugee camps in the past months was in Angelina Agathia at the outbreak of this fire plague, but on hearing of the dread occurrence had dispatched word that he was coming on the first train, and came he did. All representatives of the Abkhazian Catholic societies were called together turning over to the undertaking of all funds made making a good reserve. Applications also were made for the necessary tents to the Committee of Safety. The site of one enormous camp was selected south of the dangerous vic-Hollesater nun regions and therefore there was nothing to do but pitch tents hoping for safe measures to begin as the people not endangered by the plague brought in the refugees and provisions to the camp. In a day and before the authorities could do anything by way of establishing other refugees some thirteen or fourteen thousand people were at home in the big camp. The camp was to be maintained by the funds from all sources while applications for rations was made to the various Committees of Safety. Everyone was admitted to this camp except if he was not a refugee and providing the refugee was worthy of the protection of the camps. The camps lay not more than sixteen miles to the southward of the "Red Plague" south southeast probably of Glorianna Junction and between the Big Girl Knoll and the Sandon path roads. There were six entrances into the camp. This was so fugitives could enter the camp. But the leading camp entrance was guarded by sentries who would challenge the approach of people and denied the name of the town he came from. If it can be proved that the town he named is not in the path of the fire or was not a strike he was refused admittance. This entrance was called S. Johns. It was the main entrance for all other refugees and was in charge of Sisters of various orders who were assisted by nurses. The second entrance was at the headquarters. The priests and others resided there, the sisters also had their apartment tents there, as well as a tent school for about six or seven hundred children or more. This was the visitors entrance or for those of other towns who may come in requesting for relatives not heard from. The other entrances also named for saints were for provisions and wagons bring other refugees, having also several headquarters, drug stores, inspectors offices and so on and the outdoor kitchens and Chapels for Masses.

The camp offered a splendid panorama from the distance. The open in the woods and outside the stretches did not conceal the white tents but left them visible a beautiful canvas city. All the men folk worked hard around the camp to make a fire clearing so that if the fire did come the camp would not be menaced. On one side was a wide deep ravine washed by the waters of pure springs which carried away any danger of vitiation, and which would provide sufficient shelter should the camp be menaced.

The forest fire night was a dark starless one. Hundreds of the refugees made their way toward one Big tent chapel alone, the camp fires being lighted, and illuminated the camp, making everything bright and glorious. The tent X chapels. Fragrant flowers gathered from Nature's wildest bowers adorned open altars, while their halos of glory around the statues of the Sacred Heart the Blessed Virgin and various saints were beautiful.

In a few minutes the priests of each chapel attended by their proper numbers of altar boys appeared in cassock surplice and stole. As they knelt down to begin the Rosaries for protection, any one would be surprised by the tremendous volume of loudly spoken voices which broke out in the Holy Mary responses. No one could have forgotten the scene, the chapels, the outdoor altars the crowds of worshippers and the altar boys kneeling in front and around under the darkened canopy of heaven. Many were kneeling there who before the visitation of this great horror have seen better days, when servants would wait on them and down cushions distinguish their pews in church. But even now their breasts heaved with sentimentals as pious as all the others.

Now the Host is lifted up. An organ peals from the neighboring tents and choral voices fill the air with harmonious sound and renders the scene and the solemnity enchanting added by the bright distant glow of the dreadful "Red Plagues". Sweet memories of this midst forest fires would always recall to any one witnessing them. The blessed influence of religion which have made all the camps a byword to signify virtue in spite of the fires, harmony all order would forever effect the soul of witnesses.

As is ever the case in time of wars great desolation, all the Abkhazians turn to the priests for guidance. And this was desolation indeed, for everywhere, north, south, west, east, every direction you look was destruction, horror death and intolerable suffering beyond all records ever known in any annals of history or story making and so on. Many thousands every day to whom an hour ago a person might have been speaking within the hour were now cold in death less than half an hour afterwards. No one could say or dare say even if the writer how a many really perished in all the combinations of disasters. Everyone who was survived the horrors came in churches in cities and towns and everywhere on bended knees employing to God and praying for His aid, asking Him to prevent or stop these devastations and bring the awful war to a speedy end no matter how it ended. Funds still even now for all the disaster victims of the past were still being needed, and badly to help in any move but it was now left for all priests adding wounded and dying soldiers in the battling armies to lead the cause of relief and rescue work and helping refugees so to speak, and aid millions to a point of at least comparative safety. All of these Abkhazian Catholics Catholic priest knew the work before them, and went quietly about it at every risk to their own safety. Many camps for refugees of the forest fires of every section of burning California formed—and it can be a good known saying that most of these camps "The Red Plague" in these districts—for the refugees and men refugees worked hard to make large fire clearings and branches so that "The Red Plague" cannot cross them unless he has "Mr Big Wind" to help him. One priest whose name was Father Ange, Angelino Moreno erected a big tent city at a large beautiful clearing in the woods of the "Red Plague" and saved the lives of all the refugees who sought shelter there. There he placed sentries and erected tents for every one needing refuge. There a tent Church also was put up and there Mass was celebrated six times every morning for the prayers of asking gods aid in saving them all from the ravages of the forest fire, and the Benediction bell sounded at the sunset hour. The rosary was said along with the litany of the blessed

The blessed Virgin each evening before and after Benediction.

Yet with all this to do the priest labored each day in the camp adding the refugees who were burned in their flight injured in panics and so on. Strange to relate in all that terrible time there were no death in the camps. The forest fire raged on all sides of the camp yet the fire never touched it.

None of any places not yet touched by the forest fire had already been deserted, and confusion was everywhere. In one camp there were ten deaths among refugees who had been brought in with mortal burns or injuries and these died in the camp a day after they were brought in. Father Moreno had a commissary, a drug store, a kitchen a dining room, or rather a long tented dining hall. The guard line of sentries who kept their eye on the distant forest fires was never relaxed. And no one was admitted unless he could furnish proofs he was from a burned town. Many were the acts of mercy while they were there. Money seemed to pour in to the camps from all over the very stricken country itself. The priests had responsible parties to aid them in the distribution of funds, and the only orders they gave their helpers were to relieve every refugee that comes in, and call for more funds when necessary.

However for many of these camps the long looked for peril arrived—the forest fire wind made its appearance and the fire was threatening to leap the clearing and branches and fear was in every heart. Camps had to be desert deserted there being no time to save even them, and any had not a shelter in which to return. All all in the camps that morning of the sixth of September had received Holy Communion. The scene then had been inspiring grand so much that they could have been pictured a scene for the best painters. And then these famous and relieving camps scores of them with the refugees again on the flight went up in smoke, and the priest themselves hardly had time to save even the Host of Host of which example I will give one thrilling description.

This was Father Francis's refugee camp of about 45,000 people. The clearing had been made very large by the men refugees without down all trees, but it was nevertheless in the path of the wildest section of the forest fire of this locality and the sufferers of this desolation was the best of the refugees all State born Abkhazians. Father Francis superior of this camp in anticipation of the outbreak had sought protection by having all his old bodied refugees even women to make trenches and big clearings, to remove all brush and trees and to soak leaves and so on with water taken from streams. If the fire had come more behaving it might have been well, but the fire was first preceded by a cyclonic wind that clouded the air all around with flying leaves twigs branches hurled great clouds of dust and smoke before it, and prostrated trees by hundreds. On that afternoon after the wind began the flames first attacked the large edge of the clearing, and the men rushed out to fight it with all possible means, but the wind tore flaming ombers and pendants of burning moss across the branch, and hurled burning trees across and into the branch by scores so that the forest fire started fiercely on the other side. The flames then first attacked the priest's residence tent, and also the Church, a tree falling and shattering and defacing the altar, tabernacle, statues and everything, setting fire to the decorations and everything that could burn. One priest got killed by a big log before he could rescue the Blessed Sacrament but a nun managed to get her habit thoroughly and despite the peril of rushing into that sea of fire forced her way into the furnace like sanctuary and though receiving bad burns finally secured the Blessed Sacrament. The tent was all a flame and many trees fell upon it and the nun was caught under a mass of blazing debris and with great difficulty rescued.

She was not however badly hurt at that.

The fight against the fire was like a terrible riot, and might as well say the "volunteers" then turned their attention to try and save the remainder of the camp to save the tent contents of the sisters some distance away. The children in the charge of the sisters were wondering what all the disturbance and gradually growing heat was, when some soldiers and runners ran up, and told them all to flee from the region as the whole forest in that locality was a fire cloud racing like a hurricane toward them, and that it was on its way toward the camp. Even then the sky was cumbered in flame and the flames roared like the hurricanes of wind, and hissed like millions of skyrocket. Hurrying to the other chapel two sisters his the Giberin with the Sacred Hosts in their pockets, and turned to flee, when they found themselves face to face with a seething thundering wall of flames leaping probably a thousand feet. Trembling not so much for themselves as for the Sacred Burden they carried, they stood in mortal fear of the next moment for really a horrible death stared them in the face, and was averted only by them seeing a large branch in the fire wall through which they ran reaching a ravine where they went and covered close to a small stream of water.

The rest of the sisters, the children and the refugees saved themselves by finally throwing themselves into the same ravine. But the latter was finally over-reached by the rushing roaring sea of fire, and like everything else was enveloped in fire, and flaming wreckage occasionally fell among them, coming upon the sisters and a number of the smaller children some of the rangers sought to get the children and then away from the more dangerous zone but were killed by a tree falling into the ravine which almost pinioned the children and sisters under its mass of flaming branches.

After this terrible experience the sisters were advised with their refugees to seek refuge elsewhere. It was not until the fire hurricane had died down and partly burned out into just smoldering smudge and slush were the refugees and sisters in the ravine rescued, and brought elsewhere to the river front by the men and others who took care of those slightly burned or otherwise injured.

In this terrible plague most of the food crops of all various kinds were destroyed. Many towns not accounted for were believed to be destroyed, or damaged beyond repair, and the fire burning fiercer and crazily swept onward bent upon destroying the world it seemed. The greatest sufferers were the poor forest and country folk numbering nearly three to four million who had no reserve resources and whose properties were totally wiped out never to be recovered. Reports of their suffering were reaching Pandora and elsewhere. Count De Riff who was in one of the refugee camps thus destroyed said the country people were coming into various towns not in path of fires by many thousands every day begging piteously for refuge food and medicine. Hard pressed merchants gave them as much as they were able and drug store men did what they could for those burned and injured. Count De Riff had been with three refugee camps and saw one after the other struck by the fire. A petition to the Governor of Galverinia said that six hundred thousand forest fire refugees were hungry and would have nothing to eat for weeks unless immediate and drastic action was taken. And there was four propositions to be taken.

1. That martial law throughout the forest fire scourged land be declared, with officers of all standing armies in command.

2. That all refugees must be taken and sent to big cities not near path of the fire plagues.

3. That progress of fire must be watched carefully by all investigators so as to warn all other places in path, also that all still running trails be brought and sent to all endangered towns for the removal of imperiled inhabitants. Also that all able bodied men of all towns and cities not even in path of fire be drafted for work of helping the scores of thousands of refugees fight the terrible plagues.

4. That vessels in rivers and trains elsewhere but close by be loaded with food and medical and other supplies and sent wherever distribution can be made. The Governor of Galverinia is also urged for a general appeal for aid through all charity institutions, and asserted the State was being visited and was suffering from the worse forest fires ever recorded any place in the whole world, and that investigators found things far worse than have been reported. Unremitting efforts by all drafted men so far and all fire fighters called to the scene have been made to stop the wild progress of the fire but to no avail.

A careful check of damage resulted for his towns in an estimate of over sixty million dollars with many many items unlisted. Those it was believed for ruined towns alone would increase the damage far above one hundred million dollars. Damage to other and smaller towns, was not estimated. The list of estimated losses was Little Heidi Junction, $10,000,000, Big Hedda, $10,000,000, Glorianna Junction $20,000,000, partial damage at Lucilla Rickson $10,000,000, Chamber 1 Chamberlain $5,000,000, thirty small villages known to be destroyed or burned $5,000,000, minor villages, $5,000,000, racks of newly laid railway of several lines of the Sondon and Mic-Hollister and Pandor $3,000,000, and for hundred miles of telephones and telegraph, $2,000,000. Much fire and other insurance is carried on all this but it did not probably exceed $20,000,000. Sixty persons were known to have been killed with the hurricane of fire struck persons were burned or scorched as to require quick treatment. All fire departments of city were called out and men citizens flocked to the forest to fight back the Red scourge. The damage was estimated at $45,999,976. The loss throughout the city because of a sudden fire hurricane wind had not been learned but it will be very great. Many wooden houses were razed. Several large estates were wiped out, and some d factories were damaged and all windows out. Streets were blocked by fallen trees and debris and housing conditions at some places were were deplorable. The next office occupied serious Amos. Around Lucilla Rickson from the known dead in other various burned towns were:

Little Mic-Hollister, 175, Pandor, 160, Pandor 71, Pandor-De-Leon 125, Aron, 215, St Michael, 110, Nidarain, 110, Las Piedra, 105, and Little Rickson 453 killed all killed in flight or caught in overtaken by the burning flames before they could escape. All the casualties were native Galverinians.

The Galverinian government took steps on the 5th of September under the direction of Emperor Vivian to bring all refugees out of the forest fire arena in southern Galverinia and likewise evacuated the Mic-Hollister Forest fire situation to determine if any action necessary for that section could be secured overcame the terrible "Red Plague." After a consultation with all his Royal House Emperor Vivian ordered all railroads still running in spite of past disasters to run to all places located in the danger zone to bring away all refugees fleeing from burning towns and cities and to deliver cargoes of food to the sufferers. Simultaneously Emperor Vivian his brother ordered several freight trains belonging to the Abbotson, Le-Bordain, and Galverinia to run for other sections further south of Lucilla Rickson to bring away refugees fleeing from Mombi and other towns threatened. The other trains ordered to the towns endangered were the "Evangeline St Clara, which left Angelina in Aquathia for the stricken districts. Emperor Vivian first request every hour of the day and night was of news from the forest fire sections. The general reports throughout Galverinia regarding other plagues either receding or still on were discussed but no action could be recorded or decided upon regarding the Mic-Hollister Plague the absence of badly needed news.

NORTHWEST 110-HOLLESTEIN WOODS FOREST FIRE
SWEEPST TWARD AND INTO NORTHERN ANGELINA STATE.
FOREST FIRE BELIEVED LASHED FORWARD BY SIXTY MILE TO ON ONE HUNDRED TWENTY FIVE MILE AN HOUR WIND.
MANY IN OTHER TOWNS DOWN DIED. TWO HUNDRED AND SIXTY SIX KILLED
AMONG RANGERS FIGHTING THE FIRE.

What startled people was that many railroad presidents of northern and southern Angelina State railroads reported by telegram that many freight trains were being held in readiness near the cities of Maricopa, Angelina Junction, and others because rumors had it that the forest fires which were sweeping such extensive forests had by the 7th of September become extraordinarily severe, and the left wing of it had struck across a portion of the extreme western Angelina border. Many indications showed that the fire seas had apparently turned southward between Angelina Junction and Gertrude Angelina City with the heart of the conflagration moving southeastward as eastward as well as southward, the eastern parts threatening to make a direct junction with the big fires which still raging had some time ago started horrors and terrible destruction in southeastern Calvernia. For unknown reasons or other the weather department at Gertrude Angelina city reported a sixty five mile an hour wind which was raising a temperature never yet recorded in the city's history during the hottest weather in her hottest summers.....

The Angelina Agathia Red Cross in co-operating with the people of the Northern Angelina districts were preparing extra relief expeditions to leave the city as soon as possible for every section of the areas threatened by the terrific conflagrations. One of the directors of public safety in the forest fire district declared that thousands upon thousands of men from cities and various towns had been drafted and sent to do what they can to try to stop or the progress of the "red plague" or at least but it off or head it off from the menaced cities and towns as even the fire was dangerously close to Gertrude Angelina city which had suffered its terrible share from floods just recently and had not hardly been able to repair all her buildings yet. The drafted men were sent by rail transportation and they were also to report as soon as possible on conditions in the "Red Plague" area.

The Mayor of Gertrude Angelina city said his last communication with Angelina Junction city by telephone at 7 P.M. when the police department there said a one hundred thirty mile an hour wind was raging through the city hurling dense clouds of smoke past and through the streets, and roofs were flying through the air in all directions, and a tremendous wall of fire was within two miles of the city which was being overtopped in a twilight darkness. The people were fleeing by train, wagon, auto or by any means possible and that those closest to the fire, hundreds of thousands of them had no time to save even the slightest of their household goods.

Communications were cut off before the Mayor of Angelina Junction city finished speaking.....

After causing at least 250 out of 100,000 rangers to be killed while fighting the flames near this region, and six hundred more among refugees, and leaving a sea of destruction in West North Angelina State, and shrouding all parts of southwestern Calvernia and good sections of northern Angelina State into dreadful suspicious silence, the terrific forest fire spreading and forming many others because of the wind raged into the north section of the woods of northern Angelina State somewhere between Gertrude Angelina City and Maricopa becoming one of the worst fire seas on record and burning with a fury and complete mass which only witnessing could only prove. All kinds of communications were rapidly broken and few details of the severity of the tremendous forest fire were available. Terrific hot winds like that of the "Death Valley" of California raged in the front of the racing fire oceans, and throughout these sections it was not known how many escapes and reports of property damage was meager.

The bigger city of Angelina the birthplace of some of the Virgin Girl Princesses, and the Royal Department town of the same city but some distance off including the main line tracks of the Abilene, Bonanza, and Calvernia railroad across Lake Angelina and Angelina Bay were isolated. The smoke in that a locality put the inhabitants in night of terrific volcanic eruptions and it hung over the city or sky as black as ink shedding strange darkness like West. Westerners and elsewhere are observe during the approach of a tornado. Weather and all other Bureau officials at Angelina Richee city ten miles from Angelina believed the worst fire storm struck in the vicinity of Angelina City for every hours thousands of refugees from there were arriving on freight trains frightened, distressed, and with serious sickness caused by partial suffocation by smoke. Two hundred were also brought in overcast by heat which in that city temperatures raged from 110 in some places to 170 in others.

The wind there had unroofed buildings though the reports of the city burning was not yet verified.
Angelina Richee was near the terrific conflagration probably facing its edge near fire number two, and there the Mayor reported hot winds as high as seventy miles infringing squalls but so far no smoke. Some damage had been done to trail buildings, and the majority of the people fled to ice houses, and ice cream companies to escape the heat, while other were hastily leaving on trains.

Meanwhile the other enormous fire storm apparently was striking deeper into other sections of the forested parts of southern Calvernia, and all rangers and signal stations and bureau bureau observers and ranger signal stations warned the inhabitants of hundreds of small towns that unless the course of the fire changed the conflagration probably would consume them sooner or later and that the inhabitants might as well flee while they have time to save their household goods. Throughout the whole of Calvernia even as far north as cold Abyssinville the series of tremendous forest fire was causing unreasonable high temperatures, and Calvernia city reported 98 in the shade when at this time of the year she being so far north and usually has her highest as far as fifty five.

It was said nearest to the Angelina border about seventy seven small towns had been consumed by the forest fires and about two hundred and fifty six of the refugees had been killed by being overcome by heat, overtaken or trapped in fire or by falling trees as the result of the fury of the forest fire on the 5th. Other towns though burned have reported no loss of life while communications with them and many others and even those not in its path is still lacking and might be when all check is taken up the final death list might turn out to be frightful. In this location to make matters worse more than 2,345,666 of the population have been rendered homeless, and about 11,000,000 more live in rural sections from which it may be weeks, and weeks before any accurate reports are received.

The governor of Calvernia estimated that half the population of those parts of Calvernia was already homeless, and from witnesses who fought their way to Angelina Agathia over almost wreckage obliterated roads it was learned that thousands faced famine. Declaring the awful situation is so terrible as to demand instant action, groups of authorities of various towns begged the governor to impose martial law throughout the region requisition all food and supplies and draft all able bodied men for forest fire fighting. And the signers pledged that whether their suggestions were adopted in whole or in part they were ready to devote their full resources and resources to all co-operation with the Governor and the National Department of loyalty.

While it was still impossible to form any accurate estimate of further property damage as the fires raged on it was feared by many that by now it would exceed or over a five hundred million dollars. The authorities have acted swiftly to check all dangers rising from other sources perils which from some regions have doubled. The governor had issued an order for all standing armies to augment the rangers and forest police to protect the regions and to aid any place necessary in fire fighting should the conflagration come that way. While the proper damage indeed in Lucille Richee city was immense the city suffered a very small loss of life as compared with smaller settlements and towns. A part of Lucille Richee city was visited by small flood as well as by hot hurricane winds and fire. Mount De Biff who had reached Lucille Richee on the night before the fire reached the city said ten bodies had been recovered there and the search was not completed because of the fire and the flight of the city's population. An American who required sixty hours to cover the fifty five miles from Lucille Richee said thousands of houses had been burned away.

Sixteen persons were killed during flight, and thirty injured by the hurricane of fire in the Virgin Junction town and the damage though the town did not totally burn was estimated at one million five hundred thousand dollars. Outside assistance was needed to restore homes and buildings destroyed by the wind and fire. After the passage of the fire the city was partly flooded which in some measure prevented the worst fire from striking here.

At this time another terrific forest fire was raging along the boundary line within a radius of sixty miles between Junction-Wren-town (Calvernia) and Vivianville city.

The severest part of the forest fire was at or in the vicinity of Girkinool Junction where a wind velocity of 100 miles an hour was reported preceding the advance of a terrible sea of fire before communications was interrupted. As the fires disabling and cutting telegraphic and telephone communication, the fire appeared to have done little or no damage to buildings and cities along the boundary here or at least yet did not come within reach and no loss of life among thousands of rangers fighting the fire there had been reported even late that following night.

Only minor damage of the strong winds was reported at Vivianville city in telegraph messages received at Angelina Agathia while at her neighboring city of Prussia a velocity of ninety miles an hour was reached by the wind for about twenty miles but reports of property damage or of the movement of the fire here was not to be obtained as yet. Telegraph operators at Gertrude Junction reported to railroad offices near here that the forest fire and its preceding hurricane had ransacked that place, and that the roof of the building which housed the instruments had been blown away and the buildings facing the direction of the advancing "RED PLAGUE" were burning in whole blocks at a time, and the inhabitants were fleeing in the wildest panic. While messages were being transmitted to this city the lines melted down and no further reports were to be obtained. Yet some definite word was received at Dorothy Gale city at 7:45 A.M. the next morning of the 7th of September by the Associated Press from Amelia nearly eighty miles west of there, that the forest fire was hitting that city that morning like a hurricane and fire storm combined, unroofing large numbers of houses, putting lighting system out of order, and setting whole blocks of houses on fire. The people jammed the streets in confusion, and railroad stations were crowded, while women screamed and children cried. James Hume the chief operator of telephones at Amelia said the heart of the forest fire had apparently passed to the north of that city but that nevertheless it did not, and was not saving the city. It was impossible to tell how far to the north, as all communication in that district had been cut off about six A.M.

As far as we know no one in Amelia town had been injured or burned though, 1000 were prostrated by the heat, many lost their clothing, and those in flight had to seek their clothing to keep them from catching fire. Everywhere in that region great apprehensions were felt as to the extent of the damage that might have been wrought to scores of towns farther north west, and east, as well as Angelina Junction where the conflagration was heading, and Angelina station, where an unconfirmed report said the forest fire hit the main U.S. Government forest was about sixty miles south of Amelia and that there was hope the night we escape.

At 10 A.M. that morning trains were dispatched from Angelina Agathia toward all areas now where the fire storm was reported to have struck in all its fury and where the flames were raging like the Hells ocean of fire. All Rangers and either were preparing to locate other lines of fire or fighting the flames were instructed by authorities of all kinds to advise all signal stations and telegraph offices still in operation immediately as to conditions along the boundary line. Upon the basis of their report will be determined how many citizens from cities will be drafted to be sent to combat the flames, these being nearly four millions now as reported, and even they were unable to stay the wild conflagration. From the general movement of the forest fire, to check them by counter fire, and breaching seemed impossible, and the best means generally was to try to turn the flames off from towns and villages or warn the inhabitants timely enough to allow them to get away with some of their household goods.

Another report received later that day at the Angelina Agathia Forest fire investigation bureau said an estimated velocity of wind of one hundred miles an hour was reported at North Bend north of the former city, and that a "Wall of fire" was bearing down on the town and twenty others in the neighborhood and all efforts of Rangers to stop or turn off the flames from their course was unavailing and that ten perished while retreating.

So far as can be recorded from meager reports Gertrude Angelina damage was confined to blown down signs, and broken win down of stores and houses, and some wrecking of frail buildings, but it was believed the main sea of fire had changed its course and was not reaching the city though half the main population had fled to that part by street car, wagon and other vehicles to fight back the flames if necessary aided by all the fire department of the city and neighboring towns not in the path of the scourge.

At Gertrude Angelina city a large wooden barn belonging to one of the Gemini Headquarter buildings were reported destroyed by the wind, but otherwise as reports had said no distress calls had been given out.

The wind here was still blowing forty miles an hour having come down considerably but the temperature was still up to the limit the reading at that hour being about 118 in the shade at the Weather Bureau though street thermometers reported higher readings.

Electric power had been off and on intermittently. Yet the population of many other towns north of Gertrude Angelina City had largely evacuated through fear of the fire storm, and persons from those towns were arriving at Gertrude Angelina city, and roadways and highways between that city was like a "one way" street, for two days with crowds of people speeding to better sections or to the city.

It was feared however that Harbucien was threatened by "inundation" from fire and a sixty five mile an hour wind was reported there, with the population almost stifled by heat and smoke fleeing to ravine lakes and large streams with little time to take their belongings, while by the men took hastily organized groups by hundreds were laboring like mad demons trying to escape their awful home in their efforts to hold back flooding fires from the general sea of conflagration by breaching and ditching and struggling to beat out ground and other secondary fires. Yet all this effort was unavailing and they were steadily being beaten back. On the 14th cities of Allgrove and Glendale found themselves in a wild center of an eastward moving hurricane of fire at the same that was dealing out extensive damage before wire communications and public and other utilities failed. And with reports of the movement toward Central North Angelina State of the enormous fire hurricane which during the last seven days out a path of death and immeasurable destruction throughout good sections of southern California, the Angelina Red Cross on the days of the news mobilized a force of workers at Gloriana city near the Arroyo San Juan ready to render all help possible and assistance in the event the fire storm would spread through the great Northern Angelina States forests. Henry Dorgu vice chairman of the Angelina Red Cross and other Christian and Charitable branches branches as well as all Religious Catholic Organizations of rescue and relief, also telegraphed all disaster workers, every country of Angelina and Angelina vine state took led in the probable sweep of the forest fire to stand by ready to give assistance if needed, and sent in warnings to all men incentives and towns not entering armies to fight the enemy to assemble in bodies and go out to aid the others to fight the fires, and the penalty not to do so would be the utter ruins of their homes and valuables. This received a great response indeed. The nature of these forest fires indeed was stirring up the nation and men felt folk from hundreds of towns, and scores of cities, old or not, young boys of sixteen years even and so on were flocking to trains still running at stations for the purpose to join forces with the aid already desperately pressed forest fire fighters. Nearly seven million were going on their way to combat this great "Red Scourge" of the forest.

Near Angelina Hiccho there formed a vast army of ruthless and fearless men, whose leaders over their maps and charts planned resistance superhuman to forest fires advancing on the town. "The forest fire MUST" be turned aside from its course. The contents is given, not from the open file the veterans of many a long battle against fires of this sort, thousands upon thousands of them, rangers, city citizens from towns and villages and forest police and as they go each to his duty, they hope victory against the fire demon. Before the unburned sections of the forest is drawn a vast army in battle array.

Obscure silence that harbinger of disaster however reigns. The long lines of waiting men, armed with axes, crosscut saws, and with explosives source seem to breathe. James the sounds of hoofs. Before his army rides the bold, the daring head of all rangers, George, a gaunt hand is raised. Yet deeper settles the silence. The forest fire MUST but turned off its course. It is the word of the government. No more. And now sounds to the vaults of high heaven the mighty roar of armed multitudes in such combat. The deep reverberations of falling trees, the sound of axes, the snapping of many saw, the roar of explosives, the shouts of men as saw or axe finally cuts through the trees, the moans of the rising wind, and the prayers for success—all all united, and one great ocean of sound seem to proclaim to the world and its Creator that the Red Beast of war that was ravaging the lands forests would finally be checked here.

Fifty thousand at work. Five thousand towns lost in fifteen minutes and hailed away by hundreds of horses. There must be VICTORY.

HA. The forest fire leaps the breach. Victory indeed for forest fire. A great victory this, for the conflagration.

At the far end of the city there stood a Convent, silent witness to the violent combat against the "RED PLAGUE", very one in the city is fleeing. Within the Convent the sisters prepare for flight one taking care that the Noides of Noides do not be left behind. She cannot find the key to the Tabernacle. To the front door of the Convent rides the leading forest ranger. Ruin and desolation seems to follow him far behind as if it is his bodyguard, death riding toward him and the whole town with the wind. Moon in the city there will remain little unscathed by the flames.

"Hurry sisters every one of you, for even now the angry sea of flames leap fiercely across the branches we have made to vainly stop it. Make haste and flee, for naught escapes the fires wrath not even this holy place."

They are all on their way except the superior who could not find the key. She prayed desperately that she would find it. The Ranger is in the building looking to warn others which maybe there still. And as he saw the sister looking for the key he cried—

"Would you wish to pay for thy folly with thy life. Why search for key now. The time for flight is short, if thy will keep thy skin whole, break it open and get away with the Holy of Holies in haste."

She made attempts to do so with a file and finally succeeded. And now closer and closer and ever closer sounds the roar and crackling of flames, and their light flames high in a blood red sky. She leaves the building, and the Ranger hastens her off. The fire is on the town.

On the 9th of September it seemed evident that the southern country of California was in danger of becoming a desert of raging fires, on account of the vast stretches of forests which fell victims to the terrible plagues of the ravaging fires then raging. All leading rangers, who also had been out in the heat of it seeing that all efforts on their part and the part of their men was in vain had recourse to the most powerful of all protectors, Our Blessed Lady

The Virgin Most Powerful, and Most Merciful. One of these rangers gave orders that a picture of the Blessed Mother of God, along with the Sacred Heart of Jesus, should be carried in a general procession of all the clergy and laity of the endangered town of Angelina Junction as far as Gertrude Angelina city. The violence with which the fire plague was raging may be judged by the fact for this story at least that even during the procession eighty small towns and quite a distance apart from each other perished before the flames with their inhabitants fleeing before it. The procession seemed or did have effect for Angelina Junction city was saved for from the mouth of the near ending of the procession the fire nearest the city changed in its course, and danger to the city ceased. Angelina Rescue too was only partly burned even though severely damaged. This occurrence therefore could remind the reader that for real, that the Virgin Most Merciful and loving will do anything for those who trust in Her, who in this story could have and did have response to the prayers of the procession by gaining the request of Her Devine son to stay the fire from these two cities. At the end of the procession every one sang:

"Agnus Dei, Iustare, Alleluia, quia quoniam meruisti portare, Alleluia, reuerenti sicut dixit, Alleluia. Then came for ending "Ora pro nobis Domine, Alleluia."

To make matters thrilling for this story of the greatest forest fire disaster of far, the reader may as well know small probabilities that before this as mentioned before various portions of the beautiful holy country of Calaveras had at different times throughout late 1872 and 1873 suffered most severely by the enemy made disasters, of floods fire and explosion, worse than the worse effects of the influences of worse tornadoes, cyclones, hurricanes, Abbeismian seas Typhoons earthquakes and so on worse disasters of floods of which had have transcended nearly the whole of Calaveras and Angelina and Angelina Vine states combined, and to leave such deep impressions in their wake that as long as these nations if real would have existed the latest inhabitants would never forget them, even if forgiving as Christians should all be. But really is Abbeismian supposed to forgive this? The question rest with Our Dear and Blessed Lord alone. I will describe no best as possible one of the forest rangers who witnessed the passage of a terrific wing of the conflagration that he said and his men were worried by and it is the same old friend Fred Golden.

"He says-

Having recovered slightly from my injuries received when hurled into the river by the tree, and therefore having witnessed one of the most awful scenes of the "Red Plague" in all its fury and grandeur, I will attempt to describe it.

The realization of that most astonishing revolution of the airy element that preceded the terrific fire ocean even now gave me the most disagreeable sensation that I feel as if about to plunge into the very fiery furnace of the Devil's house itself.

Having failed to save the little city of Merced Junction, I and my thousands of men had left the region by making a short cut beyond the fire by means of all being on six wagons drawn by alert and quick running horses. We were going along on the banks of the same river now swamped by dead fishes. The weather because of the conflagration was terribly scorching hot, and I thought twenty per cent hotter than any heat felt on the hottest desert of the world of which I myself once crossed when touring the world for adventure, and that is not the Sahara either. The smoke was still so heavy that it remained quite dark though there were some clear patches of sky between, making the heavy banks of smoke look like those terrible typhoon clouds that moved in during the approach of one of those cyclones along the coast every now and then from the Mic-Whirlthim Seas. My horse pulling the wagon in which I rode in was galloping quietly along and my thoughts were therefore entirely engaged in what all this sea of fire raging in scattered parts of the nation was going to result in, in the end. To get out of the path of this fire ocean I had my men reach and forded a little stretch of Sunbeam Creek and was on the eve of entering a track of large thickly forested bottom land or valley that lay between it and Delight Creek when suddenly I noticed a great difference in the aspects of the heavens.

A heavy thickness had also overpassed the woods before me, and a slight breeze of wind was rising, and I for some time expected we were still in the path of the fire but my horse showed no inclination to fear or prepare for such a danger. I had I nearly arrived at the verge of the valley on a road bed, when I thought fit to stop near a brook bridge to observe what was up. I listened and heard a distant crackling and murmuring sound of the most strange nature. It made me think of the approach of one of those well known Typhoons and therefore I looked toward the direction of the fire peril, when I observed an unusual blackness overhead and along the horizon but very close a long stretch of reddish flares of which was quite new to me, and advancing like the wind. I calculated we were not in the path of it, but I nevertheless sent all of my force forward to fight it to prevent it from changing course toward me as a town lay not far away from which sound I knew the inhabitants were retreating in panic.

About half an hour's time was left for me to consider however, then the next moment the taller stretches of trees far off but within easy sight which was agitated by a strong breeze suddenly became huge roaring crackling tree torches.

The flames suddenly increased to an unexpected sea burning forward a hundred trees per second it seemed, and millions of smaller branches and twigs flared up and fell toward the ground in fiery showers or flew in the air before the glare then beginning. Two minutes passed, and the whole forest before me was in fearful fiery array. Here and there one tree burned partly through in falling partly pressed against the other, producing a creaking noise similar to that occasioned by violent gusts which sometimes sweep the country, and tossed by a terrific hurricane of wind the flames were in fearful motion. They funneled, and waved like the billows of the sea, and stretched upward, and formed long and thick streamers apparently so high as to reach the clouds.

I was greatly astonished to see large stretches of the noblest trees of this forest valley change their heads into thousands of torches into one, and also while burning were falling in pieces. The flames roared up making a crackling hissing noise, burning through entirely the upper masses of the trunks, and in many cases whole forests of big trees of gigantic size almost burned through heat that sweated the daylight out of me from where I stood a quarter of a mile away. Fortunately for me the wind did not blow toward me or otherwise I would have been scorched before the fire reached me.

The progress of the forest fire was as rapid as a hurricane, and was now burning past the place opposite where I stood, and where my men were at work to keep it from spreading any way.

Who could forget the scene presenting itself at this moment. All the seas of flame were moving in the strangest manner, as if they were in the central current of a terrific tempest, and the flames were so thick now they obscured all the trees from view. Thousands of the largest trees of all were seen bending when they would reveal themselves when half burned through, others suddenly snapped across and fell among the flaming seas below with the upper part still standing but blazing with the rest. Sometimes the wind carried a mass of burning twigs and foliage that completely obscured the view like a thick rushing and scolding fire cloud.

When the worse of the fire tempest passed it disclosed a unbelievable wide scene panorama filled with fallen blazing trees, and heaps of burning shapeless ruins which marked the path of the devastation forest fire. Dense smoke now rose like volcanic clouds from the smoldering everything now and then. This space was as large as the naked eye could distance, and to my mind imagination resembled a huge valley turned into a smoking volcanic crater with the part of my section unexposed, the burning part with its erupting clouds of smoke, its thousands of flaring fissures through the smoke, and long lakes of white hot lava inclined or forced in various degrees. Even from where I stood the heat was terrific and my men were retreating before it and the blinding smoke. The horrible noise resembled that of a great tornado in passing and as it howled along in the huge track of the devastating fire tempest, it produced a feeling in my mind, which one feels after he dreams he had been for a short space of time in the bottomless pit.

The principal fury of this passage of the forest fire was now over although the valley seemed the volcano crater as I said before. Strangely the sky had now despite the continued but gradually breaking darkness a strange greenish light and the extremely disagreeable odor of the smoke almost overcame us. The millions of twigs and small branches far ahead of the almost advancing wall of fire were soon following it somewhat in front as if drawn onward before the conflagration by some mysterious power. They appeared apparently to be floating in the air for some hours after in the far distance as if supported by the long walls of thickly massed fire that rose high above the far distant forest. Having sustained no injury, and my men having been successful in preventing it from spreading toward us I waited in amazement and wonder until at length nature resumed somewhat her usual aspect. For some moments I felt undetermined whether I and my followers should try to catch trains and get a long distance ahead of the same fire to try one more to head it off, or attempt to make a country fire if the wind was favorable for me before we reached any spot favorable for our purpose, we decided to do so but dangerous difficulties. Some of my followers were encountered innumerable and had across a portion of the forest fire before rejoicing and rejoicing scorched and smoke blinded."

Many wonderful accounts of the devastating effects of this hurricane of fire were circulated in the country and during its occurrence and much damage was done by the awful visitation. One other valley thickly overgrown with briars bushes, woods and bushes thickly entangled among the tops and trunks of storm tossed fallen trees and a valley which too was thickly wooded was also swept its entire length by the Red Scourge, and the fire here was sure to sweep and leaped higher than the hill tops on each side. The fire continued to burn and on despite all efforts of every fighter to stop it. One large force of rangers made a fire clearing at a distance of forty miles from the line of advance, and again another clearing fourteen miles further off, but to no avail.

Lastly they tried to check its ravages on the summit of a mountain connected with the great serpentine forest of Northern Anglinia state, forty miles beyond the other clearings made. At this point the vain battle against the advancing fire will be given in a thrilling detail.

Toward three o'clock in the afternoon a fresh wind blew down the river near the heights of Heidi Junction. Two red lanterns were raised into the utmost top of the highest trees. It was the appointed signal, and some boat loads of men coasted off and fell down the river with the current, while those men of lighter foot and carrying a mass of crosscut saws and planing shovels and picks, started landing the blisters up the slopes. It was here a terrific battle with Mr. Fire Demon was to start. A Captain better with the rest of the fellows had orders to follow on the right. Just then the forest fire was sixty miles away. For full two hours the process of boats borne on the current steered silently down the Mis-Hollister Run. The sky was darkened still with heavy rolling clouds of smoke and in the west it was more darker than a thundercloud. The general landing forest ranger was in one of the foremost boats, and near him was a young foreigner, from Canada. He told many of his friends afterwards a full description of the intense strain of the conflict which was of no avail.

As they slowly but surely neared their destination they headed in toward the hill shore, and the mighty slope of the ridge and forest towered in the twilight darkness on their left. It was in the full path of the fire, and the heart of it too. The dead silence was suddenly broken by a wall of another forest ranger on shore invisible in the thick smoky gloom.

"Best loads of rangers and citizens," answered a captain of Hollister men from one of the boats of the blasting crews. He had served in the force of rangers for years and knew the signals. The men expecting the force of rangers was satisfied and shouted directions as how to proceed. Soon after the foremost boats were passing the smoke covered heights of Holy Uress Hill, when another Ranger shouted a warning, and they could see him through the darkness running down to the edge of the water, within pistol shot range. In answer to the question of the captain this time a white man told him the fire was moving upon the ridges on flank front and rear. Yet they passed on and in a moment they found themselves on the headland above the St. Moran. There was no ranger there. Where they disembarked as directed near a narrow strand at the foot of the sloping heights as steep as a hill covered with trees and half-way four leaders led the way climbing with as much speed as possible, closely followed by a much larger body of men. These were the blisters and they carried the explosives in sacks. When they reached the top they saw in the dim light a cluster of houses at a short distance, and the foremost men immediately made a dash for them, pounding on the doors or windows and shouting to the occupants.

"We'll have to save this hill in a hurry. Forest fire coming!"
The men within taken by surprise, got their women and children together and with house hold goods that could be carried off and then off to some safe spot while they too started behind to join ranks with the fighters.
The main body of forest fire fighting troops waited in the rear of their boats by the strand. The heights sloping upward gradually was near by gradually skirted by a great ravine choked with forest trees, and in its depth ran a little brook which fell splashing in the stillness over a rock. Other than this no sound could reach the strained ears of the leaders but the murmur of breeze in the high tree tops and the climbing of their advanced parties as they mounted the steep steps at some little distance from where they stood listening for sound of the approaching fire hurricane. At length from the top came sounds of mistle shots and the swinging back and forth of red lights, followed by shouts, and a they knew that the men had discovered the army like advance of the conflagration.

The word was given, the troops of rangers leaped from the boats, and quickly and silently scaled the heights, some here, some there, clutching at trees, and bushes their muskets slung at their backs, which they needed to use for sounding in case they or any of their members got trapped. One slanting path on the face of the precipitous heights had been made impassable by briars and thorns but all obstructions were soon cleared away with axes and blows of rifle butts, and then the ascent was easy.

In the dark murk of the smoky afternoon the long files of rangers aimed with the weapons necessary for the work moved quickly upward, and formed in order on the forested plateau above.

Before many of them had finally reached the top, explosions were heard close on the left. It was the men already at their blasting of trees. Another party was sent to help them, and this was soon effected.
The evening now broke in heavier clouds of smoke and the fire was nearer. Jack Glora's men were drawn up along the crest of the heights. No others supposed to come and help them was in sight, though a body of Galverinians had sailed from a town below and moved along the strand toward the landing place, when they went quickly at work chopping and sawing down trees to clear the ravine as much as possible to make it a safe retreat in case the fire fighters were worsted. The main leading forest Ranger Vigan Warner had achieved the most critical part of this enterprise, and yet the hoped for success he desired so strongly placed him and all his followers in grave danger. On one side of him but far away was a long huge rolling wall of smoke like a hundred volcanoes in violent eruption, and the large sea of flames moving forward like an express train was on the other. Warner's alternative was therefore victory or ruin, for he if he should be over-whelmed by a smothered attack of the forest fire retreat to even the ravine would be some places partly or entirely obscured by tremendously rolling walls of dense smoke being so huge that though so far away they seemed less than half a mile but nevertheless it would be safe to say that hesitation or doubt had no place in them, while facing this dangerous situation.

He went to reconnoiter the ground, and soon came to the large plateaus of the mountain top called St. Johns Hill plains. These small mountain top plains were a thickly forested tract of ground trees nearly as thick as if they were huge grass, intolerably thick in most parts, added here and there with him huge fire crowding the valley below would ascend this ridge. On the north it was bounded by the thickly forested declivities along the Mis-Hollister Run, on the northwest and south by those of the far distant Mis-Whirther Run through which that huge stream crawled like a writhing snake. All this panorama was in the path of the huge conflagration and here it would surely cross the Mis-Whirther Run if not checked.

Whether the troops of rangers now advanced marched by long files until they reached the ground, and then wheeled to form their battleline, which stretched across the whole summit. It consisted of the dynamiters, and the detached saw crews from a few towns, all drawn up in line. The right wing was near the bring of the heights along the huge Mis-Hollister Run, but the left could not reach those along the other plain. On this side a long space was left open and there was danger of being outflanked by the fire. To prevent this dynamiters and saw men were stationed here drawn up at left angles with the rest and fronting the direction of the Mis-Whirther Run. Many others under Ned formed the reserve rangers, another force was left to help clear the ravine, and Warner's lighter armed men were to make a clearing in the woods to the rear. The three chief work was to fail, and which when all rangers and citizens arrived numbered less than thirty five thousand men.

A town called Andrea was not a mile distant but they could not see it for a ridge of broken ground intervened about six hundred paces off. But couriers were sent nevertheless to warn the inhabitants and to get the men folk to join in the battle. The first division of Rangers had scarcely come up when about seven o'clock of general forest fire fighters of Glen Gerardo Junction arrived just at this moment from its camp not far from the Mis-Whirther Run, somewhere there was already the sound of hot and swift work in the rear. The workers were starting the formation of the clearing there. Light squalls of hot sultry wind blew at intervals, tormenting the troops as they stood patiently waiting the event. On account of the situation Warner some time before had passed a troubled night. Through all the evening, signal alarms had bellowed from the headquarters, and lights had flashed. His men had been preparing for the enterprise all day and before while he waited the field that adjoined his little mountain mountain headquarters till two in the morning, and he was in great agitation and took no rest all night. Now he was preparing for a terrific effort against the fire. He sent a ranger to the town to warn all the inhabitants of the fire. He sent, and to all flee to the prepared opening in the huge ravine should anything unusual happen. Then he rode to the left with a follower. As they advanced amid the sound of scores of explosions per minute and the smoke the country behind the town slightly opened into a small clearing till at length when opposite a small house on the summit they saw a r across the Mis-Whirther Run some good many miles away, the high red seas or walls of the advancing flames moving over and above the heights beyond and through a long valley like a conflagration preparing to burn all the country in a few hours.

"This is serious business," said Warner, and sent off one of his followers at full gallop to bring up the troops from the center and left of the waiting line. Those of the right were at work already. Then Warner set spurs to his horse, and rode fixed look however uttering not a word.
Half of his men were already at work, while the rest followed him in such order as it might in hot haste pressing on in headlong march, troops of men with axes picks and shovels shovels and sacks of explosives, a savage glitter of battle in their eyes, bands of men with wet blankets and sacks, whose all was at stake, in country side and house, the forest fire regulars, and the aboriginal warriors a torrent of white uniformed men it seemed. So they swept on poured among the woods ready to work hurrying breathless, to where the work was to begin.
Warner himself was amazed at what he saw. He had expected only a partial of a main fire line, and he found an advancing ocean. Full in sight before him, stretched the line of fighters, the scattering ranks of the rangers, and the wild array of the leaping rushing seas of fire, moving forward here and there in huge waves, huge valleys of fire, mountain sides smoking like infernos, and the preceding fire hurricanes screaming defiance. It appeared as if the whole world was burning, that the Last Judgment had come.

The other rangers had not yet come, and Horner waited long for these rangers he had ordered to join him. He waited in vain. It was said that the headquarters had detained them. Lost the forest fire should reach the Mic-Whirther Main region. Even if the flames did so and succeeded in crossing the stream to the forests of the other side the rangers might defy them could they but stem its course up the hills of the Holy Cross Ridge. No sign. Neither could the rangers of Wallace troops come to the aid of Horner. He sent to Ramseygorius their commander for twenty five sacks of expl. explosives. Ramseygorius could give him only three or four, saying that he needed them for the forested region near the town of St. Charles which were in the path of the fire and from which the inhabitants were fleeing. There were therefore orders and counter orders, misanderstandings, haste delays, and perplexity.

Therefore Horner and his staff forest rangers held a short council. It was positive that he and they were for immediate work with all the men but some of the rangers later said that he was afraid that the fire might arrive and take the ridge on his rear. A town of also Murgun de was but a few miles distant, and some of the rangers there preparing for fight were much nearer, a messenger sent by courier could have reached them in an hour and a half at most and a combined attack in front and rear of these forests might have been concerted with him. Nevertheless if moreover Horner could have come to a junction with his leading men his own force might have been strengthened by thirteen of his additional thirteen thousands of additional men, but he felt there was no time to lose, for he felt sure the fire would rush the ridge, was was sure to happen.

He averted afterwards had been blamed not for fighting the fire so alone but for fighting at all. But in this he could not choose. Fight he must, for the fires was advancing in waves and sections to cut off all his escape and the ravine was the only avenue of escape left open to him. His men were full of ardor, and he resolved to strive in the effort before the fire came too close or before their ardor cooled.

The others waited the result of the blasting with a composure, which if not quite unusual, was at least well reasoned. The three lines of men sent elsewhere plied their axes to the trees before them, and fifteen hundred Calverinians and others worked in front and flank. Over all these sections of the forest, from behind and before trees puffs of white smoke sprang almost incessantly from the explosions of dynamite used to bring down the trees. Lines men with ropes were thrown out before the blasters to pull down trees not fallen altogether. The work was liveliest on the right where bands of men with every tool got under the edges of the decidivity, among thickets, and trees cutting every brush away with long scythes and knives where they succeeded in starting a good sized clearing. Once in a while men would be forced to run this way or that to avoid the trees as they crashed to the ground. The men with blasters were also called up from the rear to fight ground fires should they start from the heat of the big blazes. Horner himself was everywhere. And how cool he was, and why his followers loved him can be shown by an incident that happened in the course of the desperate work. One of his rangers was injured by a falling tree, and on recovering on consciousness he saw the ranger leader standing by his side. Horner pressed his hand told him not to despair, praised his work and promised him early promotion.

It was toward ten o'clock in the evening, when from the high ground on the right of the line which had now been comparatively cleared of trees, Horner saw that the crisis was near. Before or because of the near approach of the fire the fire rangers had now had been compelled to form themselves into three long lines. Two third pieces which had been dragged up the heights were also used to fire on the trees. The ranks of the fire fighters were ill ordered at most and were further confused by a number of trees which were falling in two directions at once, and which hurled a few of the rangers on the ground but did not injure them. The others moved forward rapidly to cut down the other trees making the clearing still wider, uttering loud shouts as success seemed to be coming for them in their desperate work, and helping others also at the work as soon as they came up with them. The Calverinians in their own labor had advanced a few rods, but now were confronted by a more thick thicker mass of trees. At this moment the dynamites having placed their explosives at many a tree a terrific crash as frequently as musketry discharges rang out all along the line and down came nearly a thousand trees at once with a great crash and thundering roar. This certainly was done with remarkable precision and the simultaneously explosions had sounded almost like one. Not long after another valley of crashed followed, and then a furious clattering roar that lasted but a minute or two, and down came many a tree bringing others down with them. Then the others with axes would rush among these fallen trees and work feverishly in cutting off the branches as best as they could. A great sight so far was now revealed, the ground ground covered with multitudes of fallen branchless trees, while other workers seeing the near advance of the flames turned more frantically to their work, shouting and even swearing and cursing at the enemy in the meantime but of course not using sinful words. Some of the masses of workers stepped short at a high wall of brush and briars and started to work at these with long scythes, while some of the others pushed forward with the spade and pick to tear up infl. inflammable roots, some advanced cutting down weeds and covering them with dirt. They seemed to be keen and as swift as blood hounds in their work, and hoping and believing that success was near the men started their cheers. At the other portion of the line though the clearing was also greatly progressed, the desperate and fast work was still kept up, chiefly it was by men with crosscut saws, and axes, and those cutting down high bushes, weeds, and other forest through that was very inflammable which would burn like gasoline. W. H. H.

Here Horner himself led the work, at the head of the dynamiters. A explosion shattered one tree and it fell, a branch hitting him on the wrist. He urged on the work, and kept on, another tree fell, and still he urged them on, when a third tree falling hit him with a big branch, and sat him on the ground. He staggered to his feet. A moment after one of the rangers cried out:

"The fire is coming. See how it comes."

"How far is it yet," Horner demanded.

"About thirteen miles sir. The forested slopes and valley before us is now burning everywhere."

"Did it come so near so quick," he demanded. "Go one of you to James Warden, tell him to march all his men down to Mic-Whirther Run to cut off the fire from the stream if possible. Make a breach so that it will be too wide to strike across even if it succeeds in crossing the river." He felt kind of faint hearted for he could not believe his effort would be a success. The fire was coming too fast, and was simply enormous.

The fire appeared in full fury before the fire fighters. On a previous occasion when hard prepressed the forest rangers had made their stand successfully from another point of advantage. Horner had resolved to to check the fire from moving upon the ridge. Horner had not more than one thousand three hundred and sixty men as dynamiters, yet some of his men advised him that the fire if it came straight ahead would make the whole ridge untenable, but he resolved to stand it out perilous as it was as James Warden had strongly advised him to do so and promised to reach him soon with the bulk of the army of fire fighters coming from Mic-Whirther Run. Nevertheless knowing that all depended on holding out till the rest should come up, he did not wait for the fires approach to test the broadness but pressed the work with more vigor, thus successfully making the breach larger and larger nearly by this time clearing the summit of the trees. Some of the rangers had brought even artillery and shot for the purpose, and had planted the artillery for the purpose to leveling trees more quicker, and before them and the axes, saws and dynamiters the summit forest was slowly crumbling like pastry. The work had continued for five hours, the whole of the stretch of summit forest on the right near the ravine ravine on the south side being invaded. The battle in the main was now coming. Two hours more of hard work passed, and the north slope of the forest ed side was being assaulted by the waves of fire. The working parties claimed they saw four miles of trees in stretches go up into a wall of flames almost simultaneously, moving forward as a storming party, heading by three hundred smaller van guard fires. To face this horner had barely the very survivors of his thirteen hundred men or thirteen thousand which ever it be, for the majority of them exhausted almost to prostration after so many hours of constant hard work had been forced to retire. In the breach two hundred remaining trees had been cleared off having fell to rise no more. The remainder of the rangers aided by citizens, still working fiercely fell back inch by inch before the terrifically growing heat of the approaching scourge toward the ravine, their only hope, as Horner saw from his elevation the fire was assaulting three sides of the ridge he was on with his men. They were hard pressed by a terrible sea of rapidly advancing fire, which swept up the slope like a typhoon of fire. From whence, and a furious rush was made to get over to the ravine along with if the fire it would also therefore sweep the remaining forests of the ravine, and in this event, of course all would be lost.

The Rangers knew the fact well. Then turning themselves at bay at the ravine edge they opened themselves like an impenetrable wall of the mass of other trees before them, while above the din of explosions the rasping of axes and the thudding of axes, and the crashing fall of trees and the shouts of the workers and the exclamations of many others fiercely beating out small ground fires starting could be heard sounds in the front and rear, that no Horner's ear needed no explanation--the fire was striving furiously to cross the branches, frantically with flaming embers flying in all directions. It was if a cyclone of fire and fire had come at the same time. It was a terrible scene, the whole slope being "Heavens the fire cannot be checked. It is crossing the breach." one of the leaders shouted wildly. "On on into the ravine clearing every one of you. It'll be a desperate fight for a few moments now."

Flinging themselves in hundreds on the trees before them on the ravine slopes the stormers cleared the way as quickly as labor would allow, freely it seemed giving men for man, life for life, ay four for one in this desperate work. They were bound to prevent the fire from getting too extensive in the ravine. There Horner too and his companions worked furiously, many wielding pick, spade and crowbar, dynamite and saws and axes like furies. Soon a low rumbling noise was heard followed by a crash, and a shout of triumph broke from Horner's men, and a yell of confusion from some others as falling trees barely missed them.

A portion only a portion of the new forest had been cut away in the ravine to make the breach there wider, yet the ravine was still passable for the flames when they should reach it. Again a wild eager shout from Horner. On now, on now at the work harder my lads. The work progressed, the fire roared nearer and hotter and smoke swept into the glen of the ravine. Suddenly a cry from some of the workers in the rear:

"Into the clearing of the ravine men, hurry every one for your lives."

Looking to see why the cry they saw the fire had leaped the broadness and a wall of flame was rushing toward the edge of the ravine and swarming around it also. The brave bands turned from their work, as they saw this scene, and as the last of the trees they cut through were tottering, most of them rushed with lightning speed down the slopes---but the last company it had wheeled about, even at that moment to face and keep back the ground fire---were too late. As they rushed for the ravine a mass of blazing trees heaved over with a roar right in front of them cutting off their escape almost entirely from the ravine, indeed leaving the devoted band on the brink in the midst of the quickly gathering flames which were making their clothing already smoke. There was a moment's pause and almost a wall burst from the others, but just as the fire seemed about to close upon the doomed group, they were seen to draw back space or two from the edge of the sloping chasm, throw down into the ravine their tools, then dash forward and hurl themselves rolling down a narrow part of the unexposed slope two at a time. Like a clasp of loudest thunder broke a volley of roars from a thousand trees burned through and falling almost at once, tearing the sea of flame into shattered fairy clouds. There was a minute of suspense on each side, and then a cheer rang out, of defiance, exultation victory as the brave fellows reached their comrades.

Now came the trying experience of hundreds of men as had never been seen in forest fire fighting in the world before. For three long hours it seemed that poured across the ravine and also strove furiously to descend such a storm of fire that the ravine was in dire peril, and as quickly as falling trees fell down into the ravine in their front the men dashed at them with axes and wet blankets soaked in the brook, fighting hard to beat out the flames. Above the forest even in a part of the upper slope of the ravine was a mass of flaming ruins, amongst which no one could have faced within one hundred feet so fierce was the heat. A moment the fire flanking the ravine set fire to some of the remaining woods closest to the rangers, and the blasting of trees that went on now in such desperation of the men sounded like a tremendous bombardment, until ammunition being exhausted the rangers had to resort only to axes and saws. Yet despite it all the rangers saw to their consternation, that barely a few minutes more and the ravine too would be entirely swept and they trapped. They had no more blasting materials, and it was almost certain death to show in the line of the now raging inferno of fire at the edge of the valley like ravine. Grasping their tools every man rushed from their shelter, and dashed forward to assault the trees nearest the raging flames which somewhat fortunately for them was moving slowly down the slopes. Fifteen minutes later, a peal like artillery, or a fusillade of loud musketry, and trees came down. They had gapped a cession of the woods but a number of the men had been caught under the branches and had to be rescued. When the smoke momentarily cleared away, they had been saved just before the fire reached the broken trees.

Out from other portions of the ravine dashed more rangers at seeing this success, but this time the spot was swept by a murderous sheet of fire and they were driven steadily back though they succeeded in felling eleven trees. Apparently their part of the ravine was to be saved. The fire going slow here and not hurled by wind was nevertheless working around the breach after all but the heat was terrific.

Some of the rangers were wounded, and now there came from the nearest blazing trees dangerously close to the fighters thick showers of flaming embers that felt like bullets when they hit. The officers and men scrambled from the inferno starting even in their midst, and many tree tops simultaneously blazed up like torches, and all the rangers began to make precipitately for the clearing seeing their fight to save the ravine was in vain. The ravine seemed in an instant alive with flaming trees, and to add to the horror of the moment, nearly all the falling trees fell across into the clearings, hurling flaming embers at the fleeing rangers and threatening new fires within the clearing. Two rangers caught were killed at once and buried under a seething mass of blazing tree wreckage. One bolder party went to attack the blazing trees but only three of that gallant little party escaped after most extraordinary and perilous efforts. And now the fire worked steadily around closing in on the clearing for fair. They were it appeared trapped. The clothing of the men though wet were bedraggled and torn, their faces were black like niggers, and some of them were wounded, and the blood was trickling from their feet and legs. But fortunately the fire did not sweep across the opening but many were injured before they won the battle for preservation. Afterwards it took them fourteen hours to cross the burned debris to reach the river. Some witnesses were of the opinion that the rangers had to fight their way through the smudge before they crossed it without being burned, others said they did not cross it but went a long detour out of the way of the fire after leaving the ravine. At all events they escaped with only the loss of two of their number. They reached the river beaten by the fire and begging for reinforcements decided to not give up and strive elsewhere.

A desperate plan of counter firing being decided upon. When the main body of rangers came they looked down upon a sight of forest fires the like of which no one has ever seen yet. It should be right hereafter for this story and if it happened in reality to be able to banish all traces of all these heinous crimes of war maddened glandulins, and to make her pay as dearly as possible. The poor beaten rangers were brought to the opposite shore by those who came in gray great numbers to their assistance and brought in forlorn processions back again to recuperate and rest before striving at other works planned up. Thus ends one of the best descriptions of forest fire fighting. Other fire adventures will follow later on.

WHAT WERE BE KNOWN OF FOREST FIRES, AND FLOODS.

WHAT DOUBTS AND FOREST FIRES FOR THIS STORY.
WHAT SCIENCE TELLS OF FLOODS AND FOREST FIRES IN THIS STORY.
PRINCIPAL CITIES HIT BY PROBABLE GREATEST GREATEST DISASTER OF WAR?

THE Month of September 1913 had arrived it being the First. Who in the State of California and others ever forgot the long lists of floods, fire, and other great disasters that have occurred since November 1912.

As the News had reported of the Bengal horror, or the Bengal County horror with the total destruction of Abbeville; the cities of Abbeville and scores of others swept away by record breaking flood. Population of that city perished. None recovered. Hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children, in one city alone swept to sudden death. Throughout all Northeastern California, and Northern Angelina, scenes of dire suffering, and complete suffering of whole countries, and dreadful desolation had occurred that no million volumes of a hundred million pages, can describe. Millions of most desperate and heroic efforts made to save human life. One hundred thousand sent by Government to strictly investigate cause of calamity. Many hundreds of millions of dollars worth of property swept away. Terrific explosion shakes nation. Explosion believed responsible for blast. After investigations prove the facts, explosion shocks caused bigger death list than floods. Disaster horrible, inconceivable. Glandelinia held responsible.

The whole world was in this story shocked by this appalling news. Much but in much longer detail was the other disasters repeatedly put into the news in thrilling stories from time to time of the horrible explosion disasters, at different months and places, throughout the states, followed by record breaking floods which swept away many cities and towns without warning. In the past volumes the whole story that tells of all horror, suffering and desolation that befalls all description for all books in the world to fill was already written with wonderful power and effect.

It took Glandelinia to make California, and her sister states the helpless playthings of Nature. By working all this havoc, Glandelinia could have boasted to the world in general of conquering the southern Abbeville states, enjoying the shivering of the earth caused by great eruption like explosions, and taking wicked enjoyment as she viewed cities collapse like a child's house of cards, and great loss of life. But wicked Glandelinia, thinking she has mastered these states, but the fates takes the side of the Christians, and contradicts her. She declares her independence of Abbeville, and Abbeville smites her for wrecking her cities, and wantonly destroying the population of her Sister states. Glandelinia is import impotent before the power of Abbeville in spite of all the havoc she creates. She will pay.

Since this crazy war began there has been brought on by the foe many terrible calamities, by explosions, flood and fire and plague, especially in 1913 early, but none yet to equal the floods that occurred early in September 1913, which came so suddenly following an explosion of tremendous violence on the 12th brought on by forest fires set by the enemy. This great disaster took place in Northern Angelina State but far from the boundary line, but it embraced a good section of Southern California, and the whole of Angelina, and fortunately preventing the too great a spread of the forest fires in that location. Despite knowing of California's flood horrors the people at this section were not aware of their impending fate.

Previous to this big ravaging forest fires were fairly wiping out hundreds of millions of dollars worth of trees in one month in Northern Angelina, a bigger fire than all the big ones raging in California throughout the whole war combined added by a new and now more immeasurable one in southwestern California, northwest of the McCallister Woods, with at that time the city of Calvernia in its path and which was struck with the loss of six hundred thousand buildings before the rest of the city was saved. Mildred Greenburg was hit, but the citizens aided the fire department and saved the City to a good extent though fifty thousand houses were destroyed. 555,000 buildings were destroyed.

The Northern Angelina fire said to be brought on by a most terrific explosion of mysterious origin, was nevertheless a sudden addition to the terrific conflagration which had so long been raging in southeastern California, and in a moment, nay in the twinkling of an eye, the governments of these states were surprised by the awful fact that the resistless fires and floods were still upon the devoted inhabitant. The news of the awful overwhelming disasters of the past, came as a stunning blow to all people everywhere who read or heard of them, but this added and greater disaster was a new and overwhelming shock to the whole nation, and caused apprehension among all the other nations of the world.

These following chapters contain long and exciting descriptions of these awful September calamities including a storm of terrific battles and ravages of war a thousandfold severe. It depicts the terrible scenes that followed the awful fate of the victims, that overtook the refugees, and the hellish agony of the living, and and the frightful anger of Emperor Vivian. It also tells in thrilling chapters of the desperate and thrilling efforts, astonishingly heroic, even to suicide of survivors to save their families from the terrible blows of the war. The long description of this probable most appalling horror of the war, the coming of the terrific forest fire, the terrible crash of the war probable worse explosion on September 21th caused by the fire, not the one in this chapter, the rising waters without warning inundating more cities and towns than any of the other floods and disasters combined, and the awful spread of the fire so that nearly the whole of Southern California was in darkness for weeks, nay months. Even Emperor Vivian and his whole whole Court, were refugees, and forced to be for a week on the bread line and his part of Angelina Agatha was no more.

It tells of the immense legions of inhabitants overtaken by the catastrophe and cut off from escape, hundreds of thousands sent to their deaths, frightful chases everywhere, a "world flooded and on fire at the same time." Recovery of bodies, bodies stripped of property by Glandelinian vandals and war thieves, all this told in these books. It contains thrilling stories by witnesses, that is I'll say eye-witnesses and survivors will speak for themselves in this story. They tell investigators and reporters of the sudden dangers that paralyzed untold millions, and made them unable to resist the fury of the explosion fire and flood disasters of that frightful September and October Months, running yet far right past March of the following year without a break in their devastation furies, really the worse of all disasters of the war suffered by the Christian side. They give heartrending accounts of separation from loved ones, and tell how futile all efforts were against the fury of the immeasurable forest fires and floods.

They tell how they saw their homes, school houses filled with children, with their teachers, churches and places of business and invaluable buildings, beautiful parks and the like swept away by flood or fire. There were millions of grand examples, of most astonishing and record breaking heroism. The descriptions of the disasters begin beginning in this fatal September month and ending past March the next year, with no sign of an ending contained in these many following chapters from time to time with the harrowing experiences of Violet and her sisters and many others will surely thrill the reader.

Amidst the horrible and startling alarms, the threatening deaths of whole populations of all flooded cities and towns, or those in the path of the fire, and ruined by explosion, the terrible desolation, and probable probably 100,000 miles of land country and sea side in darkness from smoke from the fires he sees how nobly Angelina men in this "HELL" struggled in vain to save their families and homes only to perish with them. He sees how the remaining population of all the men women and able children even flock from cities and towns in crazy desperate and frenzied efforts to stop the ravaging flames threatening to devour a whole series of huge states and menace the forests of Abbeville, and her northern states, and wipe out two hundred towns of Abyssinia, Abyssinia and 10,000 of them in Constantinople and all of them in Angelina Vine and render half the nation homeless within ten days in many places.

He seems to ride on the crest of the wars biggest and most devastating floods, or be a fugitive of the or before the awful forest fires which is running a flaming race with even the winds, and witness with his own eyes the terrible tragedies of this most awful war ever written and known within his own mind what the end was and will do when he "goes mad" Glandelinia is mad.

With the many past explosion, flood and fire and other dreadful and most shocking tragedies fresh in the minds of recent millions of sufferers even now without homes and camping out in terror of the enemy and disease, and this horror of September being added, a clearer understanding of how the enemy can cause such disasters, and the destructive power of them was according to this story sought by the whole world, by the Authorities of all Churches and Denominations, the Weather Bureau, International Detectives, and Secret Service men, and all others others combined.

General Hendro Burger of the Abbeville Gemini, he being its Chief had a word or two to say on these matters which will be found very interesting if not absolutely pertinent.

As our whole nation generally know by now, most of all these great disasters especially in the state of California, was caused by the enemy who formed them in the west, south and southeast, and also north and northwest and even central, forest fires and flood, and other great horrors. So far through certain conditions, the eastern sections of the state, and other states so far in general escaped. So far as I can see there are reasons why the dangerous explosions, floods, and fires and other great disasters are not yet occurring here. The enemy have not progressed that far and so are being held back.

Every one who has survived the past disasters, or gone through the most dreadful horrors and are still without homes and facing dire perils from disease and even the events even the enemy and gone through all the most dreadful horrors caused by the enemy in massacres and the like, and who have seen their loved ones and friends swept away in the twinkling of an eye, are generally being brought to understand that all various war disasters, and devastations will continue to rage its terrifying fury, and will not sooner rage across the state from the west

ԵՄԻ ԵՆ ԵՈՎ ՅՈՎ ՅՈՎ ՆԻՍԻՆԵՐԵՐԸ ԴԻՄԻՆ ԵՄԻ ԵՎ ԵՆ ՆԱԽԱՆ ԵՈՎ ԴԻՄԻ ՔԱՆ՝ ՆՈՐԱՅԻՐ ԵՆ ՅՈՎ
 ԵՄ ԴԻՄԻ ՄՈՒՂ ԵՈՎ ՆՈՐԱ ՔԱՆ՝ ԴՅՈՒՆ ԿՆԻՆ՝ ՈՒ ՆԻՍԻՆԵՐԸ ԿՆԻՆ ԵՄԻՆ Դ՝ ԿՆԱԽԵՆԻՆ՝
 ԵՄՈՎ ԵՆ ՆՈՐԱ ՔԻՂ ԵՄԻՆ Դ՝ ԿՆԱԽ ՄԻՆՈՒ ՈՒ ՔԱՆՆԱԽՈՒ ՄՈՒՂՈՒ ԿՆԱԽՆԱԽՈՒ ՄՈՒՂ
 ԿՆԱԽ ԵՎ ԿՆԱԽՈՒ ՈՒ ՄՈՒՆԱ ՔԱՆՈՒ ՈՒ ԿՆԱԽՈՒ ԿՆՈՒՆԵՐԵՐԸ ՔԱՆՈՒ ԿՆԱ՝ ԿՆՈՒ ՔՈՒՆԻՆ
 ԵՎ ԵՆ ԿՆԱԽՆԱԽՈՒ ԴԻՄ ՔԱՆՈՒ ԴՅՈՒՆ ՈՒ ՆԻՍԻՆԵՐԸ ՆՈՒ ԿՆԱԽՈՒ ԵՆ ԿՆԱԽՈՒ ԵՎ ԿՆԱԽՈՒ ՆԻՍԻՆԵՐԸ ՔՈՒՆ ԴԻՄ ԿՆԱԽ ԵՎ ՆԻՍԻՆԵՐԸ ԵՄ ԿՆԱԽՈՒ ԿՆԱԽՈՒ ԿՆԱ՝ ԿՆԱԽՈՒ ԵՎ ԿՆԱԽՈՒ

For several weeks before this, unusual forest fires, burning over an immeasurable extent of forested fires, and moving in pairs like a flock of wolves had raged in Angelina state nearly over and all along the entire Angelina Run, and Arcata on the river valleys, with special destructive fury over the forested regions of the collector's run to the northwest, and the state of Angelina river, causing the fire to be excluded by the thick smoke and clouds darkness over a territory of nearly six hundred and thirty miles. The fire struck west all but across and and because of this everywhere levees of rivers were burst by the concussion of great explosions, and many places not surrounded by water were menaced by the fire, and therefore other railroad traffic over nearly all other lines was in danger of being interrupted, but for the whole district the worse was yet to come, all that time since the explosion the awful floods had extended to an unusual magnitude and risen to an unprecedented height to break all records for all past floods combined in one.

At Angelina Agathia the Evangeline St. Clare River rearing the flood waters, suddenly increased so that the entire lower sections of the city was completely inundated to a depth of twelve to thirty feet, thus forcing hundreds of thousands who had not been warned in time to get away, to take refuge in upper floors of buildings or on roofs, where they were without city light, or drinking water, sanitation, or food.

Owing to the unusual swiftness of the current of water flowing through the flooded area of Angelina Agathia it was utterly impossible to get any kind of relief to the three or four million people in the flooded regions, and in the mobilization camps of Dorothy Gale and Angelina Agathia cities, where the barracks were flooded up to the third floors and many of them were swept away, and many soldiers were drowned. In these two big cities, and many others houses not entirely reached by the flood and which people had taken refuge until they were packed like sardines in a box had caught fire, and their occupants were forced to flee, and either climb from roof to roof or brave the dangers of swimming the flood in order to escape the flames, and this with the temperature at 124 every day and night. Terrible was their suffering.

With every dispatch from the stricken districts of northern Angelina and all westerly and southern sections of Calvernia, and all of the other states it became clearer that the first impression of the flood and forest fire disasters rhodine as they were felt later on immeasurably beneath the dreadful reality.

Millions driven homeless, hundreds of thousands overwhelmed in the rushing floods, and as many more rendered homeless by the "RED PLAGUE" of the forest, millions spared from sudden or lingering death only to suffer hunger, thirst, and the perils of fire, and exposure to intense heat, or endangered by many ear-splitting explosions, bigger cities than ever submerged by scores, countless villages swept away without a trace being left with all their population drowned, countless homes at Miami and vast industries worth hundreds of millions of dollars destroyed or swept away, hundreds of miles of populous land drowned under turbulent waters, and elsewhere far vaster territories by ravaging forest fires, keeping the sky clouded with smoke so the sunshine was not observed in all the states for weeks, and over all the grim shadows of starvation, and disease, and hundreds of distant frightful crazy raging battles and war horrors a thousand fold dreadful, this catastrophe defies picture and parallel to express its desolating horror.

This wide spread triple calamity which smote with its most terrific force, the beautiful cities of Dorothy Gale and Angelina Agathia is one of those for which responsibilities can be placed again on the enemy.

Also in the mountainous regions of these states the sudden rush of torrential waters can be charged in part to the denuding of the slopes of their protective forest and also by fire, but elsewhere the country is level and the rivers sluggish. There was no lack of preparations for anything short of an unimaginable outbreak had been guarded against.

Cupidity and recklessness had no part in contributing, the cause as in the collapse of the grand levees of Lake Angelina or Belicia as it is formerly called. No destruction simply came at the hands of the enemy, and nothing that monstrous armies of men could do, or might have done could resist this devastating force or stop the spreading forest fires even though all the nation be called out to fight the flames or dam the rivers. In the presence of such fearful disasters there are many persons who will say, but also there are many others who will think that this in some manner a visitation decreed upon the communities which suffer, because they were so overconfident that the enemy was not mean enough or able to make the awful disasters depending the dire consequences upon himself if worsted in the war and proven guilty.

Yet the very magnitude and superhuman force of the super disasters of the past, and the preternatural disasters of the September month and months following will suggest to many nations of people the thought of a well deserved punishment upon Abbeinnia for not watching wicked glandelinia as she could have done. Such a conception could be of course true if people here lived a most wicked overconfident life. But here it implied that whole counties of the good people of these states suffered indescribable cruelty wherever all the inhabitants lived lives of peaceful holy helpful in industry, and in these counties and states there were no men or women who even wealthier than Rockefeller and Vanderbilt who secured it dishonestly or who lived lives of vice, crime, and vicious idleness or who allowed the poor to suffer. Even an orphan there was one for only fifteen minutes and then had a foster father and mother. Beggars there were none, and the poor were poor enough to only willingly labor but suffered no want, no unjust discharge, no privations during winter, and the rich were the first to help in case anything went wrong. Therefore those who thought it to be a punishment and warning for offenses against god, were surely not thinking aright.

This was a vengeance decreed by the glandelinians, upon Calvernia and other states because in the progress of the war Glandelinia evidently was not on the winning side. All kinds of investigators and spies however were sent at among the glandelinian camps to find out why the glandelinians were responsible. Only by that information could future disasters be averted, let alone avenged if possible.

It was superhuman but not supernatural for human shortcomings for none were in this good nation. No one recoiled, no one fought among each other, no children were disobedient, or sinful, not fretful and acted more like real angels than children. Therefore all this horror was but a manifestation of the rage of a furious wicked

Glandelinia nation—like the army of the fiends of hell against Holy Mother Church, unchangeable in her brutality, letting loose the irresistible forces of nature governed by physical laws which are inexorable. It seemed by the greatness of the calamities, that Glandelinia vengeful and pitiless had apparently gained power over nature herself not selecting her victims, but taking them at random.

And where in the world can the horrors of massacres be compared by those committed by Glandelinian armies, mostly among little children, and —THEM— only..?

She cared not what magnitude her created disasters might be, nor did she care who and what may be in the path of her man made floods and forest fires, or the dreadful anger of her Mother, Abbeinnia. As her concern is not with the sure coming consequences, but with her wicked desires so she is not moved by mercy, but by wicked and wholesale revenge and fury, not thinking or realizing the formation of the most dangerous armies of men whose sons and daughters and wives and men mothers and their all were swept in destruction were arraying against her in countless numbers.

To the limited vision of man with his brief life, nature seems incredibly; incredibly cruel and wasteful, and terrible in her own rage, but when Glandelinia lets her loose loose or forces her to rampage the results as read in these volumes in some way terrible beyond imagination.

It is inconceivable! The lessons learned by these countries have been a most fearful cost beyond measure, and caused the gates to rise in rage against Glandelinia. Abbeinnia herself will have to ask herself what other lessons must be taught by these most awful calamities before Glandelinia is put under her foot. What an awful, awful sacrifice it takes to bring Glandelinia who is more desperately cruel and wasteful than nature, to her senses.

However there is made plain the immutability of natural horrors let loose by Glandelinia, and the utter powerlessness of whole Calvernia to pit her strength against their full demonstrations. Again and again it is revealed that without always using her battling armies wicked Glandelinia can let loose natural forces which before all the might of human human intellect remains absolutely unconquerable.

The same grim lesson confronts the many Christian generals, and the main Abbeinnian National government, whose own property is snatched from them by floods and fire, it confronts the Abbeinnian rich people who see himself made as poor as the tramp in the twinkling of an eye with his family swept away to their deaths to add to his misery though he upheld the finances of the nation and unmade panics with the crook of a finger.

But in these countries there flows from such catastrophes brighter and stronger influences than all this. Despite all the horror and shock there will come throughout the whole nation a great joining of minds and hearts. According to this story the whole world feels the thrill of sorrow and a strong desire to end all this inhumanity on the part of wicked and cruel Glandelinia and her government. For the time being all conceptions of social caste and class distinction the most unworthy thoughts of beings fashioned in all the image of their maker are leveled and forgotten.

Even in other countries in time of disasters indifference and so, selfishness disappear..... Throughout the war stricken nation, and throughout the world there thrilled the uplifting current of brotherhood, the consciousness of a cause that is deserving. Wherever civilization has exercised its influence upon the minds of all men there is felt for a little time at least the sense that all humanity is one that such a thing as strife of man against man, nation against nation is but a pitiful thing, and that we may better concern ourselves with trying to make the common lot brighter, and soften the rigors of the existence we must all face sooner or later.

Especially concerning the southern Abbeinnian states, does not all these appalling events, brought on by the merciless foe serve to awaken responsibilities among the wealthy toward the sufferers? It does. When all went well, when there were no thunderous warnings such as all these, of the helplessness of these states, of Abbeinnia against the Glandelinian forces and flood disasters and others arrayed against them the fortunate all the time did realize that for scores upon scores of millions mere existence is a desperate struggle that hunger or fierce heat, or cold and disease, and the horrors of Glandelinian "andalism" prevail even when during this war there were no terrific explosions, ghastly floods and tremendous forest fires to make them vivid and picturesque, they did all they could to lend a helping hand, and the rich who were able did the most, sacrificed the most, nay rather see themselves utterly ruined than their fellow man suffer. Why not that here in this country in time of dire distress? Who will doubt that all who will read this long Abbeinnian "story" will be stirred by the shock of these dreadful calamities to a deeper and more sympathetic understanding with the conditions that surround Abbleannia on every side. If any further good can come from a series of most astonishing catastrophes which even the worse of Abbleannian and Calverlinian storms cannot reach in dreadfulness one tenth, so immense and cruel it may be in the stimulating pride of race which it engenders. Such an awful experience has a unique effect upon the nature of the Abbleannian Nation.

The greater the calamity which fell upon the southern Abbleannian States, the greater seems to be the rebound, and the larger the armies it caused to be formed in army against Glandelinia. Destruction and tremendous hardships seemed to open great great acts of heroism inventiveness and enterprise. It brought many tourists from other countries to the stricken localities, not from curious curiosity, but willingly from the heart, to take in the scenes, to arouse the world against Abbleannia and to lend a helping hand at all costs and risks and to help fight the Glandelinians also. Abbleannia suddenly overwhelmed by the loss of her fair city of Abbleann dreadfully and most suddenly overwhelmed by the first greatest flood ever heard of is apparently doomed to moulder away in forgotten ruins, with the holy and beautiful population of unusually righteous people wiped out, but the surviving people of her state and in Bengal county when the proper time and opportunity arrives will clear what is left of the wreck and build a greater city than before, and consecrate all the persons who lost their lives in the calamity as the forerunning heroes of the most suffering and worn torn country on all record.

Before the ruins of Mildred Hamburg, was cleared or had ever been cleared, and while the wreckage jam was to be used for rebuilding of houses and restoration of houses the vision of a better city rose before her surviving inhabitants, and they made it real, the resurrection of the second hardest hit city of that dreadful Bengal County tragedy.

Calamity sets free such a flow of creative power that destruction itself makes for progress. These awful disasters concentrate upon constructive enterprise stores of emotional energy that in other times are expended in the fierce struggle of competitive existence. The main cities of Northern Angelinia gate in the path of this main September floods were as follows including counties, and which were severely devastated worse than any city by any other flood before--

City of Corneliam, San Pedro county, Angelinia State, as well as cities and towns of very large size, not counting villages in gale, rot, rot, rot, and Osmo counties and districts, August 31st 1913.... 596 killed when houses are wrecked by unusually violent explosion. 189 drowned in ensuing floods. Property loss for City of Corneliam alone $ 22,296,000. elsewhere $900,000,000. Unusually small loss of life for awful magnitude of disaster.

"St Gertrude City, Angelinia State boundary line north to Calverlinia- same date...., 113 killed, 2,500 injured, proper y loss $12,500,000. Destruction happened at night. First thought to be tornado. Explosion in San Pedro County responsible.

Little Angel, same date-- 44 killed, property loss $1,500,000.

Denton, Barclay, and Robespierre Dentonia counties, 787 killed, and 10,535 injured, property loss $1,18,777. Same date, and same cause.

St Ann county, and east Gertrude Angelina city...., 7386 identified killed, not identified 17,000, 170,000 injured, property loss for city alone $107 to 121,000,000 loss. Same concussion devastated many places in San Juan Francisco and San Domingo counties causing an additional property loss of about $111,000,000.

Eastern Angelina, line gate-- 152 killed, 1,000 injured, property loss over-- $2,447,000.

West Fieldville county, also covering, Virgin, St Gertrude, St Marys, South and North St James Counties, Glandendon, Abbleann, St Charles, St Paul, Green Meadow and Colleen counties.... 11,871 killed, 19,000 injured, property loss $27,941,000.

Dorothy Gale City, 19000- 19,000 killed. Property loss $130,000,000.

Angelinia Agathia county, 40,398 killed, City of Angelinia Agathia hard hit, 18,440 killed, Trot city same county, 500 killed.

FOREST FIRES PRECEDING EXPLOSION AND FLOOD.

August 15th 1913. Severe and extensive forest fire in middle west of Mic-Hollister woods. Seas of rushing flames, and high winds carrying fire before it.

August 16th ---- Hurricane of fire in Heidi and Mic-Hollister counties--many towns in path, enormous private property destroyed, ninety fire fighters killed, unknown thousands homeless.

August 17,--20..... Fire wave and immeasurable damage at Horton ..Northern Angelinia State.

August 30th.... same fire and wind storm ravages, boundary line and forest fire, and of southern Calverlinia, sixty fire fighters lose lives, many millions in property destroyed.

August 30th.... Great mysterious explosions in Angelinia gate, San Pedro and St Ann, and also St Michael counties. Cause by fires. Whole state trembles before Concussion. All parts of western Angelinia Agathia as seen in following chapter laid in ruins. Dorothy Gale also suffers. Great loss of life.

Chapter Twelve

THE BEGINNING OF A DESOLATE SEPTEMBER MONTH.

SEPTEMBER FIRST NINETEEN THIRTEEN ARRIVES WITH SCENES OF DESOLATIONS, A TERRIFIC FOREST FIRE CHOWS, AND SMOKE MADE DARKNESS EXTENDS OVER THE COUNTRY. A PROUD CITY IS DEVASTATED. A TERRIBLE SCENE OF DESTRUCTION REIGNS DREADFUL SCENES---SEAS OF WRECKAGE EVERYWHERE.. AN IMMENSE PROBLEM OF CARING FOR THE GREAT NUMBERS OF INJURED. ASSISTANCE PROMPTLY OFFERED. DIFFICULTY IN BURNING THE DEAD. A CITY STRICKEN DOWN RAILWAYS. THE INJURED REQUIRES ATTENTION. THE BEGINNING OF HEADJUSTMENT. IMMENSE DROVES OF HOMELESS ARE SHELTERED AND FED. STRANGE AND HARROWING STORIES ARE TOLD. A PRAYER ANSWERED.....

AGAIN in this month of September, Abbleannia is humbled by the powerful freaks of the Glandelinian war disasters, and the greatest part of Calverlinia, with its immense forests, fertile fields, immense industrial establishments, and boasted communities of sea stability and wealth is devastated by fire, explosion and water. Like a pigmy the state of Calverlinia under guardianship of her sister States and powerful Abbleannia has been like a robber of the olden times crucified for his crimes, hundreds of her cities have been leveled, and the possessions of hundreds of millions of surviving people who knew of past horrors, either burned, cast to the four winds by enormous explosions, and wiped out by floods.

From the endless stretch of the Mic-Hollister Woods there formed a terrible conflagration of unparalleled destruction, which so far was from September to way past December, nay even January of the proceeding year to sweep over the forested regions of southern Calverlinia, Northern Angelinia, and Angelina Vine State, and even portions of byssinkile and Conccentinia, and Abbleannia to awe all the good, population, and claim as tribute, thousands upon thousands of lives besides untold hundreds of millions of dollars worth of timber of the forests alone, not counting the cities and towns destroyed. Again I'll say all this was caused by the enemy..

And still the fury of the Glandelinia war maddened disasters, were not even abated, for the enemy starting these fires were responsible for what was to soon follow.... The fire starting many terrific explosions of unvented energy caused the collapsing of the levees of many other big rivers, causing these rivers flooded by heavy local rains of July in Northern Calverlinia and parts of Abbleannia, and also from riverlets and ice and snow from mountains to burst their bounds in Northern Angelinia and rendering levees which every Angelinian citizen had devised to hold their waters in, swept out upon the whole half of the state and carried to death scores of thousands of souls. Laid waste the proudest handiwork of the inhabitants and won everlasting recognition of power by the destruction of added hundreds of millions of the very nations possession.

Because of the efforts of the Glandelinians, hand in hand the fire, flood and explosion laid a huge claim upon humanity for millions of lives during the past months, brought terror and rage to the population of Abbleannia. Left desolate countless towns, and cities by hundreds, and threw upon the shoulders of proud Abbleannia a burden of untold millions in property damages and rendered homeless so many millions to add to those so rendered refugees by the past disasters, and were still refugees without homes, and forced to flee even before the new horrors that the Nation was at a stake of what to do for all these.

Notwithstanding all this there has also during the past month of Augi August itself a series of great battles everywhere, around, Livan Wickey and minor disasters of a kind which could have shocked our real world. And since the time of the dreadful flood disasters of June and July 1913 the waters have not receded, in their despot e parts to a considerable extent, and what remained of Abbleann was still under water, most of the state was still covered by water and wreckage of every descript description and the whole country was still a sea of horror and desolation. Nearly seventeen thousand big mobilization camps for the refugees and homeless were in existence, plagues were raging among them, and sorrow still was rampant. Most of all men folk of even the refugees were or had been drafted to go and aid in guarding other levees of rivers and lakes, while many were sent to help fight and prevent future forest fires, yet among these refugees the extent of ravaging plagues were so severe and contagious that never in our world had such diseases ever been manifested, nor so many died from them. And from time to time these refugee camps were in the path of new floods, or fires and had to move for safety in a rank hurry. The situation for Calvernia and her sister states was well nigh nightmarish, as well nigh appalling beyond measure, and probably far worse than if the world was coming to an end. Any more disasters like this and the population of the whole state would be well nigh wiped out or homeless and forced to exile themselves for safety.

HOW THE FOREST FIRES STRUCK THE SHEDS FILLED WITH BLASTING POWDER AND EXPLOSIVES AND CAUSED THE FIRST EXPLOSIONS IN ITS DREADFUL CAREER.

Like a great country wide "Red plague" the terrific forest fires from southeastern Calvernia swept down upon the center of the forested regions of Lake Angelina, and spreading upon the northwestern portion of the thick turpentine and risen forested regions of McJannet Run valley on the early morning of September Second when the citizens of Angelinia Agathia were yet mostly in bed. Neighboring towns had been damaged by forest fire storm within a day or two before this, as the southeastern Calvernia horror had gained headway and changed its course from westward to south, and southeastward, and big "Blizzards" of forest fires in the surrounding country, especially in the vicinity of Gertrude Angelina city, the Turpo mountain forested regions and the Angelina Run Valleys should have warned of dangerous forest fire conditions.

Angelina Agathia just then was one hundred and thirty miles from the terrific conflagration of the Vivian Hill Valleys, a northern branch of the southeastern Calvernia fire sea, and from there the smoke was over the city as if there was a big thunderstorm coming. But the ominous clouds of smoke that arose in the sky to the west even from that distance to be as visible as if only half a mile away, and to the west and northeast of Angelinia Agathia on that fateful morning at first caused no uneasiness to the good people of this capital city for those who viewed it said to one another: "Praised be to our Blessed Lord. We are going to have rain at last."

The clouds rolled up and spread over the sky in wreaths as thick as thunderclouds the horizon parts as black as night, preventing hardly any daylight, not so much as twilight coming to the city. Yet so fantastic and interesting and awesome was all this immense cloud with its boiling, and cauliflower and globular and other curling appearance, that the early risers watched it with intense interest and excitement. At first they thought a great morning thunderstorm was approaching, but finally many of the more alert noticing the strange coloring of it, and the way it rolled and boiled straight upward from along the horizon and remained stationary without moving forward there, decided with great apprehension that it all was smoke and that a big fire must be raging somewhere. What convinced them more was that the rolling clouds of smoke along the horizon not only rose upward, and spread outward and forward but that at times they were pierced by reddish flickering lights, a that from time to time would appear and then disappear.

At first it was believed that it must be a big fire threatened the city itself, and this caused a perfect general call of fire departments that ran through every street but no fire in the city could be found, though the smoke seemed to be within the city from the distance of the observer. This was astonishing, and all began to realize it was the smoke of the forest fires they had heard of, and they feared exceedingly for the safety of the city, and all kinds of calls came to all bureaus asking of which direction the fire was moving, where it was, and how big.

Yet the days of safety for Angelinia Agathia seemed to have passed and the strong buildings of the city stood ready to battle with fire or water.

Not to leave the scene of angelinia Agathia's apprehension for a while, and follow with this fire itself, watch its progress and the terror of its work.

It's the morning of August 30th. The world is in darkness, the atmosphere over the country is stifling with heat and smoke for a hundred miles, and no sunlight is at glorianna further away from it than Angelinia Agathia. This enormous fire raging to the south near the town of St. Matthew grew rapidly and where it spread mountains of smoke soared upward from it toward the sky in billowing billows that seemed to try and reach the planets in the sky far above the world. The conflagration desolating the Vivian hills and Valleys and even the forested plains near the region assumed the form of an enormous wild fire ocean, and burned forward with incredible speed than even a full fool would not believe.

Bigger and bigger grew the fire sea increasing in length, and joined by other bigger ones until the fire sea enveloped unusually large stretches of the forests at once while rushing forward like a wild cyclone. A good section of the Red Riding Hood woods is in its path. Fifteen to twenty minutes pass, and all this is a roaring rushing sea of flame. The fire leaps across the normal run, and the forest on the opposite side goes up in a sudden long line of fire as far as eye can reach. It is at a vertible sea of fire clouds leaping hundreds or thousands of feet, and driven forward by an unusually strong gale evidently originated by the heat of so much fire. Trees catch fire at once apparently by the hundreds of thousands. The advance of the sea of fire was preceded by a screaming tempest that shattered weaker trees, uprooted huge trees, stripped innumerable branches off, hurled clouds of gravel through the air and drove huge clouds of smoke fog and clouds all over the country for a hundred miles in advance of the fire storm, and caused tremendous heat waves over all of the Calvernia country in the path of it or not.

It was a vertible sea of fire cloud clouds, leaping hundreds of feet and driven forward by an unusually strong gale evidently originated by the heat of so much fire. It was a most dreadful fire hurricane of enormous magnitude, beyond description. Horrible but rugged in the path of the fire ocean. The flames hissed and roared like a world of fire works and skyrocketing going off at once mingled with the crackling of the burning trees. Filling the air also with a curious piercing noise, and roaring like the tornado as the fire cloud moved, it was viewed in its terrific work on inconceivable destruction through the twilight darkness of that early September morning by passengers on an Angelinia Agathia and Jandu railroad train whose word picture of the train or scene rather are unsurpassed in their eloquence.

The train had neared the town of Larabee Junction, not far from old fashioned empire crossroads, or at least within three miles of it. At first most of the passengers wondered why it had been growing unusually dark, and so strangely foggy, which smelled strong and biting for a moment the way the wind was blowing they had thought a great storm was brewing. The engineer alone knew what was up having been warned by telegraph, and fearing the forest fire was coming to envelope the vicinity through which his train must sooner or later pass, was very slow and cautious cautious in proceeding.

The fire however appeared and was observed racing through the distant forest, like storm driven clouds and glared as bright as if all the escaping gases in the world were burning. The flames even appeared to roll like clouds and stretched up to the sky to an unbelievable height and made a strange rolling and snapping sound that was loud and unusual. Then what appeared to be an immeasurably dark space far ahead but inclose line with the fire, in the twinkling of an eye flames flared up with a hissing roar in a searing wall of dazzling flame, added with a crackling snapping roar. The heat felt at that distance even was terrific. These flames also soared an unbelievable height, and lighted the whole country side. To the amazed passengers there seemed to be rushing forward no hundred miles an hour.

Ahead of the train on which they were riding the sudden conflagration seemed toward the town of Larabee Junction. The engineer with a loudly uttered prayer brought the train to a stop, and regardless of the great danger the men and even some of the women passengers ran over to the place to hurrying the fleeing inhabitants to the train just as a long suddenly appearing cloud of fire struck toward the northwestern edge of the town enveloping it. The nearest houses of wood caught fire and collapsed like burning paper or strawberry boxes. Then came the distant explosions. The fire had struck the powder sheds.

Before the concussion the houses collapsed as if they were made of paper, and the train of cars was jarred wildly with many windows broken, and confusion reigned among the passengers remaining on the train. The noise though a great distance away was a shattering series of thundering crashes indeed like a series of record breaking rolls of thunder following each other in quick succession in a very violent thunderstorm. The roofs of houses went sailing upwards, and the sides of the buildings fell in, the roofs coming down on top of the ruins. The women passengers sat as glued to their seats when the cloud of fire struck with the distant explosion raising the town almost simultaneously with devastating and terrible effect.

Many men passengers were almost in the town when the explosion occurred so suddenly and were themselves almost caught in the path of falling walls as the concussion threw them and the fleeing inhabitants flat on their faces or even up into the air and various degrees of ways injuring some. The destruction was as sudden as if an earthquake had occurred, and for nearly twenty seconds the whole town was clouded in thick dust and smoke. As the women passengers of the train, comprehended the desolation wrought a simultaneous cry of horror went out from them.

At the next moment the rest of the passengers ran over to the wreck of the houses many of which began to burst into flame at once, while already on three sides the fire hurricane raged like a cyclone almost roof roofing the city in a sky full of fire almost roasting the fleeing refugees and rescuers. The heat was terrific. They could hear the groans of the dying men, and the wails of the injured, and screams of terror stricken women and children. The fire was spreading fast and the heat was increasing immeasurably.

"I entered a house already starting to burn" said gain Joseph the Conductor "Or what had been a house, and before me lay a woman, man and three children, two boys and a girl. On examining them, found them dead. Despite the awful difficulty and the frightful heat, and half suffocating smoke we worked fast and like mad and succeeded in getting all of the injured out of the smouldering ruins, and risking our very lives at this rescue work brought them to the train though our very backs were almost blistered by the heat and our eyes and nostrils burned with the heat and smoke, and terrific thirst tortured us. As we went about this awful rescue work we sure faced heat that was intolerable and growing hotter every minute, and though we were thinly clad, and had soaked our clothing with water from faucets in broken buildings we were sweating as though taking a Turkish bath for ours and our clothing dried often. Houses were afire all around and we had a terrible time, rescuing the live ones from the wreckage. We were then about to leave to abandon the dead to the rapidly spreading flames when our attention was called to a little house some distance from the others and in the path of the heart of the terrible conflagration.....

It had been wrecked and moved from its foundation by the concussion but we were surprised to find whole families inside the rooms still remaining intact too bewildered to leave. We hastened them out to the train. At another place but closer to the fires we found a mother and her six year old child lying upon a bed upon a bed and she was not in the least bit injured. They too were led to the train. Then near an open square we found an aged man in what had been the basement of a large house. His house had been hurled bodily across the street by the terrific concussion and we found him still standing there with a very surprised look on his face without any kind of injury. I yelled at him—

"Run to the train quick. Forest fire overhanging town," and he obeyed. When the explosion first occurred I saw a big derrick machine which stood in a hole along with a steam shovel simultaneously hurl themselves straight straight up into the air like Mexican jumping beans, and land about forty rods distant on top of one another.

At the same time houses were rolling and tumbling along the ground. I also saw a long string of box cars hurled upward and from the tracks by the terrific shock, and pile on top of one another in a heap. Six of them split open and to my surprise about forty men who appeared to be track repair gangs dropped out. Fifteen of them lay very still while others feebly crawled about, we had rescued them also. When we got the last of the survivors, survivors from the wreckage of the houses close to the train, the whole town was ablaze, with the flames leaping nearly a thousand feet into the air for miles at once, and the forest fire was now raging on both sides of the tracks, and now heading down the right of way for the train.

The engineer had in the meantime switched his engine, to the other end of the train, to prevent the train from being overtaken the engineer saw he had to make a swift and wild run for it. He had eleven cars and the pull was heavy as they were steel pullmans and no wood to them whatever except for the window casings that held the glass, given down to the roof and flooring all was heavy steel. The nearest nearest city or town was known as Riverdale, and it was fifty six miles away, and in a large open clearing of the forest which extended for about twenty miles in width and nearly fifty long.

Before the train started all the passengers were warned strictly for safety sake to keep all windows closed in case the fire would almost outrun the train which was most likely it would. He finally reached the town ahead of thirty minutes after a thrilling run ahead of the terrible conflagration, and it was the fastest fastest he had ever run his engine since he became engineer. I was not even recovering from what I had seen on the heated train when we pulled into Riverdale with the injured. It was night—but my such an awful night. The sky everywhere was lighted with a red glare, and the streets were filled with great crowds of people carrying all kinds of household goods and who acted like mad, for though their town was in an open it was nevertheless surrounded by a sea of high brush and grass and weeds all dry like straw and the fire would threaten it just the same.

Freight trains were backing into the station, and the station platforms were jammed with excited frightened people waiting for them. They surrounded the trains and trains at one once and almost fought to be the first aboard. They also came on our train in crowds till my car was jammed like a crowded elevated train or street car, old men, women and crying children. Frequently the cries of the wounded brought with us on the train were drowned by the deafening shouts of the frenzied people outside striving hard to get away on the freight, the shouting, the of the engine's smokestacks, the ringing of bells and the tooting of whistles. The confusion was awful, I could see the frightened expressions on their faces and the terrified crying children clung tightly to their parents. Every one seemed to be screaming and shouting prayers of an "Jesus help us" and "Oh God help us" and "God aid us in our peril" and "Jesus mercy" and so on.

It was a general exodus of people from the city as the news had come that it lay directly in the path of the fire, and that they felt sure because of the high grass and brush the large clearing would not check the flames. One poor old lady cried out so loudly that all could hear "Oh sweet Jesus set us some rain and put out the fires" and "AMEN" was the response from many within hearing. In the city the atmosphere was heavy and oppressive as if on a dreadful desert like in California or in Africa. One of the passengers told me he had heard far off a terrible roar compared to the explosion of a volcano. Following the concussion he heard loud crashing and grinding. Instinct told him some big explosion had shaken the city, and he said bitterly:

"This will all make the enemy pay dearly by and by, just you see."

"Yes providing we win the war." I said, and he looked at me strangely. I could see myself that electric wires had been shaken down, and knew that all telephones were out of communication, and I knew that by now every freight car was already a box full of frightened people, giving all kinds of exclamations. Many of the ruined houses had caught fire, though the forest conflagration was still far away and even while my train was piling out, the loud clanging of fire bells and the screaming sirens of fire whistles all over the town added terror to the city people. I thought to myself "What good will the fire departments do when the main fire hits the town?" Some of the freights filled like sardines started to pull out, snorting and puffing like laboring dragonic creatures, while the doors of the box cars were closed, soon we started and we left the town, and after twelve hours riding got safely out of reach of the fires. Yet there was no daylight that we could observe for six days after. It was a dreadful time and I'm not sorry I was through with my experience.

The smoke clouds advancing with the tremendous fire some toward the city was most peculiar. It was of dense black and resembled those huge walls of rolling globular storm clouds of the early evening of a hot summer day with a big thunder storm approaching, though along the horizon line it appeared to rise upward and spread outward as if it came from enormous volcanic eruptions so stunning and severe as the world had never heard of or seen yet. There were also long wide stretches of cloud, huge fascinating thunderheads high above, and along the whole horizon the masses of lower clouds bulged and rolled up to join with the another canopy above. It was once in a while pierced by undulating sheets of fire. One peculiar flash of the distant fire resembled a huge glaring kite above followed by a long fiery tail which for an instant whipped and licked somewhere a path of fiery destruction. When the forest fire struck the city the conflagration began in the northwest and first cut through the best residential section like an inferno and scene resulted like a Chicago fire of eighteen seventy one. This is not of Riverdale I'm writing that burning but of Trot city, a place of two million inhabitants. Most of the people had left by the freight trains, cars and wagons. The fire in this town within five hours soon became like that of the burning of Chicago and Moscow put into one conflagration, and a huge mountain of fire soared upward toward the heavens.

Following the concussion of the explosion in the city of mortense were numerous freaks some of which I'll mention here. Amen was kneeling in his little private home chapel, when there came the awful thundering roar of the blast. The concussion was like a sudden record breaking earthquake, and hurled him face downward between the pews and benches while simultaneously it hurled down into the street the wreckage of the entire dwelling except the chapel in which he had been praying so devoutly. The pews though scooped to the floor, or many of them, sprang loose and jumped up and down, the altar changed its position, and all but the statue of the Blessed Virgin crashed into heaple shattered ruins on the floor. The large crucifix in the rear of the chapel also toppled over and was also shattered to smithereens, and narrowly missing the pew the man had been in. He thought his escape very unusual and wondered exceedingly.

In another house about fifteen persons were hurled about the room by the concussion after the side of the house had been hurled down. The mayor of the town before the explosion drove into the city from a small village and before he went into church fed tied his horse to a post in the street by the side walk. When the concussion came the post was uprooted and the wagon split splintered. The horse was found fifty feet away dead. Another freak also occurred where a man stood on his head by the concussion found his feet in a chicken coop. The chicken was no where before in sight. Angelina Agathia herself was stricken as never before, and near by towns by hundreds, especially Dorothy Gale, and scores of them further south in Angelina Gate, and Vine, and across the Mic-Whirther Run suffered severely from both flood fire and the explosion, and many became perfect Galvestons, Moscovs and Lisbon. Of all cities and towns explosion shocked alone, Dorothy Gale was the worst sufferer. And all her communications with every place was disrupted, disrupted, wires were snapped in all directions and it took two months and two weeks to gather and circulate the news of the disaster.

The city looked like Omaha did in the cyclone of Easter 1913, but a hundred times the number of buildings were totally demolished and there was not one sound structure in the city. Fire broke out in the debris of many wrecked buildings in that city as well in the towns and cities of other states, and in Mic-Whirther Town the buildings suffered most severely. The fire companies were hindered by a network of fallen walls, or wires, broken walls, and a blockaded streets as well as flooded districts and many other obstructions. A heavy rain of falling materials followed the explosion and though it killed thousands of people in the streets it did not hurt any one. Of the known dead within the area affected by the results of the explosion 12,162 were residents of North Dorothy Gale, 16,899 of southern Dorothy Gale, and again 12,162 of west Dorothy Gale, and 10,000 of Central Dorothy Gale. Only one hundred were killed in east Dorothy Gale. There were about one hundred and fifty thousand injured. The remaining dead an reports claimed were scattered over a great range of territory with Angelina Agathia reporting, 111,000, Mombi 167, 16,000, Bethel, 7,000, Glandula 5,000, Lenore, 2,000, and Blant 3,000. This makes a total total of thirty nine thousand for the smaller towns. Of the big cities of Dorothy Gale and Angelina Agathia the total loss of life is 152,224.

The same cities and towns reported a total of 450,000 injured and more than 950,000 homes totally demolished. More than 1,500,000 persons were therefore made homeless. Aside from this over three million buildings were more or less damaged, a many of these being churches, factories, schools, convents, institutions of various kinds and two homes for the aged. Twenty Twenty of Angelinia Agathia city's Catholic schools were wrecked, and many totally demolished as well. Mention later. All forms of communications were almost annihilated by the concussion of the explosion, and two weeks later only one wire was working. Nothing it seemed could relieve the days and nights of high tension which almost at times became panic. The destruction also happened among the homes of the richer classes in the exclusive San Pedro, Santa Cruz and Santa Calus districts stretching into the miles, but elsewhere the hundreds of thousands of buildings collapsed more easily and for cities shaken by shocks of these kinds Angelinia Agathia was to give the biggest list of death which occurred.

Colonel Benton of the Dorothy Gale signal corps from Angelinia Agathia port became insane after helping carry fifteen bodies from the wrecked houses and collapsed when he had regained consciousness it was necessary to take him to the nearest hospital of the military department where he had to be placed under full restraint.

In these two cities the work of rescuing those still under the wreckage continued on with better result as soon as all the inhabitants who escaped were able to hurry to the stricken districts, but the efforts of rescue at night was by the use of glow of flashlights and the lights of lanterns, and day and night nevertheless very little was accomplished, notwithstanding there was no daylight anyhow as the forest fire smoke clouds were darkening the country side for many miles. And the concussion of the explosion hurled down all the wires in the two cities, blew up several wrecked elevated structures leveled skyscrapers to the ground, and all wires were down even in the territory shaken, and therefore all the electric power was shut off immediately to prevent further loss of life. It also took three days and nine hours before a train load of soldiers from the partly wrecked mobilization camps arrived at either one of the two badly wrecked cities. Yet the presence in the city of Angelinia Agathia of Governor Wauken caused the work to be more systematized, and a more concentrated search for the bodies ~~started~~ began at once.

If a person was to take a trip to the city of Dorothy Gale and view the wreckage caused by the explosion concussion he would observe that it was as if done more by a tornado than anything else but more complete. Houses for hundreds of blocks looked as if they had been torn to pieces and presented all the after effects of the passage of a severe tornado. The houses resembled the same as those in Omaha or Murphysburg. Buildings were seen partly torn as if ripped open and exposing the interior. Many wooden houses had even been as if telescoped, or had telescoped at another end and one was seen standing on the roof of a partly wrecked railway depot a building smaller than that which is on its roof.

Angelinia Agathia though a heavy sufferer also sent two special trains which sixty interns and several physicians who were to help on the local staff who had been at work for three days and nights. 100 women to act as nurses, and medical supplies were also brought on these two trains. Six or seven orphan asylums and other institutions were veritable death houses after the explosion shock. Every available room in these buildings were pressed into service and by scores the dead and injured taken from the wreckage of many other buildings were brought into these houses.

The many sections of Angelinia Agathia so badly wrecked by the explosion concussion reached from the extreme southern limit to the northwest suburbs a stretch of over twelve miles. The concussion affected the extreme northeastern part of the city most disastrously for its entire length following the west side of the valley extending along the Mc-Hollister gun River Bu Bluffs.

All other sections of the city especially the northeastern half of the city and those generally composed comprising the business section was not near enough to be so vigorously shaken but still suffered greatly and severely nevertheless.

For the section damaged severely and most was the factory and residential portions though a large number of outlying business thoroughfares were also in the destroyed area. The greater part of the damage was done along Western Avenue extending the full length of the city. Hundreds upon hundreds of long streets with retail and all other kinds of stores, mostly with Catholic goods and school and religious supplies were in the section of several cross streets with the resident portion of the city scattered in intervening sections.

Scenes of the best parks could be located located within the worse devastated districts covered. San Antonio park the biggest park in the city situated near where the severe effects of the concussion was felt, was greatly, or full totally damaged beyond repair, and Little Flower Park, and Garden Parks two of the beautiful show parks of the city with all the adjoining houses was shaken with such terrific force as to totally wreck and destroy most of the richest and most beautiful homes within its limits and all the beautiful trees were uprooted, and bridges over ponds and park lakes and streams ruined.

No one of course could account for the force and effects of these explosions. They were a marvel indeed. Think of explosions occurring many miles away, about forty, with even a hundred and effecting places like an earthquake that far away and usually causing a most great loss of life and make enormous floods that break all records.

thing everywhere throughout these cities many big emergency morgues and hospitals had been established and all available space was taken for the same.

Even the Abbeismian Authorities claimed the magnitude of the disaster to be as great as a Supernatural Miracle, and many bodies of persons who gathered to discuss the situation, firmly believed the Glandelinians had sthing to do with it after all, and that it all was a Natural disaster. As there are many Violent Volcanoes in California and Angelinia State it was at first believed they had something to do with it, and for the floods that lavas became undermined by some earth burrowing animals and caused the floods. A canvass of all these volcanoes was made repeatedly but sure evidence proved they had shown no sign of activity, and the Gaters Graters were not even arm warm. Since the big forest fire scourge manifested itself, and all the many thousands of investigators had found clues and evidences without a doubt that wicked Glandelinia was responsible, all detectives, every member of the Gemini, and every form of Secret Service men available, and even spies of the armies were sent to serve in a fake manner every Glandelinian army, or town and city government in the hope of finding at whom among the Glandelinian Authorities was responsible. Also included were volunteer spies, but experienced, and even the Vivian Girls and their friends did the most of it as we'll read further on.

The questions debated on this were as follows:

1. How does the enemy do it?
2. How do they obtain the sufficient amount of explosive materials for making such tremendous blast as that shake and flood the whole country so quickly?
3. How do they accomplish it with out detection and how many are at work of placing the explosives, and how long does it take them to accomplish the work, and what means do they use?
4. And how do they do it without risking great peril themselves, in case of accident or blunder, which equal even eventually will happen?
5. How do they make the plans, and direct the right spots for the making of the alambies, when it is said they know far less the Geography of our countries than we do ourselves?
6. What is their sole purpose?
7. Who gave the order for their making ???

Thousands of other questions could have been debated. Another thing which was debated on about the explosions brought on by the forest fire was this: What were the explosives doing in those sheds in the first place, and why were they so powerful to make again such a tremendous explosion? Something mysterious and very suspicious was felt about this. The origin of the forest fires could be solved, as many means simple and easy could be used for that purpose, the quickest, with the torch. And considering the size of the fires the fact (in this story rather) is evident that usually the Glandelinians would start a score of more of big blazes at once far apart from each other, and wait for a strong windy day and a hot dry summer season to begin this worse of vandalism.

After visiting the scene of the concussion the morning after the Governor of the Angelinia Agathia State, Wauken issued orders for the quick mobilization of fifteen companies of state militia from the Angelinia Agathia mobilization camps, and also issued a decree that every bodied or able bodied citizen of every city and town of Angelinia State, even older children, and women should mobilize to protect the northern towns from the "RED PHAGUE". The local companies at that time were already doing what was in their power, assisting the police and regular troops from the same camps, too together with the city firemen in the efforts to rescue the injured still buried in the wreckage and to recover the dead.

Hundreds of morgues and every available hospital in the city were full of badly injured and also were besieged by friends and relatives of the dead and injured, and many thousands made frantic efforts to learn the fate of loved ones.

Lines of soldiers and military police was thrown around the districts severely affected by the concussion soon after it had occurred and fortunately there was no reports of looting and robbery by the disguised Glandelinian vandals. Within a day after the magnitude of the disaster had been only partly comprehended and even when not yet the extent of it had been fully understood by the surviving citizens a relief fund was started. Within an hour a million dollars had been already contributed.

Even all the richest men and women were back of the movement. All kinds of private and public buildings were thrown open as a place of refuge for the sufferers. Nearly every home within thirty miles of the stricken districts was filled with the unfortunate. All the hospitals in the three cities, Angelinia Agathia, Dorothy Gale, and Nombi were filled to overflowing, and in all of them, the halls and corridors, were crowded with cots with the injured laying on them. Never before in the existence of these cities had such a disaster as this occurred. Neighboring cities had suffered greatly for every disaster, but Angelinia Agathia, Dorothy Gale, and Nombi always managed to escape. This time in property damage, none outrivaled them... The con-

CONCUSSION

Concussion produced by the explosion came suddenly like a most severe earthquake, but without warning, the day which opened with sky overcast with heavy smoke clouds having slightly cleared in the afternoon of the day before, with a change in the direction of the wind. Many who could have seen the ruin of so many buildings could have been reminded of the passage of an extensive tornado which though wrecking the buildings in the same way had failed to sweep anything away but left them where they were thrown down. And all this had been accomplished at one instant, nay in the twinkling of an eye. Many excited witnesses had declared that all smaller buildings acted exactly like "Mexican Jumping Beans" (they did) but the reporters thought these stories were something told by people who needed "refurnishing" inside their heads altogether.

To think of buildings acting that unusual because of shocks from explosions, seemed beyond most extraordinary means, and such reports became the laughed about jokes even among the sufferers themselves. Nevertheless many were sworn in investigators were sent with priests and bishops to find out if there was any truth to these peculiar "MEXICAN JUMPING BEANS."

They sent in this report to the emperor himself.

"We have reached the spots gave to us in location of those and those of the reporters who received such news, and we took along the said witnesses and the report as well. We went to the part of the area affected most severely by the concussion of the unusual explosion, where we met other witnesses who said buildings of good size and of the highest quality, whatever that is, if that can be proved to be a fact why not let the whole world dance the highland fling too! The place we came to is located between all grove and San Buena Vista streets on the west, and St. Michael's Avenue on the south, and from Thirty Fifth street on the west, to Sixty Third street on the extreme northern and southeast.

This is the most thickly populated resident or residence district in the city and contains fifty of the largest Catholic schools. Many of the large Catholic cathedrals of all sizes are also in this part of the city. Ten big Catholic churches are there, and they are almost wrecked. All the buildings still standing look more as if they were torn by a tornado than shaken by a concussion or air wave. We took four days to make a tour of these districts and we can say they houses have been wrecked in most freakish fashion but as far as we can see there are no evidences of their having jumped from their foundations, though owners claim their buildings stand where they stood before, and that many houses also stood with their foundations where their roofs should be. Some houses even stood on their sides, and others were thrown overboard. Their owners who told us their houses belonged on St. Anne streets three blocks further. Other houses standing on their sides owners claimed came from California Avenue and these these now stood on Thirty Fifth Avenue. All this of course does look very queer to us. Other houses put us in mind of telescoped fright and passenger coaches, and turned raised structures. One house we found which the owner said belonged to him and which he declared was on a lot at Twenty Fourth and Beldon streets we saw on the roof of a school house at Nineteenth and San Pedro Avenues. There were many other queer wrecks too many to describe, but outside of these we cannot claim there is positive evidence of houses having turned into "Mexican Jumping Beans" for that moment, and we believe those who claim their ownership of buildings found in strange places are either exaggerating their claimship from excitement or just gone crazy from their experiences.

If the owners can prove the buildings are theirs we'll accept the reports as true but heavens how can it be its far out of the extraordinary. Therefore if the owners do not give proof of their property, those who made that statement either were so excited as to exaggerate the report or are a little odd off their tops."

The writer will have to say that the reader, when he'll laugh or not must be reminded according to this story that these houses during the shock did a exactly at not worse than "Mexican Jumping Beans." In the city of Angelina Agathia along alone two hundred and forty fires or even more and big ones were reported in the wrecked districts and every kind of fire fighting apparatus of both the cities of Angelina Agathia and Dorothy Gale were called out and put to work in a very short time. Yet nothing seemed able to prevent a conflagration from the reason that all of these big fires were unusually severe and beyond control and rain only was the hope. All over both these cities including combi, electric light, telephone, telegraph and trolley wires had been as said of before hurled down by the concussion and the entire power in these cities had to be shut off for good so that all work in the nighttime and day time had to be done by the light of the conflagrations, pocket flashlights and lanterns and then within a week after only an imperfect idea of the extent and character of the damage could be estimated altogether.

The work of rescue which had been started immediately after the disaster was necessarily slow day or night because of the nature of the wreckage, the heat of the big fires, the heat of the atmosphere, the darkness of night at day, and the blocked streets and the network of wires. No one was almost burying like San Francisco did after the disastrous California earthquake. Verything everywhere throughout these cities many big emergency morgues and hospitals also had been established and all available physicians pressed into service. The Health commissioners of these cities appealed to student doctors learning surgery to volunteer their services for the relief of the countless injured, as doctors were so few, so many being either in the army or attending to the immense droves of refugees made homeless and destitute by other past disasters. The response however sad to say were few, and the suffering was terrible. The city authorities authorities of the three cities realizing in a measure the extent of the calamity, and the nature of the forest fires menacing them, and threatening the entire forests of California and other states, and the waters of past floods still covered covering much land asked the commanders of the troops at the mobilization camps of all places for aid in patrolling the outskirts of the big cities to watch out for the fires, and purposed to draft all able bodied citizens, even women and children to fight the conflagrations should they come, while other means was to be made to restore as far as possible towns and cities ruined by flood disasters of the past.

General "Ornman" in command of the camps at Angelina Agathia, though they too suffered flooded first to the request without hesitation sending all available men. A similar request to the commanders of all local militia companies met with prompt response and the state troops and home guards aided much in this work, as well as in relief and rescue.

Later learning the extent of the forest fires, their ravages and the numbers of towns ruined by them, and the numbers driven in flight before them, and countless horrors reproduced by them, the Governors of the three states, ordered many brig brigades from various stations to report for duty, and they arrived at various points selected for them, especially at Angelina Agathia which was at six o'clock in the evening.

There were some reports of enormous floods further south, many dreadful battles raging in the west and south, and furious war horrors around Vivian Mickey and elsewhere, and of gunley advancing toward Randall and weeping willow gun, but as the forest fire and explosion concussion destroyed all communications, these rumors were not confirmed. The results of the explosion, the threatened menaces caused all the people in these three big cities and many other towns and villages, to become very apprehensive, and as in many towns and cities the weather became intensely hot for this time of the season, nay hotter than any summer for the Nations history many of the more timid people prepared to flee. It appeared that every one was scared, and with the darkness continuing day and night without hardly any abatement, and the atmosphere being horribly oppressive, the people acted as if they expected the approach of the world's end.

The worse damage done and the largest number killed and injured occurred in the Northeastern part of Angelina Agathia in the vicinity of Thirty Fifth and River-view Avenue, and from there, southward to Sixty Fourth, and twenty First streets.

This is as of the residence of sections, and the destruction wrought instantly by the concussion was well nigh appalling beyond reason or magnitude. These districts resembled Machine after the earthquake there. Miles upon miles of magnificent houses were displaced from their foundations, and shaken into shapeless masses, or leveled to the ground entirely.

By the concussion scores of street cars were shaken from the tracks, some from evidence pretended for a space they were "birds on the wing" or jumping kangaroos, and were found crushed among the ruins of houses. Among the beautiful places of the city, Count Gutenberg's palace felt also the baneful effects of the explosion shocks. The roof was shaken loose, one wall was totally demolished, and the trees and shrubbery shattered and uprooted. Glass from the windows was found sticking in the opposite walls of rooms like arrows. St. Anne's convent and that of the Poor Clares at Fifty Fourth streets were unroofed, and the grounds were littered with debris. From the extreme southside, and all through the western part of the city, to the extreme north, and Northwest side and all the districts situated at the northeast extremity for seven hundred blocks is one mass of debris from two miles to six miles wide. Buildings even stood slantwise against one another and three were standing in an upright position one on top of the other, with a half broken flagpole in the center of the top house.

All soldiers called for from the mobilization camps assisted the city police, military police and homeguards, inside and outside the city in keeping watch for the approach of forest fires, disguised Angelinian louters on out and morbid curiosity seekers at bay. Never before did the city face such face such dire peril, while one third or more than a quarter of it was now in smouldering and blazing ruins. Every hour came the news of the spread of the fires westward and northward, and the ever increasing flood southward with the war itself growing in intensity like a great storm.

At Forty Second Street near Riverside Park a Convention Hall building was crammed with men making ready for entrance into the army was shaken and wrecked as if destroyed by an earthquake. At the instant of the shock the roof fell in with a thunderous crash to the floors below. The jaws of men and even women and children who were present also became panic stricken and amid the crashing of of falling wreckage as there was a mad rush for and through the only exits open. There was a terrible pandemonium. Many of those who were not killed or injured by the collapse of the building or buried in the wreckage were trampled or crushed as the building was breaking down the mad rush continued over the bodies of the dead, and few of the attendants even escaped. This was a real place of unusual indescribable horror, and out of one thousand people only fifty escaped.

Thousands of marvelous escapes marked the ravages of the explosion and concussion and even more strange manifestations of the power of the vibration which resulted less happily.

One instance can be related where during the concussion one of the wooden houses literally did jump from its foundation high up into the air, and place itself with its front once facing south, now facing northeast with all the household furniture also having changed their respective positions. The bed was found in the kitchen, and the bed linen on the roof. And notwithstanding this the house did not have a single window broken. The occupants of the house were flung about in various ways comical ways to say despite that six persons were killed, twenty seven fatally hurt, and fourteen injured.

Twenty hundred other houses changed their respective positions and places, the walls of one totally ruined house turned completely around and still stood and three others jumped off their foundations from the back like kicking mules.

On St. Anne street, a whole block of houses, all wooden jumped their foundations almost simultaneously, and then remained off their foundations in a perfect line like a string of railway cars. All the furniture within the rooms left their ordinary places and stood in various directions mostly facing the same way as the fronts of the houses. These houses in some cases were badly wrecked, some even demolished and a tremendous number of dead and injured were taken from them by the rescuers.

The St. Monica School for children at its part, and college students in the other and crowded with students and which was the finest Catholic School in all the Abbeyside states was closest to the city western outskirts and was totally demolished, entirely razed by the concussion. It could indeed be considered a miracle for despite the terrible condition of the building every man and woman student and all the children though buried in the wreckage were all rescued without an injury. And the building had been wrecked so frightfully and so suddenly that no one had time to escape. All other buildings within the same district were all wrecked totally and the streets were smothered in debris.

All of these houses had also jumped their foundations and what remained of them stood in various degrees as if they were preparing to dance. Five hundred dead were taken from the ruins. Two thousand six hundred were numbered among the injured. A three car street train of all Grove Avenue was also demolished by the shock of the explosion, and ten passengers were killed and one hundred injured. It might be said that astonishing freaks occurred with the train at the sudden terrific shock. The front car acted like a bucking bronco, the central one jumped straight up into the air uncoupling itself, and landed on its roof and remaining in this position. It was in this car strange to say despite the nature of this story no one was hurt or injured while in the third car that did not leave the cars or tracks six passengers were killed and fifty of the remaining passengers cut, bruised and maimed.

Fifty out of fifty eight passengers in the front car were all but all but fatally injured and four were killed. The motor man told of his experience in quite an interesting style. He said:

"Very early this morning I saw far in the west and northwest a small speck of white-cream colored cloud suddenly appearing above the city horizon at the extremity of a big church tower but above it, with the already blackened sky as a strange cavern like background. It grew with such rapidity such fearful rapidity that in a few moments the light of the eastern sky spreading over with the clouds was blotted from the heavens by its monstrous and sinister sinister monstrosities of piles, globular rolls and banks across all of the sky. At first I thought it was the coming of a great storm, then from the color of the cloud I realized it was smoke from the dreadful monster of forest fires I heard of hearing the city taking toll of human lives, almost without warning, merciless in its destructive fury, destroying and consuming all the forest in its path, playing untold havoc with towns and cities, burning and destroying as if Hell had been let loose loose with all its fire upon earth, and that our great city was in its path. I never dreamed there was going to be an explosion. The fire, I knew, was a very demon of destruction and malignity, burning remorselessly everything it struck but who could believe that something highly explosive was in its path. I was just stopping the car to let some passengers off when the blast or its concussion came.

As the car reared into the air like a crazy horse I shouted to the passengers to jump for their lives, and at that moment to my surprise, also fright, I found myself landing into the basement of a house across the street and three or four passengers with me. A moment or second later wreckage flew over us, and a lot of boards or timbers were piled on top of us. A longboard A long board rebounding as it fell was driven through the rear and front of the center car and wedged between the big fire the house across the street was almost buried like the blockaded streets and the network of wires. I was almost buried like San Francisco did after the disastrous California earthquake, every-the center aisle of the car narrowing missing the occupants occupants and killing the conductor of the front car....."

Every window in the cars were broken, bricks and debris of all kinds were piled inside, and everywhere was shaken loose. The front car after leaping had rolled over. The conductor of the center car and the motor man were seriously injured. The latter was struck by the board. The conductor jumped just as the car sprung upward and then landed bottom upward but the shock hurled him more than one hundred and twenty feet through the window of a wooden house down the street just as the house fell to pieces. He was rescued later and found to be dangerously wounded though he had over his shoes a pair of others which did not belong to him and which was not owned by any one in the wrecked house either. According to witnesses the conductor hurled a large wooden coop filled with chick chickens and roosters and also two other coops filled with ducks and geese over two houses like rocks, and a man was flung two hundred and sixty feet and he fell in a deep pool of water with the coops coming in after him. He was rescued before he was drowned having clung to one of the chicken coops for hours. He had been considerably shaken but not injured. It was also said that ten children were thrown out of a sagging room of the big building and others hurled about in heaps or scattered groups in their playrooms when the concussion partly wrecked the Angel Guardian Home for the blind and crippled and also real orphan children. About forty of the children were in their nursery on the first floor of the north wing which was partly broken thrown down. Six of the children hurled at of the building were found nearly a block away dead. Aside from bruises, slight shock, and the fright, the rest of the children were not badly injured. About forty persons were seriously injured and two killed when a crowd crowded streetcar packed like sardines was hurled over on its side in front of the home which is at San Lucia Avenue.

The conductor James Pedros was fatally hurt. The Motor man Jack Pedros his brother jumped as the car started to roll over, but the concussion and the air waves was a wind hurling him three hundred feet and he fell face downward in the playground of the home sustaining a broken arm, a dislocated jaw and the loss of all his front teeth. Some of the passengers who jumped were hurled through windows of the home and landed among the terrified children and two of the passengers died of their injuries thus sustained.

Mr. Patton and his wife and children were in the basement of their home when the shocks came. With their arms locked about each other in terror they waited while their home crashed about their ears. When they had been rescued, the four of them standing amid the wreckage of their home wept bitterly because a beautiful crucifix was ruined. At the home of James Alamanos on 1916 North Western Avenue near Riverview Park (Angelina Agathia of course) a party in celebration of a child's birthday was in start of all the preparations necessary. The guest had just begun the birthday proceedings when the concussion shook the house to pieces, may first according to witnesses made the house act like a football receiving a good kick. All of the party of children succeeded in getting out of out of the crushed wreckage without serious injuries except the child whose birthday it was, and the adults who were internally injured.

"The party I had just begun to have their good time before the cats are served" said one of the children a ten year old boy. "We kids were making merry and I had entered into the spirit with my sister. Suddenly there was a loud distant thundering but on so intense that I felt the shock and the air reverberated with terrific echoes as loud as thunder following the brightest lightning flash ever seen in the worse thunderstorm. At the same instant the house seemed to give us the sensation of literally sailing in the air and before we knew what had happened the house touched ground and we were buried in the ruins. I wriggled out and around and aided the others escaping. When we entered for the party the house was on Western Avenue near Riverview park. When we got out of the ruins we found ourselves three blocks to the south. Then suddenly brought back to the fact that his little mistress was near death he said with tears in his brown eyes--

"Oh if it had only been me instead of little Nell."

Little Annie Boylen was revived after a part of this same house had been thrown over her at the spot where she stood at Glumance Avenue when it came down, and she had been imprisoned for more than two hours and a half. It was necessary for the rescuers to chop an immense hole in the side of what still stood of the fallen house before she was taken out without the slightest injury. The manner in which she had been buried under the wreckage of a house falling on her made her escape from the slightest injury indeed appear as a tremendous miracle.....

Mr. Hendro Greenburg of St. Francis Avenue was in the town of Acorn Crossroads twenty miles from Empire Groceries on the Big Girl Knool Yellow Brick Road, and on and on the front porch watching the distant fire storm as it barely missed the town.

"It came like a rushing roaring wall of flaming gas" he said "and passed right by us to the east with incredible speed and leaping many hundreds of feet up. Acres of trees seem to be dark for a moment and then in an instant flare up in terrific fire. It appeared as if the world itself was on fire, and the air grew, very hot

In the town a good part of the town recently had been seriously wrecked by the concussion of what most of the inhabitants believe was an earthquake but which I believe from recent horrors was the concussion again of some explosion. With the approach of the fire the women and children had fled from the town but the men folk had remained to fight the fire if possible to save the town. I went to the attic window immediately on witnessing this unusual scene and saw many fires bursting from districts closing or closest to the moving seas and mountains of fire and smoke which roofed the sky even overhead with parching clouds of tongues flame.

I could see a hundred fires burning in the town at once. I believe the terrific heat of the forest fire set them afire. Huge groups of men in great confusion were fleeing down some of the streets evidently beaten in their fight against the flames and even the towns fire departments were being forced back. The flames of both conflagrations made a ghastly sight as they illuminated the acres of razed buildings near by. In the end however with the rally and help of the men folk the towns fire departments saved the rest of the place after hard work and much blasting of houses to make a breach between the fire and all neighboring buildings. "....."

George Grod was bruised about the head, and his wife and children were injured seriously. Grod started downstairs hastily to warn his wife and children when he saw a long surge of fire mountain high rushing onward like a hurricane with a terrific hissing roar past the south of the town of Woodbine and threatened to consume the houses of his neighbors to the west and southwest. An instant later there was a boom the like of which he never heard before in his life, followed by a concussion, and he was hurled down stairs into a hallway flat on his face, plunging his head into a bucket of water that stood there. Dazed he struggled to his feet and hurried his family to the cellar.

His house however was not injured but his wife and children had been seriously injured when the concussion hurled a huge picture frame from the wall upon them. Flames sprang up on every side and it was evident the town was doomed. It was not long before the whole city appeared on fire. "Said Grod. Then fearing that the building would collapse I lifted my wife and children out, and staggering as we went despite our injuries we went down the heated street joining thousands of my more unfortunate neighbors who were in flight. We had lost all our all in the conflagration that all but destroyed the town, but were thankful for our lives."

Henry Button Bright his wife and children, about thirteen of them, ten of them boys all met death together. When soldiers dug about the ruins of their house found the bodies of the boys and girls they were all clasped in each others arms. The body of the mother was under a fallen steps not belonging to the house, while that of the father was lying over those of some of his smaller children as if he had tried to shield them with his own body.

Henrietta Mergo a Red Cross Nurse who was thrown out of the home of a sick woman she had been nursing, and badly frightened ran all the way down town in Angelina Agathia to fall fainting in front of St. Michaels Church. Her incredible story was the first news of the explosion shock disaster received in the downtown section which entirely escaped. Among those who gave to an Angelinian reporter a vivid description of the thoroughness of the force of the explosions concussion at Mombi City, thirty miles west of Angelina Agathia was a priest, Father John Tomas who was traveling to help in the work of caring for the huge millions still homeless on account of the past explosion flood and fire and other war disasters.

He was sitting in the lobby of a hotel, and near a large window when before the crash the forest fire was blazing a seething waves of destruction through the forests northeast and west of the city.....

"When I awoke in the morning I had noticed it was dark as night," he said. "I looked at my clock and saw I had barely time to make the nearest Church to say my Daily eight o'clock Mass. I was surprised at such strange darkness so late in the morning, it being half past nine on my clock, and nearing before this of tremendous forest fires covering the skies all over our part of the country with smoke thick enough to make it dark over a large territory and to prevent the sun shining for hundreds of miles believed this the cause, and more so as the darkening of the skies had the color made from smoke rather than from rain clouds and there was the smell of burning forests in the air. On my way to church church a strong northwest wind was blowing burning like like desert air. There were more people at Mass than I expected, may there was no room for half of them in the pews, and they were all apprehensive, and some gave me money and asked me to say an extra Mass for the safety of the town. After the two Masses which lasted an hour I went to the hotel to await a fellow priest with whom I was going to take a train to Big Girl Knoll if I could get it. It had grown suddenly darker and warmer and I couldn't read," he said. A hot blustering wind had been blowing just before this, a wind so strangely warm that it excited a little suspicion, and also the sudden darkening of the skies by what we knew was smoke, and of its inky blackness to the northwest with a tinge of redish light made every one greatly apprehensive.

A few of the men sitting closest to me were talking excitedly about it when we noticed a hissing hissing and humming humming sound like that made by great flames of fire which grew in volume until we recognized it as the noise the booming sound of the explosion. The explosion was heard all over the city. San Francisco did after the disaster.

heard during the close passage of a terrific forest fire with its fire wind preceding it, the most peculiar and fearful sound I ever heard.

And after looking looking over the awful havoc that was created I never want to see nor hear such a thing again. In a minute or so a far distant thundering roar burst upon us in all its fury, for that moment there were continual crashes like loudest thunder and houses within our view became obscured in clouds of dust, while I felt a strange sensation come over me, and the windows in the lobby rattled and jumped violently in their casement. Plaster from the ceiling fell upon us and everything in the streets became hidden in a dense cloud of smoke.

It was almost suffocating and kept us in so that we could not investigate to see if there had been an explosion in the city itself. Finally the smoke fog began to let up let up and we learned first over the telephone that whole districts of buildings had been leveled by the concussion and that hundreds and hundreds of people were dead, and thousands mortally injured. We did nothing that day or night because of the heat outside and the smoke but wait for reports. The sky was red as sunsets from fires all day and night, and darkness like night still continued.

The next morning which was still dark with the sky still deeper redder in the distance and the glow more extensive everyone in the hotel got up very early and started on a tour of the smoldering ruins. Most of the town had also suffered from the forest fire. Since this war commenced no people and refugees have told me stories of freakish things violent concussions of explosions have done, and after what I have seen I will believe anything any body tells me about the shocks of these explosions which are as marvellous as the effects of the passage of the great tornadoes themselves.....

For many blocks many districts of the city facing the direction of the explosion the ground was covered with the wreckage of what was once had been fine residences or residences and all smoldering and blazing fiercely like so many giant blast furnaces. Everywhere else in the city, as far as I could see from buildings of all sizes, great magnificent structures and costly all damaged and also burning or beginning to burn..... It was evident the whole town had caught fire during the passage of the conflagration conflagration and great and great clouds of smoke rolled into the sky. Twisted tumbled portions of houses were everywhere, house furnishings were strewn over the ground, and to my utter surprise in the branches of what was left of the trees.

I couldn't understand this even to save my life and it seemed so unusual so unbelievable for the concussion of the exploded explosion. What even made me wonder more exceedingly was that I saw six rocking chairs, and at least a hundred pillows or cushions and other articles fastened in trees. I saw a dead goat hanging on a branch by his horns. Impaled in the jagged end of a torn limb was a dog that was just dying. Everywhere I looked I observed many dead cats dogs, chickens and horses lying about. Much which was stranger still to me I saw many live chickens walking the streets with parts or all of their feathers gone and wondered how the concussion of the explosion could have accomplished did this.

While I was still in the stricken districts facing the peril of the increasing fires with all the remaining inhabitants now fleeing I met a soldier that told me that a woman in a certain house was crushed when her home collapsed and the little child she had been nursing was found uninjured and hugging tightly to her little breast a good sized crucifix and crying for our Blessed Lord to come and take her home with Him.

I saw for one instance where a long piece piece of iron pipe was driven driven through the side of a horse sticking entirely through and protruding through the seat of a wagon which was lying bottom bottom upward. I also received the information that a family of seventeen that sought safety in the cellar of their residence had the house taken from over their heads by the mysterious mysterious freak of the concussion and smashed against another both being reduced to smithereens in an instant. In one district a small wooden house belonging to a small family was to my surprise standing on the roof of a partly wrecked wooden house of the same size, little damaged while every other residence all around, was either level with the ground, turned topsy turvey, or on fire.

Fortunately when I arrived on the scene most of the bodies had been removed by the hundreds of rescuers who despite the fury of the conflagration which threatened the city worked all day and night either with the aid of the light of the flames or with lanterns. Even now despite the peril of the ever growing conflagration I frequently came across knots of persons gathered about a corpse sitting on a broken board, step or pile of wreckage crying for some one who had been killed.

I warned them to flee before the whole city would be in a blaze but they only looked at me with a vacant stare and refused to leave the spot. Yet other women who were more fortunate poked carefully among the wreckage in search of valuables they might save before the fires came up and consumed them. At one place where all that was left of a big house was the kitchen, women and children were carrying out dishes which had not even been injured and placing them in a wagon. The suffering and pitiful sights, among the refugees carrying salvaged

In the town a good part of the town recently had been seriously wrecked by the earthquake of what part of the town recently had been seriously wrecked by the goods with them as they were leaving the burning city... In all haste appalled me, and as the fire gradually grew worse, and the heat of it drove all before it all I prayed fervently for rain as I had to leave it all myself. Whole districts of buildings were now burning and the smoke darkened the city still more. I wouldn't care to estimate the property damage. It is way up in the many millions. Another man on a train which passed through the large town of Glenbine, as the concussion shook down that place which afterwards was burned up entirely by the fire said when interviewed by a reporter—

"If a big black funnel cloud of a tornado swooped down and blew away the buildings and smashed them to smithereens I don't believe the wreckage would be as complete as done by the concussion. As terrific as even the hot fire hurricane that the air was filled by flying boards and a stuff of every description. And the concussion was so terrific and sudden that a freight train loaded with refugees just about pulling out was hurled off the tracks all but the engine and a lot of the cars were turned bottom upward and looked as if they had been torn away. Despite the wreck no one within the cars were injured but were shaken up and frightened.

When we came through the burning town to take away these and other refugees he agent said he never heard from one refugee train that drew away two hundred people from the town before the "earthquake". He said that nevertheless as far as he knew only three persons had been killed and yet he did not know how many had been injured. Our train I arrived far late after the concussion. And we ran past and beyond the southern edge of the forest fire. While leaving the town we barely crept along until the big blow was over and proceeded slowly because the tracks were covered with wreckage at points. When we got to clearer tracks we then went faster.

One pathetic sight was that of a little girl keeping watch over the body of her mother, this scene of course back again in Angelina Agathia, where we might stay now thank the reader. The mother Mrs Jennie Adahenia had been killed instantly. As the body lay on a cot in St Josephs Hospital, which too was partly wrecked, and awaiting burial arrangements, the daughter sixteen years of age told her experience:

"Mother had been laid up with an accident, and therefore was confined to a room on the fourth floor of our home No. 9151 Meldon Avenue. "As she said. "When the concussion occurred the house toppled over as if built of cardboard. Mother and myself were buried in the wreckage. As soon as I could pull myself from the debris I began a search for her. Board after the board the rescuers took away, and I even tugged and pulled at them until my hands were out and bleeding. Finally, myself succeeded in reaching her. I bent down to raise her but she was dead."

Weak and delicate houses of all the cities and towns injured were left absolutely unscathed while all the stronger buildings were literally shaken to pieces and leveled with the ground. The concussion splintered trees and in one small town the lower story of a large frame and brick house three stories in height was destroyed the lower stories being suddenly shaken out while the upper section settled in its place. Through a very mysterious cause large and small splinters were driven through trees and frame house walls.

Small and the biggest trees were uprooted by the concussion and driven entirely through brick and wooden buildings. Trees were shaken down and wrapped around poles as if wound by the hand of an artist. In portions of the wrecked districts of the demolished towns and cities vast throngs of people worked feverishly to save what they could of their household goods before the forest fires came while others regardless of the menace of the approaching forest fires stood with heads uncovered tears streaming down their cheeks, as firemen and soldiers came out of the smoking debris carrying in their arms the bodies of little children and even their mothers and fathers.

Even though the forest fires were not yet near these towns, wrecked and partially wrecked houses caught fire from stoves, electric wiring and furnaces and were soon in flames. One of the strangest things about the disaster was that the destruction at Angelina Agathia and Dorothy Gale Cities was kept secret from the world for many weeks, or nearly over a year by the explosion, flood and fire calamities for all wire communications was broken down in the wrecking of the surrounding towns and the preventive of their restoration by flood and fire which destroyed nearly all kinds of railroad and road communications with every point. Messengers had to go to Francis-Stanta, Mildred Greenburg and other places to give out first definite news of the disaster.

And before they reached these places they went through numerous perils by flood fire, and more so of the enemy. During the early hours of the first night after the explosion disaster the uninjured cities worked desperately to be successful many persons who fled from burning towns or who were brought in when rescued from beneath razed buildings. Even in Angelina Agathia the debris caught fire and hundreds of persons were burned before they could be taken from beneath the broken timbers. And no great number were killed in any one place. The concussion took its toll here and there. Some places even badly shaken as capped unscathed even in the fashion as if a twister jumped over portions of the city in its path missing districts then to swoop down again and smash whole houses by the districts to earth. At this time the forest fires which had been threatening Betsy-Bobbin left that locality not hitting that town only to sweep on to towns further southward and southward in the same destructive manner that it attacked villages and towns elsewhere. The rage of the fire elements even extended to points as far north as Central California. A thrilling description of the forest fire and the menace to Betsy Bobbin Town after the explosion concussion wrecked her considerably too was given by the Mayor, Denton Beldonia who during the crash experienced a very miraculous escape.

"I knew there was a big forest fire coming and I was warning the inhabitants by phones and by police fire departments and messengers by courier and telegraph to take what they can of their belongings, and catch all the trains going out of the city as quickly as possible" said the Mayor. "All the afternoon, three days before the disaster the horizon line its whole length had been heavy with rolls and wreaths of smoke resembling those of bulging thunderclouds, in formation. I would have been fooled myself if they did not have the various smoke colors. For three days they gradually increased until the sun shone more and the sky was heavy overhead with the smoke, making twilight darkness.

On the early morning of the first the smokeclouds making it almost as dark as midnight hung low and were piling up from the north and west in mountains of mountains of swiftly rising rolls and took on their lowest extremities flickering redness has sometimes sunset bright and other times dull. There was no sound of an explosion up to that time. Suddenly the sky darkened still more and some where in the northwest the sky then reddened like the glaring of a very red light sunset when the sky is perfectly clear. I was surprised and it was then I issued a warning to the inhabitants to prepare for flight. Then as I was hurrying to my home from the office to warn my wife and children the distant explosion came in a shattering volume of thunder loud enough to make you think the end of the world was coming.

A moment later I found myself lying face downward in the street and there came a new crash and roar like to me as if the whole town was falling into the bowels of the earth and the air was filled with flying debris and smokeclouds and clouds of white dust.

Regaining my feet just as the moment of the shock I saw a woman, man and three children together rise upward and go head first through the window of a house. I saw myself from a falling wall plunged into an armway of a building in the centre of a block. The man woman and children had been killed. Even as the concussion of the explosion had hurled me flat upon my face a wagon of good size careened around a corner backwards and dragging a team of horses with it, seemed to be running solidly in and in the next instant, it tilted rolled jumped like a rubber ball and then hurled or hurled over a sidewalk wall of an orphan home about ten feet high. The driven of the wagon must have been killed as I believe, as the wagon was smashed to kindling. The horses were not injured. The roof of a brick building jumped up into the air about one third of a block from my refuge and then came down in its proper place again but with such force as to partly raze the building and kill and injure all those within. I could not see clearly because of the darkness and the clouds of dust made by falling buildings but I observed a man run from a store to the street at the moment of the concussion and then saw his body whirled for more than two hundred and fifty feet as if he was a sort of wheel. His scalp was terribly cut his arms broken and he was unconscious when picked up later. The concussion lasted what must have been only a few seconds and I fled on and in twelve blocks away I was out of the wrecked zone and into the business districts where was little little sign of damage. That evening when most of the injured had been taken from the ruins the flames were seen piercing at intervals the very clouds overhead and the atmosphere had grown awfully hot and a strong hot wind was blowing. The north horizon was walled up in moving sheens of light glarily red, and a strange indeed a most peculiar noise was in the air in that direction, a noise that reminded me of cyclones. The fire if not hitting that direction, a noise that seemed to the top of a church tower to view the conflagration and beheld at a great distance a most fearful sight.

A sea of flames was everywhere to the north and west and extending as far as I could see. But it fortunately making a wide birth of the town and moving away from it. The fire rolled high in monstrous flame clouds, and from it the noise proceeded.

Fifteen days after the explosion it was even then impossible to communicate with the outside world from the region affected from the concussion, from the forest fire center, but especially the cities of Angelina Agathia, Dorothy Gale and others responded to the care of its a their armies of sufferers for assistance and on the sixteenth of September 1913 the city commissioners met early despite the smoky darkness of the sky and appropriated $125,000 for relief work. Citizens who were also present at the meeting also organized and donated $175,000 dollars more. Also the citizens relief committee were formed directly of sixty citizens and an executive committee of eighty to work with the seventy City Councilmen. Governor Norton of Angelina State notified the Mayors of both cities that he would sent if possible a special message to the Legislature asking for the appropriation to care for the huge millions made homeless and which are still homeless by the present disasters and those of the past, and feared for future. Cots were placed in all the hospitals of

254
Dorothy Gale city and those without shelter were temporarily housed there. The City purchasing agent arranged for enough beds and cots to care for all those who could sleep in this hospital. So well did the citizens of the stricken cities and towns and those close by respond to the call for assistance that whether it could arrive or not no outside help was required. The Governor of Abyssinikile, George Refenia immediately upon finding out about the progress of the disasters in the Southern Abbeinnian states sent by a traveling courier the following message to Emperor Vivian at Angelinia Agathia:

"Fellows City,
Abyssinikile,
September 19th 1913,
To Emperor Vivian, Imperial Palace,
At,
Angelinia Agathia;

I and my whole state are more than deeply distressed as well as aroused to the highest pitch at the repeated news of combinations of tremendous disasters in our southern states which is the responsibility of a vandal enemy. Can we help in any way or suggest means to prevent future disasters.

Governor George Refenia,
Abyssinikile."

The message took two weeks to reach the Imperial person but in reply the Emperor sent back this note of startling words:

"We deeply appreciate your offer for assistance but I must say that Angelinia State and all her neighbors are flooded out of the country, forest fires are now on a rampage with a possibility of all our forests being wiped out and hundreds of towns with them that my palace has been swept away and I the Emperor am in the broad line with the rest of the refugees or was rather. The people of the remaining sections of the state however are responding most nobly, and terrible as it is I believe we can easily handle the situation. All the standing armies of soldiers came promptly to our assistance and are doing great work. The marooned survivors of our grand city desire however despite the awful situation to express their gratitude to you for your message of great sympathy.

Emperor Robert Vivian,
Angelinia Agathia "

In the work of sending out calls for assistance and giving out information to those inquiring for friends and relatives, the telephone operators of many of the stricken cities and towns, but especially Angelinia Agathia all in the path of the forest fires and greatly affected by the shock of the explosion played a part which could be highly commended. At St. Rose despite the peril of an awful death by fire and explosion shock not one telephone girl left her swift board when the fire struck their city until all the lines refused to work any longer. Usually the exchange buildings escaped serious injury by fire or concussion and despite the conflagration raging on all sides of them the girls remained on duty as if nothing had happened. Every telegraph office in the town or cities reported for duty but the conflagration prevented the restoration of the lines.

Whole flocks of people fled in immense droves down roads and over railroads from the burning towns while the telephone operators remained at their posts. The Chamberlaine Telephone Exchange in the city of Trot, at Twenty Third and Riverview became a center for rescue work as soon as the concussion damaged the town. Doctors and nurses were summoned to the building and army headquarters were established there.....

Two hundred and seventy seven young girls were working at the switch boards when the raging forest fires hit the town. Hundreds of buildings all around were soon raging furnaces and by the recent concussion every window in the exchange building had been broken and considerable damage was done to the building making it an easy prey to the approaching flames but so far the switch boards remained intact. All the time during the spread of the conflagration the force of operators continued to work at the boards until the building catching fire and the lines refusing to work within the time the fire was only a few blocks away and many districts of buildings were volcanoes with flames leaping hundreds of feet making perfect volcanoes of flame and smoke every girl was still at her place at the switchboard and many continued to work while smoke poured into the broken windows from outside and a terrific wind was blowing. One of the rest rooms, the furniture smashed by crashing about during the concussion and stained with blood had been converted into a temporary hospital and morgue, and besides the injured bodies from the surrounding districts had been held there awaiting ambulances. Nurses and physicians occupied another room were injured persons were stretched on the floor. All these---think of it---had to go when the fire threatened to consume the Telephone Exchange Building. When the terrific roaring clouds of fire finally passed beyond Trot town burning a hundred thousand trees per minute apparently it consumed like a strawberry box the village of Misona barely giving the inhabitants time to escape. LEVISED scores of miles of forests in that locality within a few hours all along the right of way of the Mio-Hollister and Pundora, crossed the river in a perfect burning "world" burned a number of towns grown near Lake Gertrude, consumed all the forests, crossed the lake which was indeed miraculous and went racing over the hills and forested plains and rushed to the northeast a vast column of fire. It was twenty days before all the details of the disaster in the city of Angelinia Agathia with the accompanying wreckage were known even within Dorothy Gale itself. The total number of deaths in Mombi city especially in one section of it reached almost 1,515. Within the space of the center more greatly devastated which if made rectangular would cover seventy miles of land, over 1,200,000 houses were wrecked or made unfit for habitation, and many hundreds of bodies recovered. Estimates of the value of the property destroyed and demolished by fire, and explosion shock in Angelinia Agathia too are estimated beyond, $212,661,000. Many of the more substantial buildings can be rebuilt but nevertheless this number is small, and where the buildings have not been shaken under it was found that they had been so twisted that even the material was useless for rebuilding.

Eight hundred and eighty eight catholic schools filled with children were wrecked and put out of commission and all the children pulled out of the wreckage, that notwithstanding the crush of the buildings miraculously all escaped with but minor injuries considering so many in the schools at the time. Seventy seven catholic churches and ten cathedrals all worth millions were partly or entirely wrecked and eight colleges and universities for girls and young men were totally destroyed and the fact that it was too early a season for school of these higher students prevented a most terrible death list. But the fury of the fires and the effects of the concussion was not abated or forgotten when it left the cities of Angelinia Agathia and Dorothy Gale desolate. With renewed vigor the fire hurricane swept down upon the city of Lebandon where before the concussion of the explosion laid claim to 18,000 in death, injured 250,000 persons and leveled 1,275,000 houses and other property causing a loss of several hundred millions of dollars. The surviving inhabitants had only three hours to leave the town before the conflagration hit it, making another scene like the Chicago fire of 171 1871. In addition to totally destroying about three hundred and sixty five thousand homes in the south portion of Lebandon Junction, Forest Knoll a large town seven miles to the northwest was destroyed by the fire and the intervening territory for leagues devastated. The slightly burned among the hundreds of thousands of refugees numbered at least one hundred in the thousands, and many of these are now in a serious condition.

The surviving hospitals of bigger places not menaced by fire were filled to their utmost with sick and injured refugees flocking there from the disaster area. Terrific crazy winds, preceeded the advance of the fire, usually to a degree of less severity as only a baby cyclone or to a terrific volume of the hurricanes or even the tornado. The winds in advance of the fire seas at times blew with such fury as to lay prostrate the forests before the fire consumed them consumed them and if a town was in the path of it the winds---well to say though the houses were pieces of paper. Dreadful scenes of fire searing heavenward many hundreds of feet accompanied these fierce gales but timely warnings probably saved many persons pinned in the wreckage from burning to death as the rescuers worked like ants mad in the face of fires already starting from electric wires which fired the debris at many points. Indeed books full of most harrowing stories more horrible than the bridge horror at Josh Johnston were easily to be told by the survivors of this last of greatest of war disasters on the christian side. The scenes in the wrecked sections of the big city of Lebandon brought tears to the eyes of the rescuers whose attention was often called to the dying trapped in the debris debris of their homes already fiercely ablaze by agonizing screams for air. Many died or were doomed to death before they could be freed from wreckage, and others who were removed will die. Indeed throughout the districts of this big city with its many wrecked homes with the fearful forest fires coming nearer and nearer, and with a terrific hair raising peril of hot winds blowing with such force as to almost take a man off his feet, and fill the air with flying rubbish survivors took the utmost chances of remaining behind to search for loved ones or salvage what goods they can carry but in the majority of cases they were audly and disappointed and forced to join the other refugees in leaving town.

"I am looking all over for my father, mother and little sister," said one of two little girls to members of the endangered relief committee when they urged them to join the rest in flight before the forest fires overwhelmed the town. They had searched the ruins of what had been left of their home, and were standing where the front of their house still remained while the sky was being roofed in glaring clouds of darting flames light lighting the once darkened city like a blinding sun. "All I have now is the few clothes I have on," said an old man who was looking at the ruins of his home when asked if he was going to seek safety in flight. "Yesterday" he continued not paying attention to their warning "I owned my little home, had plenty of fire insurance but no other. I'll have to begin over again. Even here countless friends were said to have been played by the diabolical according to testimony by survivors. Mayor Conway was still asleep in his bedroom when the awful explosion demolished his home. Yet mysteriously the Mayor lying on the mattress of his bed was hurled bed and all across the street and dropped softly on the veranda of another house that was also wrecked. Mr and Mrs Altone whose home also was destroyed was hurled two blocks and a half and when they tumbled back to the debris of their home they found their three children in the wreckage not even scratched. Fifty names who were tossed across three lots returned to their ruined convent and orphan home to find all of the children sound asleep in their beds. The children did not awaken until they had all been removed from the beds to closed wagons brought to take them out of the fire endangered town. One terrible scene occurred at Lebanon. When the conflagration struck the town St Gertrude's big Orphan asylum already partly wrecked by the concussion was in direct path of the conflagration which was turning out to be out to be the most destructive fire in all the story for Calvernia's soil, which not only caused the loss of so many children in the building but buried under partial wreckage from the concussion but so hundred and fifty more by fire. So fierce was the fire within the city that there was no hope of any of the bodies being recovered but the number given was from the fact of knowing how many had been in the home and how many were left after the dreadful horror. Most of the children were young girls ranging in age from four to nine years old and mostly rescued or freed child slaves waiting time for location of parents if still living or adoption in families. The fire struck the town six hours after the explosion, and the orphan asylum being closest was the first to catch, and even before the alarm sounding the fire departments had been ruing this building and blocks of others was afire from top to bottom and spreading like burning strawberry boxes until the fire became an inferno. With the whole of the bridges on the spot assisted by numerous volunteers of all kinds a valiant fight was waged to save the remaining orphans.

Before the explosion there were one thousand five hundred youngsters in the home at the time in addit addition to sixty sisters of the Good Shepard order. Many of the sisters were badly burned. When the firemen that could come despite the wreckage littered streets arrived the youngsters were lined up against the windows and were screaming frantically for help. Within two minutes of the arrival of fire men the rescue had begun and children were dropped one after another for over an hour into a large landing net set up by the fire men while the fierce conflagration driven by a hurricane of wind was spreading on three sides of them and threatening to hem them in in a sea of fire.

Other children were marshaled out to safety by the sisters in charge of the home and taken to covered wagons to be hurried out of the burning town. One of the sisters told of some of the children being brought out and then terrified as a cloud of smoke from other burning buildings rolled upon them, and the sky all one mass of flame ran back into the building where they perished. After an hours intensive effort the fire men could find no more children in the windows so they forced their way in as far as they dared to go but the flames drove them back, and finally the building crashed in and nothing more could be done as the city fire itself gained such headway that every one was driven back before the fierce heat.

For six days before this happened at Lebanon the spectacle of the distant blazing forests was a lurid one as the flames lighted up the whole districts of country for scores of miles round as if the sun shone and the glare was seen two hundred miles away in the sky. It attracted the entire population of the city to the light, and they sensed some danger but did not expect the concussion.

The forest fire seemed to be worse at the "Little Flower" city a small place fifteen or less miles south of Lebanon. There where the explosion concussion had demolished everything, the fire consumed everything that was left, and there as elsewhere the majority of the victims were working people of small means, and they had nothing left but the lots and foundations upon which their homes stood.

Gracelande held also a large town with a total of 154,000 inhabitants was practically wiped out of existence as well as twenty of her smaller neighbors. Every house in this town, and her neighbors was first destroyed or badly wrecked by the concussion and then consumed by the forest fires with an unknown number of killed or injured. The bodies of many aged in an "Old peoples" home mostly poor old ladies the first recovered before the fires overwhelmed the towns were found under the crushed roof of the home, while surprising to say the mangled bodies of the sisters of the Sisters of the Poor in charge of this home were found a block away. A woman was found unconscious one hundred and seventy feet from her home with two little children clasped in her arms. They were carried to a waiting wagon and given medical attention before carried out of the out of the fire menaced town. On Riverside street between First and Second every house was level with the ground, when the ambulances and automobiles which were used pressed into service reached the devastated districts the injured had to be carried sixteen or seventeen blocks on account of the debris which blocked the streets.

100,000 refugees made homeless by the concussion and forest fire in these localities were fleeing every which way possible with the "RED FLAG" racing "Hot foot" after them. The groans of the dying mixed with the lamentations of the sadly disappointed. One man was driven insane and for a long time fought off a rescue party.

and effects of the strict martial laws were to be seen on all sides. And only in extraordinary circumstances were any one permitted upon the streets after five o'clock. One explanation explanation of reports not at all exaggerated but far below the actual truth that thou thousands of those killed in the shocks were found floating in the flood waters was to be found that the loss in life from the flood itself was smaller than probably at first reported.

or the forecast forecast amongst relief workers, they realized that persons countless in numbers in stress or under stress and borne up by hope of rescue might survive for several days upon limited limited rations. Also another reason to be observed was the circumstance that hundreds of thousands of persons seen in their homes when the flood was upon them were given up for dead. Yet the chances that they had escaped at the last moment and taken refuge in places temporarily cut off was not taken into consideration. An illustrating instance of this was shown at the offices of the branches of the Relief and other Aid Committees. A soldier who had been on duty at Center street, and who had seen a woman and her little daughter drown in the flood reported that he was sure no less than one hundred persons only perished in the city and that more than 10,000 persons would be found in cottages overwhelmed by the deluge in that awful neighborhood. The soldier stuck to his story, and declared he had seen all residents of that district wade out in water that reached up to their necks and go so suffer and higher places.

With the receding of the water hundreds of thousands of those who had been penned in their homes were freed by either going to higher ground or by the water disappearing from within their homes. Many thousands were taken off in boats, and of them were taken care of in relief stations. There was a terrible number of dangerous sickness largely due to the tremendous heat wave during all the time of the flood and after also. The rush of the currents had claimed a small toll of lives however judging from how so few bodies which showed evidence of death from drowning only recovered had been found at least. They have been washed up one onto the ground from new made rivers, and many have been found buried in the debris.

The body of a little girl ten years old was found inside a gutter, removing the mass of debris workmen and others moved carefully, fearing they might tread upon bodies but they were not found in groups. The body of a priest about eight eighty years old was found clasped in the arms of his mother. Scenes of horror and the reign of terror too fierce for any volume to describe were given out endlessly by survivors and rescuers and witnesses, but there could be no more heartrending, more tragic moment in the entire history of all past floods than that presented when the wrecked homes and the busy business houses in Angelina Agathia caught fire after the water had reached its height, and people stood by helpless, while outside the flood zones the forest fires became terrible seas and oceans of fire burning everything in its path. Many perished in the forest fires, more than in the flood, and many in flight were overtaken and perished. The disasters had intensified. The all night vigil of every one living in the suburbs of the city as they watched flames eating their way through the business districts of the city of Angelina Agathia proper could be properly described only when actually witnessed. One man stood on a high rise of ground taking in the full view of Angelina Agathia and tried with the help of a glass to distinguish what a portion of the Abbeissania Gem City was burning. Around him stood immense droves of women men and children, many wringing their hands in anguish. The man was besieged by the closest of every sufferer who sought his comfort. He could not tell them what was burning because of the forest fires a strong dense haze had hung over the scene like a fog, and the angry glow from the burning sections of the city, and from the distant forest fires was magnified.

The entire city is afire," became the cry, and women wailed as over their dead, and men swore. Absolutely no hope was felt by the isolated city. Hundreds of families for in morning for many weeks. When the water subsided and even then the brilliant summer late summer sun failed to shine through the smoke haze of distant forest fires, there was even then no tears of joy, for sobe and cries of horror continued as if the whole region was a perpetual infernal regions, and they were the lost souls.

At Michaels Hall and School housed over three thousand persons, even a stream of wagons and so on brought sick and injured to the school, which was turned into an emergency hospital and shelter station. A big fire then broke out at the school, and there was some commotion but though a panic ensued and the building was later entirely destroyed there was no deaths reported at the school though a great number of the refugees were injured. The passageway into the suburban part of the city was anything but a promise of the sights to follow. Conflagrations raged everywhere with a scene of fires that broke all records for city fires, and as the stream of outpouring vehicles left the burning factory and business district and entered the fashionable portions it passed through lanes, skirted by jagged mountains of wreckage the dry portions and upper stories of houses which were also smothering infernos. One fashionable district that occupied a square mile or more of both sides of Vivienne Avenue were all ruined and blazing residents that once made the section of the aristocratic section of the city.

Evidently it appeared certain without doubt that after the recession of the flood fire was destroying what the flood had left.

Blocks upon blocks of shattered houses lining Vivienne Avenue from its junction with Main street to the Angelina Agathia and Riverview Street bridges were burning, massive stone pillars had crashed through walls, porches were set very or carried away bodily and over all not touched by the fire was mud and sand that resisted all efforts to enter the denolated homes not touched by the flames. When were found amid the wreckage too heavy in numbers to count in a hundred years. Pitiful pictures were seen every moment as the rescue to four journeyed through the burning and other districts. Families returning to the homes from which they fled found tumbled down shacks or mere ruins, many of which were ablaze. The experience of the Vivian Avenue residents was that of all the wealthy but righteous and God loving people of Angelina Agathia who populated the St. Peters and other streets. In this badly wrecked districts. The utmost power of nature let loose by Glandelinia seemed to have vented itself within the confines of this section. The sanitary conditions there presented more terrible possibilities than any one can ever think of writing. For weeks after it was still a question that may relieve grim anger whether or not there are dead or living persons behind the piles of debris that clog the entrances to homes in the sections between Main and Sagumonia streets along Vivian Avenue and elsewhere. It will take days to penetrate the tangled masses not burned by the fire. The force also that set at naught the handwork of man may be realized by those who saw many thousands of fifty and two thousand foot beams of wood, weighing beyond measure rammed into the side of brick dwellings in these streets.

Back

After this unusual heroism and a herculean effort, the grasp of the flood two twirled the great outpauls about, and some became wedged in the windows of other houses across vacant lots. The lots were not vacant until after the first rush of waters came. The ground as was the site of houses mostly wooden and brick. Occupants of the houses rammed by the beams say they escaped to neighbors by crawling over the supports provided by nature's wealth and entering adjacent structures. In the vicinity of Vivian Avenue alone, the loss of property could be estimated into the scores of millions.

All of Riverside section was still worse in the inundation. This territory is lower than Angelina Agathia and received the brunt of the worst flood. Streets in this vicinity that survived in this location of the city presented the most ghastly scenes of destruction.

An unusual situation faced the residents of Riverside. All of the territory is below the levee that broke before the onrush of the flood down the river. With the subsiding of the flood, the water water of the flood, great lakes and ponds were left in Riverside behind the levees that still stands and the river itself was still the "Atlantic Ocean". This big lake in the river may stay for years, maybe never will recede and it seemed as if some sections of the flood remaining in the city will have to be pumped out as a sanitary and health precaution. No city except Abbeville suffered this like this like Angelina Agathia.

It could be believed that if any more than the dead persons perished in the entire city of Angelina Agathia their bodies never will be recovered, and the fact that they are missing may not be recorded as in most instances where fatalities occurred reports said entire families were wiped out. This was true of one family. The father with his mother, wife, and sister and his children and an aged aunt died in the swirl that swept by their home on Telson street. Above North Angelina Agathia. Their bodies were found in the debris near Riverside. Heavy as this flood loss in lives may be, yet it is nothing, compared to the dead dreadful loss of life in other floods. An aged man and his aged wife, and one grown child was carried away from their home with the first waters, when the flood broke loose. They were being swept down the flood when refugees in the Belden Apartment Building threw to him a rope in but he was dead when drawn to safety.

In many places throughout the flood torn city refuge camps of all sizes were established, and families set up housekeeping in tents, cooking on the open bonfires. Perilous trips around the coing of badly burning buildings, with the yawning waters of the flood below them, marked the escape of three hundred men women and children from the swathing flames that destroyed whole districts of the structures on the east and west side of Thirty Second Street, from Aberdeen to Pullaway Avenue. Then some one gave the cry of "FIRE", the persons in the buildings rushed in panic to the windows to seek aid in the streets below. None however was available, and driven by the rapidly spreading flames, the refugees retreated from the north toward the North section in the center of the district, forcing their way through hatchways, and climbing over roofs and iron and brick copings. In this manner the northern section became for a time the common place of refuge. But toward this the fire was spreading. Hemmed in on both sides with the fire spreading like an advancing furnace of the infernal regions and darkening the city with clouds of smoke almost like night, a way out by the refugees was sought across Thirty Second Street. A brave man organized the men refugees, and under his direction one of the party was let down a strong rope. He swam to the opposite side, fastened a rope in a street staircase, and then signalled his comrades behind.

Supporting the women and children, the men let themselves down from the last refuge and struggled through the torrent swept street to the other side. The stairs led to safety on the upper floor. Then the entire three hundred made their way to an ally alley and under cover of a place of safety where they remained for ten days, when they were rescued. The sentiment expressed by survivors is that they never witnessed such scenes of selflessness. Without exception the people all considered it others before themselves. Hungry men received what small rations could be secured, but divided most of them, or gave them to women and children physically able to stand long hours waiting to be served. During the flood many hundreds of babies were born in different parts of the city. In almost every instance the babies lived, the mothers getting along nicely.

Even the most graphic photographs even they could be taken of the ruins

Remained until they had to be rescued. The next day, the same priests were busy getting people to high ground. One of the last they rescued was a baby boy whom they found apparently dying at 1665 Riverside Avenue. At the time of the discovery they were taking two men to the foot of a street bridge. Permeating their two prisoners to give up the trip temporarily they carried the child about three years out of the house. The two men were taken to their destination afterwards.

In all parts of northern Angelina State which was swept by the worst flood calamity in all of the history of the country in the past and even for the full future there are since the explosions occurred three great rivers that through the concussion caused all the trouble, rivers however which never made floods before and those of course which did. They are the Kramie Run, Norma Run and the Mic-Hollester Run proper all three which move to the sea without entering other rivers. They form the natural drainage for all sections of the now flooded states previously mentioned. In fact in this story, they drain all the waters of the nation itself, and that means that an area of about as much country as Canada and United States put together is supposed to be drained by the three rivers.

The main part like Abbeville is practically all cleared and very well cultivated. The valley of the huge Kramie Run is one of the most noted of all in the nation entirely for its fertility, and beauty of its scenery. It is known all of over the nation for its natural and transportation sources its full length from the starting point even and for the way these resources have been developed. The concussion undermined levees of these rivers, and allowed the waters remaining in the past floods to be also added more so that cities once starting to show themselves above water were swept away entirely now, unless they are cities and towns of the last they are not counted now. The water over the site of Abbeville was deeper again and may now remain for a century.

However the main trouble arose along the Big Mic-Hollester Run Proper the river never affected by the war disasters before. Angelina Agathia is mentioned as being within the center of the flood zone. The city lies on the shore of the widest part of the river, and Dorothy Gale lies opposite. Jessica, Mombi, Polychrome, Osmia Trot and Betsy gobbin all of these cities are located on the Big Mic-Hollester Run and are within the grand center of the flood zone. Angelina Agathia which ranks as the first best city in all Abbeville states combined, and of Chicago and New York Size combined is well named the "Emerald City" of the nation, not of course the "Emerald city of Oz."

Angelina Agathia has about as many inhabitants as New York, San Francisco, San Francisco, and Chicago put together, and is one of the greatest manufacturing cities of the world in this story at least. She is not now. She is nothing. All factories are a total loss. That also could mean that a great many laboring people live in the city and work in the various factories. Now millions are thrown out of work for good. And this is not more true of Angelina Agathia proper than of the Northern View although the latter has but over two hundred thousand people. A little further to the south is Lucille Pickson, a city of about 1,500,000 inhabitants which had been hard hit for every flood and was harder hit now than ever. It is claimed that this city too is one of the greatest manufacturing cities next to Angelina Agathia, and yet is also not so. There are many people in all three cities, Lucille Pickson, Angelina Agathia and Dorothy Gale who are now helpless from being thrown out of work. Jessica which is a city of about seven hundred thousand inhabitants is located about thirty miles east of Angelina Agathia. It is about as hard hit as formerly. The sea that saved Angelina Agathia from being wiped out altogether stood its ground fortunately northwest of the city. The great Mic-Hollester Run Proper runs around the city in a semi circle. The flood that poured over the lower levees turned the river into an enormous racing sea but the levee which held its ground served to form a kind of dam to shut in most of the flood waters and prevent its escape, and though making conditions worse for other places prevented a torrent which could have done the same to Angelina Agathia which happened to Abbeville.

Angelina Agathia and Dorothy Gale has suffered from nearly every flood that was produced by the enemy but never before had there been one, even from natural causes which can ever the least bit reach the stage of this one.

The levees which were strong and high enough to hold back any flood, however prevented what could have happened had they given way. The same conditions which prevailed in Angelina Agathia prevailed in Dorothy Gale. The latter is even as much a workingman's town as is Angelina Agathia. Outside of the enemy not meddling with things these big rivers with their beautiful and staunch levees or without them are not treacherous. But now with all the waters for from the past floods continually entering them from unknown sources and with so much heavy rains far up north they could not barely keep their level, but then nothing even would have occurred if it had not been for the explosions produced by the enemy made forest fires. As the enemy is responsible for the fire, so for the floods as his fire fires caused the creating of the floods by the explosions.

The Glandelinian nation is treacherous. She is terribly notorious for her tendency to make great disasters upon her enemy rapidly, and without giving warning. This is the way she hopes to win a war. So far evidently she is succeeding for she has prostrated both Calvernia and Angelina States, and while holding them down is trying to hurl down the others under her feet and though not yet doing it have them nevertheless in a jeopardy that seems beyond recovery. To make sure of the outcome of the battles predicted as Christian VI victories both sides have sent secret agents and spies to investigate and learn the true facts.

But nevertheless through these flood and fire and explosion disaster it is evidently that Glandelinia has the nationals at least so staggered by losses that to gain any control or to regain her feet Abbeville will have to go through a lot or otherwise she will be receiving the last blow and stagger off to defeat like the whipped prize fighter in the ring. Abbeville is getting licked.

Burch

A daring man on horseback in rescuing fifteen children in West Angelina Agathia had a fatal mishap with a ten year old child in his arms. He had been carrying the little girl with him astride or in his arms beginning when the flood in that locality was only about twenty inches or more deep. He had just carried other children to a point of safety and was making his trip with the older child. The water was so deep in the street by this time that he had to go along the cement walks. Coming to a wide cross street, his horse stepped cautiously down into a gutter from the curb and was about to cross to the other side, when in the darkness, the horse, and man and child discovered an enormous object bearing down upon them. It reached clear across the wide street, diagonally, and with and was coming with terrific force in the swift current. The child screamed, the horse whirled and leaped upon the curb again, just as the tremendous flood washed by without a foot to spare. They however were just a little too late, the horses legs were broken and the three were engulfed together in a desperate tangle of deep water, all already by that time impassable.

The first death from drowning in the flooded district occurred when Father Rhodes, son of Samson go Rhodes, 1937 Heldonia Street, and his companion priest were killed while walking in Center Street near the east end to a Fair Ground. Rhodes according to his companion was going out on a sick call and the flood surprised them quickly giving both no time to save themselves. His companion was rescued but Father Rhodes perished. A six year little girl and her ten year old brother of North Avenue had a tale to tell which many could not hardly believe. She and her brother were both found floating alive in the attic of a tall house. Later when their father and mother were rescued from a house in which they had remained for many days without food. The father said he held the children in his arms while floating down with the flood until his muscles were benumbed. The children then slipped into the current. How the two children got into the attic is an unsolved mystery. The body of an old man, in invalid was found in a floating reclining chair. Her hands were folded on her lap. Two hundred and sixty seven persons famished, too warm for comfort, all but dead, were taken from the third story of a block at Hendon and Grosvenor street, where they had been held captive by the water as long as the flood continued. All of them upheld by the nervous strain, still asped when rescuers lifted them into boats. Hundreds of others equally exhausted were taken from homes on Grosby street.

As always indicating how uncertain the figures are as to hundreds of persons killed in this flood, it can be stated that a most careful survey in all big cities was made a week after the flood receded, revealing the names of hundreds of persons missing. Not more than ten per cent of these could have been in flooded houses not previously searched or cleaned, and the remainder were given up as dead.

Where bodies were found sand and mud had been piled high over them. Three of these were found together where a human hand was thrust out of a heap of sand. One body was that of a little girl. Two others were old men, whose hands were clasped together, while proceeding down with the flood from Angelina Agathia and engaged on a mission of mercy. The row boat or launch pulled rowboat which saved many lives at Angelina Agathia, was wrecked at Mombi, a great distance below Angelina Agathia. After engaging in relief work for several days in the city of Angelina Agathia it was decided to look out for citizens of other towns below the "Gem city of Angelina". A long trailer was loaded with supplies, and the boat the engine of which was in charge of the engineer started down the smoother part of the flood.

With those carrying the provisions were two doctors who had performed heroic work in the stricken city of Angelina Agathia. At Jessica Jessica the two coats safely passed over the smoother part of the flood, but the trailer was caught. The result was that the launch was upset in the terrific current, and many of the provisions dumped into the water when the trailer cap tumbled. The three men were life preservers. They were drawn under several times and had to fight for their lives. The life preservers saved them however. When picked up below Jessica by some rescuers who rowed out to them in a skiff, the three men were unconscious. They soon revived however, and were able to reach home the following day.

How a brave woman of Angelina Agathia torn between her duty to her parents and to her children saved her children by flight through the gathering flood at Angelina Agathia, and succeeded in reaching safety in a convent in the heart of the flooded business district of Angelina Agathia, with a real drama dramatic chapter to the incidents of the flood worth writing here.

Her name as we can recall was Mrs Jennie Bales. She had been living with her parents, as well as her husband, within one hundred feet of the river, and on the opposite side of the main section of the city itself.

All that time while the water of the river was rising from the flood it rolled from the outside, she had been nervous and walked the floor. At six a m in the morning before the ringing of fire bells, and the blowing of factory whistles all over the city which sounded a warning everywhere, men were in the street with lanterns, pounding on the doors and warning all to leave the neighborhood and go to higher ground or higher buildings. Her parents who had lived so long by the river were unwilling to believe the danger was great having confidence in the creek. But the water was coming elsewhere from the onrushing flood which was to inundate the river itself and make it become a sea. The woman decided that these two big cities, there was coming the warning of pestilence, disease, and famine. Yet there was a long time before the end would come, for all over the adjacent territories waters as turbulent as those of the great Abbeinn Flood, wrought terrible havoc in Jessica again, Mombi, New Emerald City, Goidna Junction, Olinda Junction, Ozma, Betsy Bobbin, Trot, Chamberlane, Gosa, Topsy, and a hundred other places. Indeed if the author was to overwhelm every Library, and printing and all kinds of book companies and stores with millions of my own volumes these awful big cities, and makes others in countless millions alone, while crowding out all their own books, and then still have hundreds of millions of books of the same size at large, I would not have written one tenth the words in my efforts to depict the horror of it all, nor can any effort on my part dare conceive the loss to any amount of perfection.....

Fortunately however in Angelina Agathia from the flood itself, not could counting the explosion shocks, shocks the loss of life was small only a little more than five hundred having been drowned, but the property loss was absolutely immeasurable, while in cities round about there was an added seven hundred to the death toll. Many others of course were unaccounted for. The loss of lives though exceedingly small in comparison to that of other great floods and disasters in the past was but an unusual incident of this devastating calamity.

The heartache, the inconvenience of it all, the still heated atmosphere, the continued twilight darkness, the fog from forest fire among the unendurable hardships, the suffering, and now from the effects of the past, and this disaster the nation wide damage are absolutely so far, far beyond comprehension whatever.

Throughout the nation every Abbeinnian spoke of the loss in cents plus the dollars and with a commercial sense of proportion place the loss only within a day of the disaster in the affected territory alone at something above $ 256,777,858.. But these are empty figures..

Even what estimates of any value could be put upon the services of those lost in all the disasters past, and the flood, or the curtailed earning capacity of all those crippled and injured in the mad rush of water, or those laid up for life and killed in the prodigious battles just gone. Who also can tell what silent mills would have given to employers, and employees and what the world in this story has lost in the wide spread destruction of crops, the cessation of business, railroad transportation, the seige of the western sea ports, and the millions suffering from famine because aid cannot reach them...

Horror beyond telling, with perise persistent and recurrent reports of additional complications of calamities in the way of reservoirs bursted by the convulsions, the terrible breaking out of disease, the starving of added hundreds of thousands, added destruction by fire, and the facing of more spreading of the famine caused by past disasters, and millions suffering from pestilence were pictured for homeless nations full of people within a short time after the water broke its bonds.. and help from other points cut off by forest fires, and all ruined railroad transportation destroyed by past calamities.

Over a major portion of the city of Angelina Agathia at the early part of the flood, water flowed and roared, at depths from sixteen to thirty feet. Neither person nor property was respected and in the early stages the peculiar geographical situation of so great a city caused those who sought to give relief, an unusual amount of difficulty.....

Angelina Agathia which is the size of New York and Chicago put together in this story is divided like Vivian Wickey. Central Angelina Agathia comprising the downtown districts of dwellings, and one hundred and five mills, and two hundred and sixty six factories. West Angelina Agathia, the territory extending west of the Big Angeline Run, the portion that was shaken so disastrously by the terrific explosion, the river and Riverview the Northwest across the river from the Central district, the former section most disastrously shaken, Angelina Agathia paradise View in the extreme extreme North also shaken badly, Northeastern District, manufacturing manufacturing districts in which the nut munition plants are located and separated from the Central districts by lowlands which were deepest in the flood waters, south Angelina Agathia, southwest of the business did district across the river from the business section. The other two sections, comprise the southeast--the districts of the Imperial Courts, the home of violet, and her sisters, and royal Palaces, southwest, the main Riverview district which was most disastrously shaken.

The river forms a big horseshoe through the whole Central portion of the city which therefore made it impossible to reach that portion until the torrents pl pouring down the valley had receded. The sections devastated by the explosions are the only sections between which communications were possible, and these were paradise view, West Angelina Agathia and Riverview districts. In this interlaced city of streams like Vivian Wickey is it any wonder that with wildy the widely recognized horror of the flood found little detailed description above the whole nation in a dozen days following the rising of the waters.

Practically practically half of Angelina Agathia is under th under water from thirty to forty feet according to the reports of the meager dispatches and all other messages. At the lowest estimates one hundred lives have been lost. The city was for months and months without electric lights, street car and water service. It would be for that long time maybe within a years time to estimate the great damage. It exceeds all others combined. There is from immeasurable report, equally immeasurable suffering, and all the other people are in need of food and Nothing. All the bridges have been swept away. There will be no kind of communication with the outside world for more than a year. Hundreds of thousands of persons were caught in their homes with all avenues of escape cut off, and not only were they marooned by the flood but endangered by the fire that broke out in the various buildings. The floods are still extending and rising, and the terrible forest fire elsewhere is devastating all the land not touched by the flood. A hundred million trees are said to be burning by the hour.

Such were the fragmentary details which I presume came first to the world after the flood moved through Paulish Junction a small town with a telegraph relay station sixteen or seventeen miles south southeast of Angelina Agathia by a single telephone wire which then was the only link with the outside world. Of course all of Angelina Agathia were inundated and numberless thousands were marooned in buildings, on house-tops, and in trees where they watched in the murky twilight the muddy waters swirl by carrying away millions of pieces of furniture, hundreds of human bodies and dead animals, and all a manner of debris, for many weeks none was able to tell what the awful situation was or what would be the final ultimate outcome, even the Governor of Angelina Agathia being unable to obtain any amount of exact information with all the facilities of the State and Nation at his command, as will indicate by his descriptive statement of the general conditions, six sixteen days after the flood started, appealing to the world in general the Governor said:—

"TO MY NOTION, the exact extent of this enemy made New flood so suddenly manifesting itself in Northern Angelina Agathia will never be known, and with all other disasters of the past, keeping our nation in jeopardy in accordance of taking taking care of homeless, and with 10,000 big forest fires raging the situation indeed is terrible and our nation seems at state. Now with this flood devastating one of our capital cities. Every hour impresses the whole nation with the uncertainty of the worse situation the world has ever faced. The waters have assumed unknown heights in many parts of the State, as well as four or five others, and in such proportion is the flood gaining that it will be hardly less than a tremendous miracle from Heaven if villages and towns are not wiped out of existence by the hundreds in all parts of Northern Angelina Agathia. The fire storm is moving south of east, and is a forest fire of proportions that make a person think that the last day of the world is near, and according to messages I have received, Jessica, Poly Church and Gema cities are in its path. Not a burning and so is Betty Bobbin according to reports. The fire is very severe now, though some portions have gone under control because of the nature of the flood.

Please give all efforts to appeal for help. It is my judgement that there has never been such a tragedy in the history of our country, or rather such a series of tragedies since Early 1912. Pandora for a time was the center of all activities in behalf of our stricken cities and country, but now all communications is cut off from her by the forest fire. And every hour has apparently been filled with a record breaking accumulation of dramatic circumstances. The most pitiful appeals have been made also by the scores of thousands of fire fighters, who could not get over to fight the spreading forest fires in Watson, Henrietta, and Roberts and Hendrick Counties because they were either cut off or surrounded by the floods, and portions are unavailing. In Nickson and Watson and Hendrick Counties the forest fire is far beyond control and the heat is felt for forty miles according to reports, and the flames advance with the speed of a storm. The marooned populations in the flooded cities are also confronted by approaching conflagrations, especially in the cities of Dorothy Gale, Angelina Agathia and Henrietta and also Lucille Nickson. Every human energy has been throughout this season of disasters and complications of disasters to give relief but so many other disasters have occurred in the past that the measure of assistance has been small because of destroyed communications. It is my belief that it will be weeks before those imprisoned in the houses of all flooded cities and towns can be relieved or rescued and it is planned to use all strong ships for the purpose if they can be obtained. Every priest and Catholic layman in the city is making offerings, saying prayers, and offering Masses for rain in the hope of quenching forest fires, but we advise them for the present for heavens sake not to call for rain with such floods raging. Rather face the forest fires than the flood.

The disaster began after a warning signal from all localities advising there was starting a most dangerous flood all over North Angelina Agathia. The first levee to give out from the concussion was that of the Iner Interstate River in which there had been a dangerous rise from the waters of the receding floods elsewhere, and what other rumors arose from some reservoirs bursting because of the heat of the fires then raging in those regions. All towns along its source including Morning Glory Viviananna, and Santa Maria were advised. Before a week had passed the situation assumed a most critical aspect at all of these towns, and beautiful bridges were swept away.

The loss of lives is uncertain because all kinds of communications ceased, because of flood and forest fire. Santa Maria cannot be reached but it is safe to assume that the same awful and devastating results at these places were carried on to Angelina Agathia. A flood of the Galveston (America) type developed in the Marshes and St. Ann Valleys in Northwestern Angelina Agathia but the damage to life and property is nothing compared with the terrible destruction in the extreme North and parts southern California. In many aspects the situation at Angelina Agathia is absolutely without parallel. This city and also Dorothy Gale and many others are unable to send to the outside world the smallest idea of the real loss. South Angelina Agathia reported a loss of one hundred and fifty lives. Later precisely the same situation was reported from Riverview, West Angelina Agathia and other points which are almost completely under water, and the House of the Central districts were or are so deep in the flood that great destruction of property and loss of life certainly ensued there.

On the high lands of north and east Angelina Agathia pockets were developed and people were drowned in apparent elevated districts where it did seem naturally impossible. The water at sixteenth and Center streets which is thirty five to forty feet above the elevations in the business districts reported fifteen to twenty feet of water. At this time a sea of waters wild and turbulent and one hundred miles wide was sweeping past and through all sections of the city, and dozens of houses were being taken away. Telephone communications was wiped out before the first day of the flood was over and attempts to restore them met with disaster. Some had belief that the loss of life had been over-estimated but confirmed reports showed that the known dead was 100.

This so evening of the 21st, the Governor and others cannot resist the belief, that when all estimates are made the loss of life will not be less than 10,000. The Angelina Agathia river enters Angelina Agathia directly from the northeast, separating North Angelina Agathia from the section known as Riverview. It then makes a complete turn southwest in a long curve, and runs about one mile and a quarter before it turns directly south to join with that of the Krimlie River making a right angle to the south straight. These bends because of the breaks of the levees have been the undoing of the city. Not until six days after the beginning of the disaster was it apparent that between 10,000,000 and 12,000,000 in the two big cities, and towns are pinned up in the business houses and sky scrapers Hotels and all other big houses making it apparent that the flood came so quickly that no one had time to leave the cities and towns.

The city hall of our fair city is patrolled by the militia outside on the roof and inside and it is so situated as to enable the officers to make more or less accurate estimates of the numbers of people marooned in their houses and on the house-tops. A great fire broke out in the square bounded by St. Andrew, Main Street, Twenty Third, and Thirty Third streets soon after the flood reached its worst. The flames were not long first in a dry goods store. It swept southward burning the portions of the houses above the water and then partly burned St. Peter's Catholic Church. The flames then spread northward through the wholesale districts, consuming the upper parts of wholesale houses.

The fire is still burning day and night, and day by day. We were advised by telephone that immense droves of people were seen on the roofs of many of the big buildings of the fire endangered section, and that they were running and jumping from one structure to another, keeping safely away from the flames. The water at this time was said to have dropped to about three feet in that part of the city. I have also received many appeals over telegraph that unless boats were sent at once from some parts of the stricken districts it would be evident that the loss of life would be something terrible notwithstanding the tremendous destruction of property. On the evening of the 21st it developed that rescue work was being completed at short intervals. Two big hotels immediately across the street from the city's post office was on fire the third time but as often the fire had been put out.

It was also reported to me from the Angelina Agathia daily times that six big houses, property or probably factories were black with people standing on the roofs looking and making for safety points as various parts of the factories were aflame. South of the stricken districts is another wholesale section and it developed that about one hundred and thirty six women and thirty children were in several of the big buildings and that it was rumored these buildings were on fire. At about four o'clock the flames leaped across Thirty Third street, and attacked the districts bounded by Thirty Third, Thirty Second, Fourteenth, Thirteenth, and Main Street.

Six blocks of houses were destroyed within two hours by the fire, the flames still spread and another tremendous sacrifice in human life was imminent. One hundred and sixty men in other buildings however succeeded in rescuing the women and the children by aid of a block tackle getting them into other houses which were considered fire proof structures.

Instructions have been given from many post points to the militia, and others in many parts of Angelina Agathia to give vigilant eye to the districts that were on fire and if the flames started in the direction of the Angelina Agathia post office to risk passage through the turbulent flood which is now running through the city with strong boats. The Naval militia with 1,000 boats leaves tonight at midnight. The Grand National Life Saving Crews with equipment will arrive at Angelina Agathia by way of the Angelina River to night. We are greatly alarmed by the report from the St. Michael Reservoir that the wind had changed to the north and the water is beating against the banks of the south shore of the flood, and the concussion weakened dam which has been standing the pressure of the flood for sixteen days. If the reservoir should give way then the wildest imagination could probably not bring an accurate impression of what will happen in Angelina Agathia.

Handbook
Back

from all over the Abbeville nation responses have come from all populations, trades, and professions. The appalling nature of the tragedy is now being understood. By this new series of disasters, railroad communications are more seriously interrupted with, and dreadfully handicapped, with even now in Angelina state and a dozen others, and it is very imperative that assistance be given if possible by telephone, mail, and other means. The Abbeville and other will have completed or complete organizations at all affected points. Serious trouble is reported, even to day from many places. Damage has been broken by the sun which is at all places. Trains have been asked for and the issue of life within the whole flooded district is being reported gradually. We are not able to tell at even get any kind of an accurate idea of the loss of life in the other five states or the hundreds and hundreds of abandoned towns and cities not yet heard from.

Even southern California is so completely isolated that the whole nation fears the worst is done.

In Miami-Mini Junction it is said that there is some improvement in the awful situation. At this point it is said the flood is slowly receding but other regions near by is being closed in by some big fire of a forest and Miami-Mini is again in greatest danger and the worst there is life in the night and day.

But nevertheless it is feared that when the waters leave this city like the flood, even if the forest fire does not mean a loss of life will come to light for many many were said to have been killed in wreckage of buildings that are still alive before the sunbeams, but that the floodwaters at the time the blast raised the town giving no one time to remove the injuries of the bodies under the debris, and also with full sight of the main railroad depot, sixteen men, five women and three children have been clinging to a tree for thirty nine hours and yet the receding waters are too swift to make their rescue possible, and they are suffering terribly by the heat.

Every effort has been made by the National government to aid the life, food, medicine, and other help in such dire times. There is one large building two miles and six of them across said to contain contain all the food, medicine, and the Indians, and still are that they will collapse before the flood in a very short time and then within parish if not rescued on time. Six men who were seen using a large boat had passed themselves into the rescue service at any risk whatever. In Angelina Agathia 10,000 buildings in the southwest portion of the town were destroyed by the fire and the fire is still burning.

Indications are, there will be much loss of life before enough help can arrive to get people to places of safety. A relief committee which met on the south side of Miami, and coming to Angelina Agathia to give aid reported five hundred dead and one million two hundred thousand homeless. Many dead bodies were floating past. There is a great danger of the spread also of the mighty plague, the plague of consumption, complications of diseases among the homeless and refugees, and of the plague of forest fires, and flood horrors and other complications of disasters. The river Evangelina St. Clair had or has been falling steadily and threatens to drain it all itself entirely through the broken levees. If this happens Evangelina St. Clair and Maria cities will be in a serious situation, and that situation is a shortage of water supply as they get the water from the river only.

Such is the flood and unusual view of this most awful situation obtained in the most conservative official official sources. Not even any stretch of the wildest imagination save some probabilities regarding the loss of lives in the early hours of the great flood could ever in a million books give any accurate description of the scene more terrible and yet more awful inspiring than that which maintained in either Angelina Agathia and nearby also cities combined.

One of the best tales of scenes from the flood was that of a member of a gang of teamsters working at the Grand Union Ice Cream and Sherbert company. The factory was within six blocks of Fifth Avenue where the flood made its first appearance. The factory heads fearing that they would be flooded around the alarm simultaneously with the first onrush of the flood, when the horses of every wagon which were hitched in record time reached the street they were met by a wall of water thirty feet in height. The drivers were forced to turn and flee in the opposite direction to save their teams and wagons and also themselves. The water poured like the invasion of the sea into the streets which became raging torrents.

Many buildings within the various parts of the flood were so insecure that they left their foundations within an hour with hundreds of people in them. And what were districts of thickly strewn two and three and even five story buildings may even up to ten story buildings, factories and residences and the like occupied mostly by hard working people were now only shattered lumber or broken brick and debris piles partly above water and more water. The horrors witnessed in the flooded district was heightened by more than hundreds of big fires within three days which could be seen but which were at of reach of the fire fighters.

A terrific fire which started through a mysterious explosion in a block long factory where tar was manufactured near 40th Avenue Street spread to and totally burned the block on Central Park Avenue West from Columbia Street. Also flames starting at Madison and Center streets, jumped Center Street and thousands of houses on the other side were soon one mass of fire in the middle of the street.

sets a line of frame houses that had been washed from their foundations for a short time they were washed about, or dashed against one another, and then as though to aid in the burning of the section by fire they were sent into the path of the flames. And to make matters more thrilling still these floating houses were crisscrossed with flood flames, who took someone with swimming the flood than perishing in the fire. With the greatest difficulty they were rescued, but all were saved. Other persons endangered by the fire hurried from roof to roof where they had been driven by the flood to the roof tops of adjoining adjoining houses only to be forced still further on as they also began to either catch on or tumble to pieces before the pressure of the flood.

One survivor who had been a surgeon of the 14th Regiment of General Vivian Army and who had been recalled by the government to aid persons of past disasters, and reached Angelina Agathia, just in time to participate in the flood horror now going on, said that he saw many thousands of dead bodies floating in the flooded streets, and many people swimming, but there was not one chance in one hundred thousand that these were saved. The water through some mystery, was becoming at evening, hot and the current more terrible.

"The tremendous flood of this proportion," he related "even when millions of persons were in the streets of the cities and towns, even then preparing for a flood that might come with or without warning. Why should they not be prepared even though the levees had always protected them before the war was not the only devastating devastating them and the whole country? Why should not the whole nation be alarmed? Had not Angelina Agathia three or four times already been menaced by a flood? And who had not been flooded every time when there was a flood in disaster? The reason because so many had been prepared, few in numbers had been carried away by their deaths. How few of course no one knows. In one district of Angelina Agathia, and in many cities and towns it was stated at various military headquarters headquarters that despite the fact of the flood thousands of bodies could be seen under the remains of the apparently immovable wreckage caused by the combination of the rapids and a hard storm, and these a foot sticking out from the water.

Greater efforts were directed for days despite the flood in attempts to get at these bodies but few were recovered. The desperate work and efforts to extend success to the marooned inhabitants of the flooded districts brought the need of many boats of all various kinds including row boats, skiffs, barges, canoes, gasoline launch boats and others which made their way with extreme difficulty among the masses of wreckage, and overturned houses among tangled masses of telephones, telegraph and electric lines seeking but possible victims who had been carried for. Among many of the organizations engaged in the rescue work was a company of the members of the Gemini under the command of Captain C. B. Almond. The company of Gemini members from reached Angelina Agathia on a special motor boat on which they boarded at Evangelina St. Clair, and immediately launched a large number of boats in the raging torrents which were for two months sweeping the city from end to end. In to even collect on the tenth day of the flood the Gemini had been constantly on duty and had to their credit a total of 7,500 lives saved and often they were not thinking of any more sleep than was necessary when night came on, and those who needed sleep took turns with those so that the work could keep in on. One was in command of boats with three boats rescued 1,000 persons from the business section and that district immediately west of Central Avenue and west of St. Andrew Street. Many of the people were taken from their homes only after the Gemini members had mounted the tops of partly or partially overturned houses and chopped their way through to the attics where the inmates were huddled together waiting for death to come. Another crew of the Gemini aided by a large number of citizens under the direction of the mayor succeeded in saving 3,700 lives while three boats in command of Captain Thompson, rescued 1,300 persons after great difficulty and working in a greatly heated atmosphere. The majority of these later or latter were taken from floating houses, long in a box cars, warehouses, freight sheds, factories and even grain elevators, and mills in and near the railroad yards.

It was here that the water was deepest and attained its most greatest speed—via violence rushing in tremendous whirlpools between the irregular buildings on either side of the tracks. On account of many submerged box cars and passenger coaches, flat cars, overturned sheds and floating wreckage in huge jams a navigation was almost extremely dangerous.

Many times the rescuers were tempted but managed to keep with their boats and fight them again. Not a single life was lost either among the rescuers or among the thousands they rescued, or attempted to rescue in vain. While hundreds worked incessantly in that heated atmosphere to save lives, the supreme person, Andrew Miners, such as in establishing a supply station on west St. Francis Street where many refugees had congregated on what was then higher ground and while preparing to issue rations to the suffering was the relief station with all the provisions except away, the refugees having many narrow escapes.

Only those doing relief work or having means to do other acts usually were not victims of the flood. Even after the flood had receded the unfortunate city was thoroughly policed. The city was in darkness for six months, day and night after the flood, and because of this it was impossible to do a much relief work of any kind and for the sake of safety means a curfew order was put under too effect, mainly as a means of keeping the men where they could protect their property and home hold articles if necessary. Over on the North side of Angelina Agathia, too where six times a relief station had been established only to be swept away many thousands of people, the Valley of the shadow of death in the night, when the horrors of that valley was added by an untimely flood, which was trying to spread toward the "Bottomless pit." Naturally every one was on the watch, and you can just imagine that the strain was tremendous since scarcely a person slept during the entire trip. Perhaps the calmest persons were the smallest of the child passengers who were on my car. They thought the scenes of the flood which they witnessed here and there during the trip back as there, and here and there was very interesting, and of course we all looked out for them, and told them that everything was all right."

Back.

Now everything for many hundreds of miles it could have been the same story with all thought reverting to both Dorothy Gale and Angelina Agathia the centre of the scene. Here the flood like a ravaging tidal wave carrying all before it grew and grew. With the levees being destroyed six men perished on them they having been there on guard. In every street of the land a section of Angelina Agathia pedestrians scampered into the buildings and ran to the upper floors. Thousands of houses and many wagons were carried away. The flood was by this time spreading into other sections with unusual swiftness and thousands upon thousands of buildings were washed from their foundations. Frame structures innumerable were carried down, and these in numerous places became jammed between other structures, mainly in Angelina Agathia proper and thus formed dams in the streets and wide squares which tended to thereby swell the enormous wall or sea of water back of them.

The swirling current carried down all telegraph lines by this time and every telephone line excepting the one wire connecting Angelina Agathia with Junction. Apparently as far as can be ascertained every telegraph girl excepting one fled from the main Telephone Exchange building at Angelina Agathia, but that one girl in who ever she might be stood by her post bravely, saw the flood rise above her, saw the carcasses of animals float by her windows, counted the bodies of men and women as they were swept by, and sent messages to the outside world until that line went down in the torrent. But because of the girl when the line failed is yet to come of the flooded city.....

Efforts were begun soon after the flood increased to a dangerous portion to dynamite the bridges across the rivers in the hopes of releasing the pressure back of them but the bridges were carried away before they could be dynamited and this released an immense storage of water in the streets back of them. This added to a new crest for the flood below and swept away buildings by the districts, all with refugees in them, before it. And crowded in the upper stories of tall office buildings and residences in Angelina Agathia two miles or so each day from the center of the city were scores of thousands of persons whom it was impossible to reach or approach.

At St James Street three miles and a half from which has heretofore been considered the danger line of water, the flood was running fourty eight feet deep. Thousands of fires which were impossible to fight were still raging. And now most of the rescue boats were unable to get further from the shore of the flood than the three line would permit. They couldn't live in the current.

Six men were drowned in or while in attempts of rescue. The body of a ten year old girl floated down near Riverside Avenue in the morning but the current was so swift that it could not be recovered.

THE FLOOD SPREADS STILL MORE. MOST APPALLING
DISASTER. HUNDREDS OF BOATS TO THE RESCUE..... FAMINE THREATENS
THE WHOLE OF CALVERINIA..... AN OCEAN OF WATER ALL OVER THE LAND, BUT NOT A SINGLE DROP TO DRINK..... NO SHOULDS AT WORK IN THIS DISASTER. DEAD ANIMALS AND HORSES IN CITY STREETS. SANITARY PRECAUTIONS THAT BECOME MOST EXTREME..... ATTEMPTS TO SENT RELIEF TRAINS AND PROVISIONS
..... IN VAIN..... THRILLING EXPERIENCES.....

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

IN THE VERY FIRST beginning of the flood some of the idea of the great idea of the great terror that reached the hearts of a whole nation of men women and children can be explained and recollected and reflected as from a looking glass in the weird descriptions based on speculation and judgement warped by fear. While the cities of Angelina Agathia and Dorothy Gale and many others were in the midst of raging torrent with Angelina Agathia being in the centre of a flood more than one hundred and fifty miles wide in which no one could say whether any would live there came a cry that the "Fish Pond" reservoir hundreds of millions of gallons of water had broken before the concussion and was adding its contents to the water of the streams already pouring through the gaps left by the broken levees. First alarms of the breaking of the reservoirs were spread by countryfolk who had posted themselves on the edge of the flood district.

Then there were others quick to take up the cry and hundreds of thousands of men women and children crowded the streets in horror and confusion. Thousands of them fled straight for the hills, but thousands more hurried themselves past guards into main buildings which were havens in very high grounds. Not until a few priests had addressed the frightened throng was any semblance of order restored. Other who were appointed military aides in the southeast districts of the city with control under martial law calmed others and got them safely to the upper stories. The Mayor of the city at once gave orders that every available wagon should scour the farming districts outside the flood zone and confiscate all available supplies of food. And while the few farmers in this vicinity not in the flood zone have contributed so heavily and their bins are nearly empty it is hoped to obtain enough to grow potatoes and vegetables to prevent a famine and immediate starvation in the city proper. And also a small portion of the citizens of Angelina Agathia from their refuge on the highest point in the city anxiously were waiting to learn the fate of at least the city's entire number of inhabitants hemmed in by raging flood waters and menaced by fire that was sweeping for a long time through different districts of the city. Although a little more than two miles from the city, or from the section where there had been reports of a great loss of life, countless hundreds of willing men and even women wishing to do rescue work looked on helplessly.

The Governor of Angelina State tried to telegraph the Governor of Calvernia in an early report that special emphasis be given the great need of immediate supplies, of provisions. There is not a full days supply of food or any kind of provisions in the city, and because of every kind of communication being cut off by the flood, and forest fire there is none likely in sight, and before night it is likely that more than 1,000,000 persons who have been held in the upper rooms of higher buildings and on roofs or in the down town districts districts without food or water for nearly six days will be released, and there will be no provisions for them nor place to care for them, the heat caused by the distant or near forest fires continually continues to smelter the flood stricken city, the strange twilight darkness continues without abatement, and the water probably because of the fires sweeping along the banks of the streams which have burst through their levees, have so heated the water that even here in the streets to be submerged means scalding to death.

"Horrible Horrible as this is," said the Governors of both States "The real suffering will grow worse for days. As bad as the flood is it is not blamed on the flood such much as broken communications. The fires cut off all communication and prevent the bringing of aid. Because of the flood there are 145,000,000 homeless, and these are without aid because of the hindering forest fires which prevents any kind of relief reaching them. No country in all the world yet faced such a situation. We have airplanes abundance to use but these cannot be used as they would have to cross the fire zone which is suicide.

The refugees are being fed from hand to hand or mouth to mouth with even less than enough food supply to last a day for all of them. There is no pure water, and there is no light by day nor by night. And already within a day there has been bodies of many thousands of houses floating in the water ready to decompose in the muddy streets when the waters should recede, and it will be impossible to even care for the bodies of the dead men women or children. And within scores and scores of millions already made homeless because of other disasters the nation faces a very serious crisis. The crowded south side of the Angelina river where there may be thousands of foreigners dead or dying lay far beyond reach.

Angelina Agathia has never been so hurt hit, neither any other flood torn city of any other disaster yet outside of Abilene. No one seems to speak of it, yet the immediate needs of the known survivors call for every attention. The situation is extremely desperate. If Angelina Agathia, and southern towns of the northern section of the flood state is relieved it may permit the city and state authorities to get together with the militia and relief committees and make some organized attempt to give aid to all relieved district a by some means whatever, especially if transportation can be accomplished from the south. Except for a solitary branch of the Mid-Holleston Pandora, and the Holleston, the railroad over which a single train can creep cautiously at a time, railroad communication cannot be for months and months restored. It takes fourteen hours for a train to come up over this line from Gertrude Angeline City a distance only a little less than twenty miles. If the flood increases this line too will be wiped out. It's the only line open from the south, all other railroad lines being inundated.....

Back

et. St.,

24. 370

Mayor Turns Calles of Monbi city had been urged again and again to see that a train load of supplies be kept constantly on the move on this road before things turn out so that it too becomes destroyed. An effort, and a very desperate one has also been made to induce all who are able and who can find outside places of refuge far from flood and forest fires to leave the city and regions as fast as the train service will permit. Great heat, smothering atmosphere from smokes of great fires and at times terrific lights, and great winds, and unusual darkness added to the terror of the flood elements. Thousands of refugees are being taken out by hundreds from the great Angel Guardianage school on the street in Angeline Agathia of same name.

As said before the weather is intolerably hot for this time of the year adding to the suffering of those hundreds of thousands who have been trapped on the top of their homes since the levees broke before the concussion. Even during the early hours of the third day of the flood any estimate of the number who had perished under the ruins of houses leveled by explosion concussion in Angeline Agathia would have been mere guess work as most of that with all the bodies might have been swept away. The loss in life caused by the flood was small. Hundreds of thousands had been marooned, how many have survived no one knows. The streets soon became basins for swirling torrents in which it had been more than difficult to sent boats of any size and impossible to send small boats. Those safe from the flood faced starvation and simply had to wait until the water subsided. Sixteen expert oarsmen took boats in parts of Thirty Fifth and center streets and persons in every building pleaded with them to either save them or bring food and drinking water. They did not traverse the portions where the fires were raging, word was received that motor and other boats with men to operate them were coming from Big Girlknool and a few from Henrietta cities.

Two or three oarsmen, James Henrika, George nders, and Polsonia Talbear who who braved the current that swirled through the business section of the city reported that the water at the Turneo Hotel at the southeast corner of Fourteenth and Galtis Street was five hundred and fifteen feet deep. From many windows in the hotels and business and other tall buildings thousands upon thousands of marooned persons begged piteously for food and water. At the intense intersection of these streets and at other points they said they saw houses and many small structures drift swiftly down between imposing office and other tall buildings that formed banks for the muddy torrents. Yet by careful steering and strong rowing they penetrated almost to the centre of the big city. Their route was St Peters Street to thirty seventh, up thirty seventh, to One hundred and eleventh, thence to Maldon Street, street, to Linden, where people yelled to us frantically to rescue them or bring them food, but it was impossible, for we were barely to keep afloat, ourselves the governor and others who accompanied them.

Immense enormous amounts of money were offered to men on boats to take persons off from all kinds of perilous positions. The windows of many tall and smaller buildings towering above the flood waters were filled with faces of mostly women and children and the same condition prevailed at many other buildings. We gave records of seeing bodies floating past but feared that the loss of life nevertheless was great. Hundreds of oarsmen who worked in the outskirts of the flooded sections within easy view of the mobilization camps reported that there were 10,000,000 soldiers marooned in their half shattered barracks, and 200,000, in the barracks of the mobilization camp at Dorothy Dorothy gale, they begged for water, while rescued children in the same barracks were crying for milk and food. These oarsmen who braved the tide in all sections of the submerged city came back nerve racked or wrecked to tell narratives of pitiable appeals made to them by thousands of marooned in upper floors of many tall buildings about whose lower stories swirled a flood that threatened to undermine the foot foundations of the structures.....

The dark colors in the narrative were somewhat lightened here and there by stories of bravery showed by hordes of prisoners of the flood. An old lady with her husband and three or four little girls and six boys with her were marooned in the upper floor of her home not far from ploverview garden and she called to one of the oarsmen!!!!

"Oh Mr., know it is impossible for you to take us off," she cried. But for the love of God and humanity please take this small basket of food to Francis and Hurns down an Algrove street. I know she and her family is starving....."

Six times the boatmen made desperate attempts to take the flood but waves that added about the submerged house hurled them back. Large amounts were also offered these boatmen to rescue the family. Their narrative inspired then a more desperate effort to launch a boat for navigation in the flood but after fourteen hours of it the craft had been unable to pass beyond areas reached already reached on the fringes of the flooded district.

On the north side of the Angeline River the water stood seventy feet deep in a large section of the city lying across the river, when the rush from the break in some of the levees came. Whether any of the buildings in that location withstood the pressure of the water is beyond knowing. A gang of men went by boat through the city at different times instructing people on upper floors to put out all candle lights for fear of gas explosions or more fires. On account of this flood, as well as the fire and other disasters Angeline Agathia, and Dorothy Galt cities were practically practically cut off from wire and other communications for two months. Then one wire into Big Girlknool was obtained, and soon operators plunged into great piles of telegrams from Angeline Agathia citizens in the former city almost frantic in their desires to learn if friends and relatives were safe. Operators at opposite ends of the wire reported that thousands of telegrams were piled up at relay offices. These were all from people anxious over friends and relatives in Angeline Agathia alone.

Excepting one railroad bridge all such structures leading into the big city were washed away. Hundreds of missing members of families were restored to their loved ones by commissioned relief camp headquarters established at many points on high ground on the edge of the tremendous flood. Also at human clearing houses.

Hundreds of great ledgers filled with names, presided over by all kinds of clerks were at the disposal of persons seeking missing relatives and friends. If the latter had registered in these places their names and addresses were given to the inquirers. Since the beginning of this new and awful disaster up ward of three hundred thousand homeless had been housed in different places of refuge out side of the flood zone most of them being cared for at flood refugee camps. Scores of thousands of flood victims were being carried from their places of imprisonment, and leaders of the rescuing parties were arranged for relays of torch bearers to light the work during day and night, tending at times so dark even in midday. All refugee camps available were filled with cots and means for providing food food for the sufferers. After ten days grueling work at great peril volunteer rescuers had removed more than a hundred and fifty bodies from the waters of the flood and saved upwards of fifty thousand who were two days and even ten clinging to roofs or living in upper stories. With the coming of nightfall the efforts of or to rescue more persons were slackened, and all Angeline Agathia not in the central flood district waited in dread for the spreading of the fires burning in the whole districts in upper floors of buildings which have added horrors to the already terrible situation. The knowledge that many thousands of persons were trapped on upper floors of the buildings in the path of these conflagrations where help could not reach them added terror to the night.

The water in all the districts inundated by the waters of the broken rivers had risen from three to five feet and the current of the vast stretch of flood slackened probably just from the extreme depth so that it was possible except in the centre for small boats to reach sufferers. In addition to the militia members of the police of the city of Angeline Agathia not caught in the flooded districts of the center and also volunteer guardsmen were on duty but operating in boats. In the west Angeline Agathia flood districts no outside persons were allowed to enter except on a military pass or any other papers proving they came on relief and rescue work. At the rescue stations on the shores of the flood the scenes enacted were heart-rending and the most pitiful were witnessed at the temporary morgues. At the west Angeline Agathia morgues large and frantic crowds watched every body brought in mostly those taken from the flooded wreckage from the explosion concussions, hoping against hope it was that of some loved one. Many women would become hysterical, when searching for missing members of their families whom they failed to find at the relief stations. In addition to the refuge camps, the authorities in each section are also attaining an identification bureau, where all persons rescued are to be cared for or registered.

The flood situation which was threatening to become more serious than ever, could not even be relieved temporarily, for special trains that were supposed to arrive on that one open railroad from Gertrude Gertrude Angeline city bringing eleven cars of provisions got caught in the path of a wild tempered forest fire that trapped the train burning everything, and costing the lives of the train crew, while the

Back.

when the horrors of that valley was "a timeless pit".

272

fireman and engineer narrowly escaped with his life. He said the heat of the terrible conflagration was so terrific that the very engine big as it was was melted until it assumed quaint shapes when cooled off. He believes it is a part of the main fire sweeping thousands of miles of forests. The worse condition found near the centre of this this most enormous flood by boat patrols was in smaller towns and villages where hundreds of "landelinian prisoners" had had not a single drop of water or a bite of food for nearly a week and three days. These "landelinians" revolted and there they demanded their liberty, and a chance to fight for their lives, even promising their parole if liberated, and a willingness to aid in the rescue work. As these "landelinians" were of a more better and human kind they meant what they said and when tried for their promise the towns became mad asylums according to the mayors with the fury of these "landelinians" in their attempt of rescue work which they were very successful in accomplishing. The prisoners repeatedly fought, with all obstacles, and threatened to kill other drafted "landelinian" prisoners if they would not join hand in the work. They received what rations could be handed to them, and the Mayors of the towns asked that a detachment of the national guard assigned to help them handle the injured and take care of them. Most of these "landelinian" prisoners finally by being horrified over the nature of the disaster, and finding out through all kinds of proofs and investigations that their cause was a loss to their soul and reputation in the bargain, handed over their cause to Abbeanna and became of the christian army and fought in the cause as good as they. So this proves that all "landelinians" are not really bad.....

North of Hanson's avenue and Vienna Street and as far as Fourteenth Street the water was found to be from thirty three to sixty five feet on the worst depth. Beyond these streets the water had increased enough to make it possible for many strong buildings to collapse before the pressure pressure from fourteenth street to the big prairie creek, especially along high points to where the flood waters did not reach, relief work was taken up by a committee headed by chief of the City, Gemini apartment backed by the chief of police. All of the Grocery stores not touched by the deepest parts of the floods were commandeered, and although in most cases the goods were covered with water yet sufficient supplies were found to at least prevent great suffering for a day among those in the interior dry strip.

While the death list was considerably high in individual homes, which had been without food or drink there was no place in all parts of the flood where the death list was severe enough in all places hardly any one of the survivors had tasted food for days. And those who had had food, none had had enough, and in hundreds of thousands of cases of approaching actual starvation was to be found. The progress of the first relief boats into the water bound bound districts though not quite successful came into the water bound districts of Northern Angelina and in a number of towns and villages and was greeted by appeals for bread and water. In nearly every house left standing in these towns and villages hundreds, many thousands of wistful faces were to be seen pressed against windows. With the increasing of the flood waters after about forty eight to ninety six hours, there came stories of many most gruesome scenes and rumors of added disaster in the form of a greater increase of the pestilence. Even all kinds of water pipes had been broken and ripped out of the earth by the angry currents and therefore the supply of water for drinking purposes was less insufficient throughout every city and town in the path of the enormous flood. Digging bodies out of the ruins of fallen buildings destroyed by explosion concussion WAS A difficult problem and the chief work of rescuing parties when the flood should recede, and in many places the mud even piled up by the addles, and banked against the explosion down thrown buildings was as deep as the sand dunes on the desert, and on the level several feet deep.

For hundreds of miles a searcher could have waded through a sea of oozy mud. At night time a brilliant glow from the far northwest and other directions along the horizon and further across the sky threw an uncanny red light over the distorted scene in the flooded country side, where the homes of 100,000,000 people were swept away or wrecked ruined, or thrown over. A view down almost any street or of any town or city would have revealed among the debris tumbled over houses after the flood receded, household furnishings, utensils, and dead animals of every kind brushed together in indescribable confusion. At many points the bodies of horses and cows were to be seen caught in the tops of trees where they had been swept.

The rapid speed of the water rendered useless many boats, brought from Pandora and many other large northern or southern cities of Calvernia and Angelina states. No looting of any kind was reported but nevertheless regulations were maintained by the authorities that no resources were to be hindered in their work by any trouble whatever. And also until conditions should become normal no private messages to any persons whatever were to be delivered or even to be answered, as the wire system was and had been already taxed to the utmost to carry business for relief measures. Also the Relief committees expressed the wish that all people throughout the whole nation refrain from sending messages of inquiry as none could get through the flood and fire zone anyhow. No it would be and was impossible to even reach certain definitely any information concerning the conditions of people in the flooded districts of the state, nor what was going on in the districts being swept away by the awful "Red plague" and as fast as bodies of dead mostly taken up and so on of the person were being sent out by the news associations of cities not hit by the flood and other disasters, and these lists, the Committees declared in the circumstances be sufficient. After the floods had even receded first in Angelina Agathia itself the streets were so blocked by debris that it was with the most extreme difficulty that bodies could be taken from one part of the city to another.

she called to me at the

275

In all instances in order to go a distance of only a few blocks one would have to travel two or three miles or maybe more. Whatever bodies yet were to be recovered, of what the flood did not sweep away were under mountains of debris, and in the houses of the many residence sections which suffered the most severely from explosion concussion or rush of water, or from fire. The levees which was supposed to protect the Riverview Section of Angelina Agathia from encroachment by the little prairie River was undermined and out in three or four places. Among the millions of strange incidents could be reported two by William Schoeder the next highest supreme Person of the Gemini to General Parger.

"I was patrolling the edge of the biggest flood I ever seen in my life, and was right where a big forest fire burned along the edge of the flood and tried to get fire to the upper parts of submerged buildings nearest the forest. After the force of the flood broke down a small levee I heard moaning cries for help down a street of the little town where the water was a few feet deep. He said. The water was steaming hot because of the heat of the sea of fire raging on the edge of this gigantic flood. I looked and saw twenty women and many children and a man in this hot flood of water on the roof or roofs of floating houses, who had been washed for three thirteen miles, while the big house struck a telegraph pole dangerously close to the rapidly approaching fire horror on the opposite side. The house was about to topple over when those on top rather taking chances with the slower disaster on shore succeeded after leaping to dry ground or climbing up the pole. All that they clung to that was facing parching heat from the forest fires that raged above and past them. Each of them took turns crying for help as the fierce flames either drove them to jump into the water or be overwhelmed by the fire.

I could not hardly bear to hear their various "H-E-L-P" calling as I was not able to reach them though I and my crew tried our best, but finally our boats toward night fall managed to reach them, and they were taken off half dead just as the heart of the forest fire came up and burned down to the waters edge. The fellow following day, found a man his little son and daughter daughter and their housekeeper clinging to the wall of a cliff near the railroad tracks of a recently destroyed railroad. They being fugitives at first not of the flood, but of the fires had attempted to escape the latter by raving across a safer part of the flood when their boat hit a floating house and was split in two. The fragments of the boat were jammed up against the floating building and caught in a fleck of wreckage and there held intact by the force of the flood.

Then after climbing up to the window of the floating house, they managed to make their way to the attic. The floating house was carried to the city of Angelina Agathia itself and jammed up against a block of buildings that were all on fire. The wind carried the burning embers in the direction of their refuge and things looked serious. They took turns by watching the roof all night. Later that afternoon the house again floated off just as the fire was about to reach it and was stranded near shore. Then the refugees were taken out by a boat crew.

As in all great catastrophes of the past is the greatest of all war stories written here, where hundreds of millions of Calvernia and Angelinians and even foreigners are first compelled to look for their own safety or perish, and also to the safety of those around them, this again was an exception where unscrupulous and calloused "landelinian" felons and spies and vandals, did not come to prey on the victims, and if there could have been any ghoul, around the condition of both the forest fire and flood disasters happening simultaneously prevented them from accomplishing such work.....

The Authorities of Angelina Agathia said in a long list of writing---;

The "landelinian" generals who are fully or indirectly responsible for this, and all other disasters of the past, will be treated as they deserve, and their crimes also if it takes the entire military power of our whole nation to see to it. Of course many disasters of war make might be considered somewhat fair under necessary conditions no matter how terrible, but creating disasters without any reason whatever just to make whole states of inhabitants suffer intolerable losses, mental horrors and paralyze a whole country will be committing the same crime that inflicts the whole nation a destructive punishment from heaven itself. There are hundreds of thousands of most reliable investigators, and even those among the powerful Gemini who have complied strictly with the order to report the cause of

Back

274

of all these disasters, and they have given in reports of many numerous instances of glandelinian generals grabbing all means to hide all clues to these disasters whatever, and rushing all means to have the real origin of these catastrophes being found out. Then they eight bribe some one to keep everything a secret whatever, and sent secret agents to prey upon the grief stricken people nearest the enemy armies with the purpose to threaten an enormous massacre if they themselves try to find out the cause of the enormous country wide horror. Even all medical and military officers and even citizens have received orders to prop promptly arrest any glandelinian or other person who by actions or looks or conversation shows he knows some clues as to the origin of the disasters, and force him or her to report it to the war and other departments on pain of death for refusal to reveal said secrets. There are many thousands and scores of thousands of dead horses and other animals strewn about the wreck of cities from which the flood is now slowly receding, and while we are impressing into forced service many of the glandelinian prisoners brought to us it will require nearly a month to dispose of the sea of carcasses as many of these are said to be buried beneath great heaps of wreckage thrown by explosion or flood which it will be necessary to remove before the bodies of the animals can be taken to the incinerating plants or burned in big bonfires.

Mayor pursons of Dorothy Gale directed what work could be done over the still flooded city, which even then was supposed to have been divided into ten sanitary districts, each district to be in charge of an officer of the sanitary corps of the national Guard. And as it would be months in all probabilities before the sewer system would be in operation again when the flood would subside, a large force of guarded glandelinian prisoners were asked for to help in disposing of refuse, and also in disinfecting all premises occupied by refugees.

Then also strict orders regarding the disposition of garbage were issued, and by some means the people were to be advised by means of bulletins especially posted in conspicuous places in the streets after the flood, how best to preserve the public health for said the Mayor.

"A great plague the like of which never heard of before is sweeping the country because of these war disasters, a 100,000,000 are ill and we have to do all we can to prevent it from growing worse. The situation is bad enough already." "....."

A large army of sanitary sanitary inspectors also were to be pressed into service as soon as the flood would abate and also as every effort was to be made to prevent the greater spread of the complication of pestilences now going on in such a horrible style. Owing to the most frightful flood and forest fire conditions on record, throughout the entire two states of the last sixteen months, in which every time Angelinia Agathia and Dorothy Gale cities were the centre, supplies for the medical corps did not reach the vicinity of the disasters until many days or months after the disaster occurred. Several cars of lms were sent en route to the city of Angelinia Agathia and many more were enroute from different points but because of the forest fires were not expected to arrive, were not even hoped for. A carload of ambulance supplies was sent enroute to Angelinia Agathia, and was never heard from. It had been sent from Angelina Junction.

Throughout the whole flood districts all arrangements were being planned for placing sanitary arrangements in the hands of all federal officials when the floods abatement allowed the rehabilitation of the various cities and towns, this being planned at the conferences between Secretary of War Hurner, Major General Hanson Vivian, Surgeon General Andrew, and various local Relief Committees, headed by William H. Schloeder himself. After the Secretary had talked over the telephone with the governors of both Angelinia, Galverinia and other flooded states, he decided that while the state militia would be able to police the cities and towns, the Abbeismannian federal Government should and would have charge of the sanitation.

Mr Hurner stated that Williamsberger Theodores in co-operation with Major General Hanson would have charge in Angelinia Agathia at the request of Major Vivian himself. Major General Hanson had experience in furthering relief in the flood and other disasters just past. Secretary Hurner gave out the substance of his telegram to Emperor Vivian as follows: "....."

".....I find the situation at Angelinia Agathia and Dorothy Gale as follows: The big flood had increased, immensely though subsiding elsewhere further west and south. Communications with the country and all parts of these cities is entirely destroyed, and the whole population of both cities are in peril or without food and shelter. The disaster has broken all records whatever. Stranger to say the forest fire is spreading and a branch of it is absolutely closing in on the flooded districts of the country and cutting off all relief entirely."

This was very encouraging news indeed. Of the millions of remarkable escapes, the experience of a little girl Margaret Logan, who was marooned on an overturned tree in Gloria town, a small suburb of Angelinia Agathia is considered one of the oddest and strangestly miraculous. With her father and mother, and two brothers and sisters she was imprisoned on top of a table which she mounted when the flood so suddenly came upon the city that fallen first afternoon. Eventually the table after floating some distance was over turned, and the party was thrown into the very hot but scalding waters. Several of horses came along swimming for their lives. One of the

she called to one who was one of them a passed close to the little girl, who managed to grasp a dangling strap, and succeeded in climbing astride the animal's back. For more than sixty miles the little girl clung with her little arms about the horse's neck until at last he reached a high approach of a firm levee near a small village. Here the little girl dropped to the ground unconscious, and was taken in by a man who owned a ferry near St. Ann's Creek. The horse was taken to the barn. The parents of the child who survived along with her brothers and sisters declared they would buy the horse if its owner could be found. James St. Claire related a most remarkable experience in his efforts to get home, demonstrating the dreadful and chaotic condition throughout the northern part of Angelinia state. He had started from Jessica by horseback. Traveling by a long detour he made stages of the journey by motorcycles, by foot. By keeping at keeping at it day and night they arrived in Big Girlknool after six days of perilous traveling. Four times they risked their lives crossing a smaller section of the flood in boats to get out of the path of forest fires.

After reaching Big Girlknool they obtained passes to get into Dorothy Gale, but could not make headway as here the flood was worse. They tried to go by way of Angelinia Agathia but found the way impossible for travel and had to give it up until the floods broke down. Henry Dargini who lived in north Angelinia Agathia sent to military headquarters on the shore of the flood near Grogiten to obtain medical supplies for the many sick in all sections of the city. He made the trip by automobile, and then had a hundred mile run for dear life from a speeding forest fire that tried its best to overtake his auto no matter how much he stepped on the gas. In his long flight he reached the city of Aberdeen where near by twenty thousand persons were marooned on a river island city with six hundred and fifty of them sick. Three hundred and fifty of them were diphtheria cases, and one rabies.

This man who was a doctor surely had the time of his life before his intended trip for the medical supplies, for he and his family escaped on a Wednesday from the roof of his three story wooden house, and he and six other doctors and three nurses, had worked all day and night caring for sick before he went for the medical supplies. Among those whose names should stand out prominently in connection with heroic work of rescue done in behalf of the victims of the Angelinia Agathia flood was that of a glandelinian prisoner, an officer, George Turner. In the earlier stages of the flood he did everything possible at great risks to his life to aid the refugees and denouncing his own generals for doing all this. As a result of his heroic work even before the flood had subsided, and the city began to recover from the effects of the disaster, an appeal was made to Emperor Vivian to secure the parole of this glandelinian prisoner, who was convicted of violating the war massacre act, and sentenced to be a prisoner for two years and then to face the firing squad. The appeal in behalf of the prisoner was made by the chairman of the General Relief Committee of Angelina Agathia and it is as follows:

"The whole northern part of Angelinia state in the midst of greater distress than any yet seen in this war, with a hundred million people homeless, appeals to you your Majesty, and to the Abbeismannian Imperial Government, with the hoping of the Vivian girls Mother the Empress, to issue a special greeting, and pardon to General George Turner, who at Angelinia Agathia has displayed such heroism during our great loss of life and property. Even though the prisoner might be charged with the guilt and responsibility of a massacre of little children, the refugees will call you great and much rejoicing will come from this action of returning good for evil."

Henrieka Antia "....."

The increasing of the flood in and around the city of Angelinia Agathia, and many other places further south and with the forest fires reported encompassing encompassing the whole flooded zone cutting off all means of relieve whatever only made more apparent the desolation and destruction sweeping the states of the nation, and was to bring to light many sad and pathetic scenes and incidents and as well as a complication of disasters. As the streets became deep rivers and channels and the wide squares of the city became ponds and rushing roaring lakes, it was found necessary to increase the means of saving those in houses of lower stories and to use stringent methods to prevent a terrible loss of life, and to save those crowding the roofs of smaller or lower buildings in the devastated districts.

Outside of any opening whatever to the flood zone not reached by the "Red Plague" a strong force of soldiers barred the way to the approach of any hordes of strangers who could not prove their identity and of curious visitors from other cities. And only these bringing in supplies were admitted and many supplies were needed but could not be had. Bread and pure water was the staple most in demand.

The town town house roofs were alive with citizens, most of them very hungry and appealing for food. There was an air of great panic and confusion, but not of withdrawal.

Glandelinia turned on the

WITH AN DING

withstanding all this they joked and cried with joy by turns when friends coming from house top to house top found them. When the flood started they had all prepared to die. "Most of us made our very minds that if we were to make a choice and there was no escape of the question of dying, that we would rather die by being drowned than by being burned," said Microbe Jensen who was imprisoned in one of the buildings. "NEVERHELESS as the flood had continued to increase every day, and the darkness made it look like the approach of the end of the world we prepared to rush in by the way of the water. . . . Thousands and thousands as far as we could see in the murky twilight of the day were camped on the roofs of the hotels, and skyscrapers inspired by the mad fact that the water was reaching toward them, even to the top floors of the skyscrapers. As the flames in whole districts of the flooded wrecked buildings veered toward them they would shout warnings across the roofs. . . . All prayed. Sometimes the flames would shift and drive others from the roofs to seek shelter on other roofs. . . .

The morgues of the refugee camps outside the flood so soon began its part of the great war tragedy with many pathetic incidents, and most of the bodies brought bore the marks of death caused more by being buried in falling buildings caused by concussion explosions than by drowning. First there were brought into the camp a woman and little boy taken from the flood as their bodies floated in floated in close to shore. A note pinned to the bodies indicated calm preparation for death as the water rose over their heads and finally destroyed it.

"We are Mother and Daughter" read the note. "Have Masses said for our souls when our bodies are found. . . ."

The mother and little boy were placed side by side in a tent that had been converted into a morgue. The rescuers wondered why the note referred the child as to daughter when it was a boy. They investigated. The boy turned out to be a little girl dressed as a boy. A mother and her little boy and girl were found on the third floor of their residence in an embrace. Here the flood had reached nearly to the fourth floor and drowned them. Several hundred men women and children fled to a tall sash company when the water made its first rush, the mayor of the city of Dorothy Gale, then being in Angelina Agathia on business matters being among them. . . . he was then elected head of the Community of Flood Refugees of Dorothy Gale City when he returned to that city, and he established all means of rescue places possible and also a sanitary system. Even the postoffice itself though partly wrecked by the flood was turned into a place of shelter and refuge for two hundred and eighty nine men women and children. Ropes were thrown out and cases of food snaggled as they floated by. In the midst of the horror, an explosion occurred in the city on fourteenth street and enabled fifteen Glandelinian prisoners in a barracks to break out through through the roof, and fleeing over the roof make good their escape by posing as rescue parties.

One of the real awful descriptions of the awful condition in Angelina Agathia that prevailed for every day of the duration of the flood, while the city was water bound and cut off from all communications by both flood and forest fire, was that fire threatened its complete destruction without the forest conflagration ever having the least least thing to do with it. The fire started from some unknown cause, in the St. Johns Catholic Cathedral on St. Johns Street, worked its way over the upper sections of the buildings for whole districts until it reached the corner of south thirty sixth street, where lower buildings being almost submerged prevented it spreading any further in that direction. Then the furnace raging for blocks at one time jumped to the south side of the opposite thoroughfare, burned its way east as far as sixteen blocks to within the reach of the flooded Angel Guardian Op Orphanage, but skipped that place and burned south to south Algrove avenue and then turned northwestward. The grew day by day until it looked almost like a Chicago fire of 1871. By many rescuers who worked hard to save people from the burning and fire threatened buildings, the trip was made in the same launches and motor boats which had started out earlier in the beginning of the flood, and which at times was compelled to return to shore on account of high winds and the heat the conflagration burning above the water.

One of the launches in charge of Flagle London left the foot of Hangover Street made its way to Thirteenth, and then encountering a wall of fiercely burning buildings was compelled to swing back some distance, working its way up the flood to Sixteenth street, where many people were fleeing from roof to roof before the advancing flames. The boat was landed there, pushed to seventeenth street, there across to water on the other side of the conflagration. The boat again started work on this street, reaching the Fifteenth Street Bridge, at which point the boat was carried to St. Peter's Street, and floated there. The rescuers worked in and around the frequently threatened St. Gertrude's Orphan asylum and church, aiding in the removal of two hundred and sixty persons, whose lives were endangered by the fire and who had taken refuge on the roof of the orphan asylum. Only this one building separated the flames from spreading to the came upon the scene. . . . Eventually the table after floating some distance was over turned, and the party was thrown into the very hot but not boiling waters. Several of horses came along swimming for their lives. One of the

and called to one of the block across the street and the rescuers deemed it best to aid in the removal of the flood sufferers. In this building was mostly those who had been driven from the other structures including the orphan asylum children and their attendants. One man worked his way from Thirteenth to Twenty Fourth Street, many solid blocks, over the roof tops and climbing down to lower roofs being driven from each place of refuge by the ever advancing flames. The rescuers all over made countless inquiries relative to losses of life by flames, but no one had perished. Yet there was no way of estimating the loss of drowning because of so many unrecovered from the concussion shaken ruins at the outbreak of the flood. Most of the buildings thrown down were five and six stories. Of the refugees who survived they simply kept crawling from one building to another. The current was very swift in places and the rescuers were unable to make any headway. One of the most remarkable features brought out by the tour through the various sections of the flood zones was the most remarkably cheerful spirit which with the water victims seemed to view their plight, and peril. This was Angelina Agathia's biggest flood in all her existence, and Galverinia's and Angelinia States too. Much of the submerged areas of both these main states and five or six others had been considered by the very Government as safe from high water as a hill top but as the greatest number of the inhabitants of these sections looked out on all sides upon a great sea of muddy swiftly moving water, day after day they even then seemed undisturbed.

Yet in many other sections of the states struck by the flood and also threatened by the forest fires the attitude of the marooned was not quite so cheerful. As a rescue boat passed between a house and a tree, a man leaned out from the third story widow window and threatened to shoot the rescuers, claiming they were glandelinians and responsible for the flood. The horrors of the flood probably have driven him mad. Another place a woman was let from a window by a rope and taken to a place of refuge. Then further on members of a launch party were startled by the sound of firing in the third floor of a large house about which twenty feet of water swirled. The boat was stopped and then a man peered from a window of a house.

"Was that you doing all the shooting?" he was questioned.

"Yes," he answered.

"Why?"

"I like to hear a gun go off. I'm practicing so that I can amuse myself shooting at glandelinian soldiers and officers when I can get a chance." was the reply.

"When are you going to rescue me from here."

They rescued him then.

glandelinia turned on the

THE DESOLATION OF FLOOD AND FIRE SPREADS.
 MANY MORE CITIES INUNDATED. P. 2222. DISCOVER THAT LEVIES OF OTHER RIVERS
 HAD BEEN INJURED AND THE MIC-HOLLESTER HUNTER LET LOOSE. BIG GIRL KNOOL
 AT WAR WITH FIRE AND WAR ELEMENTS. THE PERIL OF THE CHURCH OF CALVERINE., FRANCIS ATLANTA, MILDRED GREENBURG AND OTHER BIG CITIES. FROM THE EXTENT OF THE DISASTER, NEW PROBLEMS TO BE FACED. CONDITIONS DE-PLOITED. MORE THRILLING EXPERIENCES. SLIGHTLY RECEDING WATERS IN NORTH..

While Angelina Agathia, was only beginning to be in the grip of the worse flood in the greatest of these wars, with fire menacing its citizens, and every hope of relief of any kind cut off by the ravas ravaging forest fires, and the nation and the world itself looked on in horror, a portion of the MIC-Holleston Run at Big Girl Knool also affected by the concussion broke its own bounds, and added to the peril and destruction of northern Angelina and five or six other states. The released waters, finding their way to the Angelina Run River, and added by the flood from all other streams caused the Angelina to extend its flood still more to even swamp some of the sections of burning forests, smudging it and causing a mass of dense rolling smoke that extending so high into the sky and so far that the clouds were seen at Calverine four hundred miles away. The flood caused further extended damage and danger at even Calverine, and other points.

A conception of the vast territory affected by the spread of the floods is as follows: Dead at Angelina Agathia of flood alone, 1567, Dorothy Gale 6,789 Jessica, 567, Polychrome 500, Griffin 897, Chicadee 10, Landale Junction, 110, Mombi 100, and a hundred other places combined 1,000. So many lost their lives in smaller places or went unknown to death may never be told, and especially the victims of the explosion concussions as their bodies had been swept away by the flood. The other big cities however are as follows: Chamberlaine, 112, Calverine 122, Crease de Dell 500, Blue Valley 600, McAdamsburg, 567, Abrahamburg, 500, Olive Junction 200. In Calverine state are the cities as follows: Emerald City, 1,000, Glinda, 10,000, Brookland, 2,445, Ennampments of Dorothy Gale, 1,000. Usma Junction, 5,678. Total loss of lives in this flood so far was 225,279. The condition at even Big Girl Knool was becoming so bad as to almost parallel Angelina Agathia herself, and for days and weeks even with the flood increasing more and more, and even still more, it was feared, that result might be in the final ensue a hundred times worse than the results of the great Abbeinn-Bengal county flood horror.

Rescuers reported whole families dead in their homes on the south side, of Big Girl Knool city. After the flood receded there, streets and open squares were thronged with hordes of frantic survivors seeking lost friends and relatives. Thousands fought to get back to the east side to search for missing loved ones but for good reasons the soldiers were forced to restrain most of them. Others who had gained the west and south side were almost frenzied with horror when police men informed them that the forest fires had cut off all communications and prevented trains from coming into the city with provisions and carloads of food, which they wanted to carry to their families still entrapped. As the waters receded thousands whose homes were somewhat elevated waded out. The governor of Angelina Vine State basing his own estimates on personal estimates or knowledge of the situation of cities in his own state declared the loss of life and property would be very severe, but though the loss of life would not be as heavy as formally in other disasters just past the loss of property would exceed them all.

Yet Angelina Agathia was the centre of most concern as she was or in the main Capitol of the country of Abbeinnia as West Washington is for the United States. It was cut off from all communication with every source of relief, and from all towns, and cities, no news could come to her or go out of her, and the reports that so many were dead, and a million survivors starving beyond verification was horrifying to the governor, and he asked as many priests as he could communicate with in his own city to offer Masses for the intention of the ceasing of this awful scourge. A long special train was sent out from Angelina Junction with supplies for the refugees of Little Girl Knool but the train was never arrived never arrived. Another special train was sent out from Pandora with supplies for refugees of Francis Atlanta also flooded, the survivors being on the west side of the river at Turpo. This train also was not heard of from Governor Clarence of Angelina Vine State ordered the authorities to take full charge of a passenger and supply train which the Abbeinnia condonia and Calverine was to attempt to run from Calverine to Francis Atlanta. But neither did this train arrive though it was sent. A train problem was on, that prevented them from coming, and why even were they not heard from? The rescuers in Francis Atlanta labored to reach 100,000 or more persons marooned in their houses or on house-tops for more than six weeks with hardly only food on the table. Eventually the table after floating some distance was over turned, and the party was thrown into the very hot but not scalding waters. Several of horses came along swimming for their lives. One of them sufficient rations to last ten days. Many bodies lashed to tree tops were recovered. The unfortunates had perished from exposure. 991 Colonels and other officers ordered militia men and police and even citizens to shoot down any as seen looting the homes as damped by flood. It was reported disguised glandelinian vandals had constructed rafts and were using them to get to homes and buildings surrounded by the flood. The rescuers found that the green river, which had a big bend, encircling whole districts of houses, where six hundred and fifteen thousand persons had dealt straightened its own course by cutting a new channel through Jennings and Artfekt ravens in Francis Atlanta. In doing so the river swept completely out of existence hundreds of thousands of residences in this district. Many thousands of survivors who had reached safer sections, or the refuge camps on the shore of the flood, were for days and days seeking members of their families from whom they had become parted in the mad rush to escape the flood.

"My little Annie, has anyone seen my little Annie?" one woman cried as she went crying through the streets. When stopped by an officer, she told her little girl had gone from home on Sunday morning to call her little boy chum to go with her to the eight o'clock Mass, and Holy Communion. She feared both the children had perished in the flood. "My little Annie, has anyone seen my little Annie?" she ran on ahead, crying at the top of her voice. Nor did any one stop her. There were hundreds of such instances. answers took from the upper half of a large house which was floating in the flood, a man, his wife, and their little son and daughter, and two strange little girls, who had been trapped for sixteen days.

"First we fled to the third story," said the man. "The water soon reached to and covered the third floor. We stood on a table. The water mounted to our hips. We all believed we were doomed, therefore we wrapped sheets around us for our own shrouds, and tied ourselves together, so we would not be parted in death. I pinned an identification card to my clothes so our bodies could be recognized."

The Governor of Angelina Vine State was the first, to cross the flooded districts of the country to the east section of the country in the flood for a hundred miles in a gasoline launch. He drove through the shallower part of the flood later in the wagon and from that section viewed at the far distance the branches of the most enormous forest fires on record. He likened the scene as "If the whole country itself was bleaching belching forth in violent volcanic eruptions. A sixteen months old baby boy was taken from an attic of a house dangerously close to the forest fire, and more dangerously inundated by the waters. The baby was dressed well, and not too warmly clothed. A note pinned under its clothing read "An abandoned child slave."

One of the heroes of the Francis Atlanta flood was Albert Davidson, one of the engineers of Aronburg Limited section Three. He was at Francis Atlanta near Francis Anna Town, near Zamagutopolis, when he heard of the extending of the flood, and of thousands of miles of country being devastated by forest fires, and of the tremendous battles just past and still raging. His wife and two children, the youngest a little girl of five years were caught or trapped in their home, not in the flood but in the path of the forest fire, and were rescued by rangers. Davidson cut his enormous locomotive loose from his train which the passengers were compelled to abandon, sped on to Little Girl Knool through water, covered tracks, finally was stopped by a washout, and waded on, reaching the town of Little Girl Knool in water waist deep. Northwest of him he was startled by enormous black rolling clouds in the sky that predicted the approach of a tornado, but it was the dense clouds from forest fires, and it was growing dark as night, and the weather was swea-thering. It was late on a Wednesday when he arrived in the little city. For his own safety the sentries refused to allow him to recross one of the bridges to the west side of the town warning him the water was going at Automobile speed rates.

Slipping past the sentries at night, he made the attempt. Indeed all night he tried in vain. His boat would live even on the edge of the current. Thursday he tried to ferry his way across with a gang of rescuers, and finally succeeded, and rescued a number of people from the upper story of their home, where they had been prisoners of the flood for four days.

The flood raged on threatening even to spread in the regions occupied by the blazing forests increasing therefore the dense clouds of smoke by smudging ground fires of terrible extent by only wetting them enough to allow the hotter fires to burn underneath. Of course if the floods still increased these ground fires would soon be a thing of the past. But the flood did not want to go that far. A telephone message from Goodnow Angelina Vine State reported one hundred lives lost there. A woman and her two children were swept away, while following her husband who was wading to safety with his father and mother, an uncle and his wife sister, father and mother, and two grandchildren. They all survived however. Sixteen other persons refused to leave their homes, and were reported drowned when the houses collapsed. Landulds reported sixteen hundred children penned in a large schoolhouse entirely surrounded by the flood. They were said to have all perished. But

glandelinia turned on the

Investigators discovered them still there, and therefore food was sent to them by boat, and they were taken out when the flood receded. George Charles, the father of six children became crazed as the result of his experience in the edge of the flood along which densely wooded. A wooded the hottest temper of the forest fire swept. Perched in one tree trying to seek safety from the flood, and not seeing the approach of the "Red Plague" he saw his sister, Johanna Josephine aged thirty five, burn to death before she could get out when the fire came up in a sudden mile long wave of flame, and his brother Francis, twenty eight fell from a burning tree into a sea of fire below. His mother wife, and children chancing the dangers of the flood are safe.... His father however is missing and his children too.

An interesting story that would show the difficulties encountered in reaching the flood centres is or should be told by General Jacob Marcus himself. He rather wrote it as follows: []

"I was detached from a portion of General Vivians army at ten thirty in the morning of Wednesday, date of month I don't remember. The main army was moving after one of the vast Landelinian armies believed to be under one of the plains. Through the flood, and my command was separated from the main body. I marched on however and reached Big Girl Knoll at six o'clock by pontooning and started northward for Francis Atlanta, via the remains of the Mic-Hollister and Pandora Railroad. We planned to go via Calverine, and there rejoin the main army before we got too far separated from it. So heavy was the sky heavy with thick thick strangely colored clouds that made a murky darkness that I believed it was going to rain pitch forks any minute. At this time, had no news of forest fires raging along the shores shoreward portions of the flood, though I noticed the water at places was very warm and the weather terribly hot for the season. We managed however from wreckage to quickly construct some sort of pontoon bridges, and we managed to get to Little Girl Knoll at six thirty in the evening on a Friday morning with no worse disaster, than to see about ten thousand soldiers get spilled into the flood, when a pontoon broke with them on it. They swam to the shore without mishap. At daylight my whole command of 10,000,000 men started slowly in different columns for Big Girl Knoll being forced to leave our heaviest cannons ashore as the pontoons would not support their weight. 100,000 cavalry remained behind to guard them.

At the break of day we started for Angelina. I hired every picture taking man or photographer I could secure with the purpose of supplying pictures for the nations review of the flood and conditions of the flood with the purpose to arouse the nation still more against Landelinia for the deed.... We reached the south end of Angelina Agethia by making pontoons into and toward the city, and then while the photographers started taking the pictures, most of my army which could started in the general rescue work and did what we could in sparing from the army nations what food we could give to the hungry and starving refugees. That shocked and surprised me, my flabbergasted me was that in the long bread line of refugees bread line of refugees Emperor Vivian and his wife and his whole royalty were also in the bread line. To think that our great Emperor had come to this. He immediately was advised to take personal charge of my divisions until proper restorations for the city could be made. By using our pontoons, rowboats and rafts, launches and other means of communications we got as far into the heart of the city as we could which was more deeply inundated than any other part, and we went to flood refugees into houses as we could without getting into a current rescuing persons and bringing them to our hastily established camps.

The central part of the city, is as I and my officers saw in making observations is built in a large crook of the Angelina gun River and the levees on both water bound courses of the great triangle had been broken, and the appearance of the break shows that a great shock of some concussion had done it. After getting the pictures which was pretty difficult in the twilight darkness, and by which to obtain we had to use flashlight powder, I led a party of my officers and a thousand five hundred men around the hills to the Mic-Hollister and Pandora Railroad team Engine Company, where they also had means to develop the plates and have the prints made. The next thing after wiring General Vivian that I left part of my army to aid the refugees at Angelina Agethia, was to get to Dorothy Gale, as the Mayor of Angelina Agethia advised me with tearful eyes that the inhabitants there were or are hard put to it and being like on the brink of the Valley of the Shadow of Death. I started off with about 100,000 men at three thirty, reaching Jessica Burburbs on a Wednesday morning having stayed in Angelina Agethia till Tuesday night of the following week. We could not approach Jessica proper because of the nature of the flood preventing any efforts of pontoon bridge making, and we turned off our course and went on toward Ozma city and heading for Linda, where again the nature of the unusual flood balked our efforts and refused to go farther. I.

Finally expert military pontoon engineers consented to make an effort of came upon the city and the first of the flood. Eventually the flood after floating some distance was over turned, and the party was thrown into the very hot but not scalding waters. Several of horses came along swimming for their lives. One of them and killed it was of constructing pontoons over this dangerous portion of the flood, to that the 100,000 troops could make the passage as far as Jessica Courthouse Junction. This work was completed within two days but under difficulties and in face of great peril. The army of troops got there at ten o'clock the following morning when the pontoons were finished. The city needed aid terribly bad, all people were on top of their house roofs or in upper stories. I searched the town by boat for two hours to get a man or a few men to direct us through the town. We moved only a few miles as far as the Menton garring section when we found it absolutely impossible to go any further. Water was on three sides of us for as far as eye could see.... Erminie Creek just ahead, had relieved so much of the flood waters that it had swollen so that from a ten foot creek it had grown to be an immense sea. Here the flood was utterly impassable, and pontoons could not be constructed under any conditions.

The army had to halt, while my officers were for turning back. Here my command was stalled for good, and to go back it was impossible. We absolutely were being trapped ourselves. My photo photographers had wrapped the precious photographs in rubber coats, and the army decided to take the chances and forde the flood. I the general think of it, sat on a log and paddled the best I could with a twenty foot stick. As big as the flood was here, as wide and as wide there was no strength to the current, so, and a good part of my command got across in about four hours. A farmer outside the flood and fire zone informed me that a portion of the Pandora and Appleby truck trucks were off a mile to the east, so I and my command hit across the fields to the trucks, but avoiding as much as possible the forested regions, as I had no desire to "catch the red plague", and neither did my command. Here I myself secured a hand car and tow of my soldiers operated it for me. I rode on the hand car seven miles but encountered a new stretch of the flood at Orientalia Junction, and secured boats for Jessica proper in my route for Dorothy Gale City.

This part was a perilous trip. The boats would not ride the flood, in fact I received three muddy water baths in quick succession, and a floating beam of some size punched me on the jaw knocking out three teeth, and giving me a "w swell" affair as if I had the toothache. We however finally got into a little partly inundated village of Schloedersburg, but here there was only one bridge left across the "Erminieon" called Jennie's bridge the probable point of the first severe battle of the war, ten miles north of Nombi Junction city. We circled on the hills to this point, forested hills and marched and traveled for three days.

We came close to a portion of the "Red Plague" twice on our way and by quick and clever movements avoided it. It was no "Red Plague" no. It was a seething hell. All of my command could not have stopped its van guard. Books piled thousands of feet into the sky in millions of great rolls, and rolls of flames pierced it in great grandeur, and at night the scene with the glow was as if the whole region had turned into a tremendous volcanic furnace with the infernal regions trying to join hand. Far as it was, probably forty miles yet when the wind came from that direction, believe me I and the whole army had wet clothing because of our perspiring.

We were roasting like fish in the fire. It was a perilous trip but we finally avoided the scourge. We finally crossed into Amelia town and warned the inhabitants that they lay between flood and forest fire, the latter heading toward the town.....

At Amelia Town my photographers picked up hundreds of available photographs, of the flood and scenes of the distant forest fires there, and then chartered a special train via the only open railroad to Allgrove the nearest point to Dorothy Gale. We left at seven o'clock Monday night, and reached Allgrove village late at night. From Allgrove village which fortunately was not flooded nor in the path of the fires we proceeded by the shore of Lake Mic-Hollister to Terranda, and then forded and pontooned our way finally into flooded Dorothy Gale.....

From every district in this sadly flood torn city there came to our rescuing soldiers soldiers unusual trials, stories of trials, times of horror and suffering, and hardships beyond comprehension. One of these is related to me by Hanson Andrews of Beldon Avenue, Dorothy Gale Centre, who told me he was penned in the Catholic Orphan asylum called St Michaels. He told me that he was penned in with one hundred and sixty six children and they had been caught in the building when the flood started.

"We were all caught in the building before we were aware of the flood," said Mr Andrews. "We remained there until a big fire started in the district close to us and then to save the children planned ways of making our escape before the fire reached the home. With the help of the elder boys, we cut the elevator cables, obtained a ball of very strong twine which one of the little orphan girls found, and some thick wire from the attic of the building. With screaming hollering and shouting we managed to attract some of your soldiers coming out in boats, who risked their lives to come to us. We gave one of the men in the boat one end of the twine, and he roared to us so skyscraper across the street. We then pulled the wire over, and after that the heavy cable. One end of the cable was made fast in the skyscraper,

Landelinia turned on the

and the other in the home. Then with only the glare of the burning structures, the one hundred and fifty orphans in the home went their way over, hand over hand along the cable over the swirling current to the skyscraper. It was a hazardous effort but not of the children were afraid to make the hand over hand trip. Very one except the matron and the sisters made the trip over in safety. They refused to abandon the building. During our imprisonment for fourteen days, we had each day four crackers each, and a slice of chipped beef to eat, and to my our terrible thirst took chances with the dangers of drinking the flood waters. Otherwise we could not endure thirst that long in such heated weather. Yet our work was in vain. The orphan asylum did not burn, but the building opposite to us on our same street collapsed. Part of a whole block of buildings also crumbled before the waters and they were of brick. The flood threatened our new refuge and we were then forced to retreat over other structures from roof to roof. We had just escaped the skyscraper when that ten story building crashed in being undermined at the foundation by the force of the water. The collapsing building made a noise like a great avalanche. Yet bet I'm glad to get out of it and I'm deeply grateful to the brave soldiers who came to our rescue. But it is surely some experience."

"I and my officers learned and told me that foreigners killed their pet animals, and some in desperation even their children in their desperate efforts to obtain food, they being in north Dorothy Gale where the situation was extremely desperate. Another man rescued by me who was taken from the remaining abutment of the North Sanders bridge, where he had hung for hours, he and his wife and three children, in a partly submerged in water much too warm for their comfort, and sometimes growing nearly to the boiling point. This man whose name I'll not mention for his sake, as he asked me not to said he was at his home with his family when the flood struck north Dorothy Gale. The house was picked up by the current and carried against the Sanders Street bridge. The man said he and his family managed to leap to the bridge, and was thankful he had at least seen his family safe. He told me his aunt with a six year old child, and the child clean stripped on its roof, and the movement of the house threw her and the child clean through the window of a house across the street, and both were taken out later fatally hurt."

A cause of cause of suffering much counted on was the terrific heated conditions of the interior of the buildings in and around the flooded districts. I found people suffering from prostration of the heat, and many feared the city yet would be wiped out, for the possibilities of a general conflagration which would wipe Dorothy Gale off of the map in a more drastic manner than had already been accomplished by the flood was raging. The people therefore had been instructed to use care in lighting matches in their houses for fear of gas explosions or the building in which they were refuged in catching fire. One whom I witnessed made a grim picture for me, and that was at south Dorothy Gale, which I observed at the temporary morgues just outside the flood zone in refuge camps. Here fifty thousand coffins and bodies were piled up or placed in ranks ready to receive victims of the flood, explosion disaster and fire. One of the most touching scenes which I also observed in the refuge camps was the restoration of ten children under eight or nine years of age to their parents after it had been feared or even believed the latter had been drowned. One of the most saddest of these cases was that of a man and woman who whose name I'll not mention. The man carried his wife four miles through the flooded streets. She collapsed after the children were removed from her home in Thirty Third street near Center Avenue. When the woman found the three little girls, she sank to her knees in the crowd crowded refuge camp... and screamed her thanks to heaven."

Every man within sight or hearing bared their heads and stood silent, while women and children made the Sign of the Cross. In one street of Dorothy Gale city four hundred pianos, pianos in an immense tangled mass of debris and wreckage blocked the lower part of Central Avenue, the lighter furniture of all other adjacent houses being swept away. A wrecked toy factory scattered thousands of dolls and other toys on the surface of the flood, and to the appearance they looked like many strange little children floating there and who were drowned. As he told me and my officers a railroad engineer of one of the ruined railroad lines spent fourteen days in the upper floor of the Central railroad station at Angelina Agathia, with fifteen hundred other persons, and he refusing to give his name nevertheless told me of his experience."

"I left with my train Pandora at ten o'clock on Monday night, and after a twenty four hour run began to reach the edge of the flood. On that day we crossed the only Mic-Hollister run Bridge near Mildred Greenburg. The flood was raging there, but the big wreckage jam caused by we reached the depot. The trucks beyond were in great damage just then. We were flagged as we reached the depot. The trucks beyond were in such bad shape, that the dispatchers feared to let us proceed. We remained a just across the bridge, until a detour could be obtained for us by which we got as some distance was over turned, and the party was thrown into the very hot but boiling waters. Several of horses came along swimming for their lives. One of the the failed to see the way.

h & Co.

got as far as Angelina Agathia. The flood was increasing at a most rapid rate but just then no one seemed to have any fear as it was not of the very sudden kind as of the flood disasters of the past. Finally the water covered the trucks and then orders came through me to the passengers to take to another train lying alongside, while I was warned to make the depot. As we got alongside the shed the fires in the engine were extinguished by the flood, and the water around us was up to our hips...

We started lifting passengers onto the main train shed, and boosting them from there into the upper windows of the depot. We also threw ropes to a number of men women and children in a Pandora, Evangeline St. Clare and and Mic-Hollister train, a little more than two hundred feet away. They tied these around their waste waist and we pulled them also to the shed. We rescued in the same way three men, six women and two other children who had gone to sleep in the Pullman coach of another train.

Fortunate for us the kitchen of the depot restaurant was on the third third floor, and we had food for all those days and nights. The flood kept raging around us, and the darkness from smoke covered skies continued all that time without a break. The streets within our view were like gushing river torrents. The force of the water carried pantries all kinds of furniture, tables horses wagons, and small house along with it.

By the third morning we were marooned we seemed to be in the midst of a raging ocean, and the appearance of the sky was as if there was a thousand submarine volcanic eruptions at a great distance. Thousands of houses had been floating down the river all that time. Many were glad up against the last bridge until the bridge finally gave way. Ten days later the flood reached its climax. Then the worse of the fires in the city broke out and from our windows we could see hundreds of districts all afire and flames shooting nearly a thousand feet into the air. All men women and children knelt for days on the floor and prayed, and priests in our midst erected altars and said Mass for our safety. A number of the refugees went crazy.

"The city and its whole population are gone." a woman said to me, and I was ready to believe her, as the scene was as if the world was coming to end. The next morning however the flood slowed some slight signs of going down, though the weather was becoming unusually warmer. per we did not see any signs of land during that day, and then it was you and some of your soldiers rescued us.

Our food came from debris which floated on the water. We had apples, ham, peaches, sausage, olives, tomatoes, cabbage, and in fact everything that comes in cans. They were washed alongside the building and we fished them up. The engineer made a scoop from a box for catching cans. We dug out coal out of the tender for cooking purposes, and our water came from the tank of the engine. By a stroke of the luck that seemed to pursue us, we had filled it when we reached Angelina Agathia. We had the stoves of the restaurants where we built fires and cooked everything. During the night every one who slept at all laid down on the floor after praying for fully an hour. The day when we were all rescued, Angelina Agathia seemed surrounded by an inroad of the sea. Houses and stores were being gutted by the flood and in many cases the contents of the houses had been washed into the river. Perhaps the queerest sight of all we saw was a large table floating by us. It had or was set for a meal supper or dinner. Plates were laid for four, and in the center was a large catsup bottle and a sugar bowl, with a menu card between. Four chairs surrounded the table, and the water had not touched the table on the top, and the chairs were held in place by the pressure of the water."

On September the seventeenth fourteen days after the breaking of the levees caused by the explosion, the extent of the flood passed far beyond what ever could be expected of floods, and at this while Angelina Agathia, Dorothy Gale, Big Girl, Knoll and others were experiencing the worse history of floods, and Calverine was even getting a good deal of it to boot. Mildred Greenburg, which had been a refuge for a hundred thousand of refugees of this new flood, and which had gone through the Bengal County Flood horror of the past now became a centre of greater anxiety than of that time. As the streams there received the waters from the receding portions of this new and immense flood, and ran into the Mic-Hollister and Aronburgs, an immense sea, these rivers passed far beyond their own banks despite the remaining levees, of course the remaining openings of other recently ruined levees being a good help, and two quarters of Mildred Greenburg were under water with the situation calling for the combined efforts of all relief and civic organizations.

Every hotel in the city was crowded to its capacity, while every moving van, auto truck and street car and anything else was pressed into service removing families from the flood area. Refugees even took shelter on the immense debris jam left there near the north of the city by the Abbeann flood disaster. The Mic-Hollister River reached a stage never known before in his history within a days, time and was rising at a rate of two feet an hour. Water whose depths ranged from between six feet to twenty feet covered the entire lower sections of the city.

Suffering however was at a minimum owing to warning sent out early that a stage of seventy feet probably would be reached by the flood before the waters began to recede, however there was no fear of enormous damage except to houses held goods of smaller houses as here the flood was partly stationary and had no strong

Angelina turned on the

our ward

current. One report of the condition said as follows:

"The city was practically cut off from all traffic communications with all points of the nation, at the beginning of the flood. The situation was for this region immensely dangerous for Mildredgreenburg city was a base of supplies for the nearest flooded cities and towns and with this interruption of all kinds of communications all hope is really entirely lost and 10,000,000 refugees of all other places face dire famine. One only open way by train was with Big Girl Knool. And when the approach to this immense suspension bridge became covered with water at a depth that prevented train or foot service all hope seemed lost, and the bridge too is in grave danger. If it gives way no aid will reach the unfortunate even when the flood does subside.

And a rise of even another half foot will put out of commission all of the cities car and other lines, which operate all street cars entering from Big Girl Knool owing to the fact that the powerhouses will become swamped at this stage. The other main bridge was being abandoned last evening. So far the city is not so hard hit that it cannot take care of itself, but it cannot aid others. Of course if there should be a great increase of the flood we might need to worry about ourselves too.

But the big wreckage jam is saving us so far. The waters reached the second floors of business houses and other buildings in the lower streets, but elsewhere for whole districts the water is half way up on the first floor of many blocks of houses on Tellepin Avenue. As we are a hundred miles north of Big Girl Knool we could not expect in the least that this new and most southern flood of all should be able to extend westward to us. However thank heaven we were in danger of a forest fire from the east, and the flood places itself between, for despite the flood of the past we are still surrounded by immense forests which no flood yet has been able to tear even an inch. Seventeen lines of the Mildredgreenburg traction company, operating in the lower district have been abandoned. At this time more than six hundred sixty blocks of the city is under water. But the water here thanks be to God has no current whatever but is stationary and we are not needing to be apprehensive.

Culverville also suffers, but not so much.

In Big Girl Knool the flood assumed the Angelina Agathia stage but let us first go to conditions at Francis Atlanta. In this city the sections of West or east Francis Atlanta also was inundated to a severe degree, and in three quarters of the city the waters rose to the second and even third story windows of all houses. Houses were swept from their foundations by thousands. In many houses water rose so fast that occupants had to cut holes through the ceiling, and got to the top on timbers to be rescued in boats, and hauled away just as these houses were swept from their foundations and smashed to pieces against other and stronger houses. The residents of the flooded sections had been taken from their homes and cared for at various higher and safer places in the flooded city. Five hundred and sixty people were lodged at fed in buildings which were strong, and many public buildings were thrown open to refugees. The Chief of Police of this city was marooned in Southern Francis Atlanta for ten days, yet he secured telephone or telephone connections with police headquarters, and told his captives he had witnessed nearly two hundred drownings and expressed the unshakable belief that several more times that number of fatalities surely no must have occurred.

Investigations by rescue workers when receding waters improved conditions slightly brought the belief that not more than six hundred and twenty bodies were found, and yet even then these workers were not even shaken in their reports of many drownings, and declared that it may be six weeks before the actual number of deaths will be known. The situation seemed the worse of all at Francis Atlanta.

While this is the picture that could have been drawn of conditions there three days after the flood, or when the waters of the flood had increased to an enormous degree. The outside sections of Francis Atlanta is a vast rescue and mobilization camp for hundreds of thousands of homeless. So terrible is the affliction that the Capital city of Culverville has lost entirely any interest in the number of dead which had been mounting as the rising waters will not permit the most hardy boatsmen to penetrate further into the deluged districts in all sections of the submerged city.

The care for the living has just now been the one only concern for the city. All the stricken sections cannot be approached by rescuers from any angle and the flood is increasing every day. Along the embankments of the flood on which the remains of the McJellister and Pandora railroad tracks is still to be seen is one long rescue station and the flood is threatening this point also. From a point on the remaining levee beyond the section and intersection of Gravetonia street, and the McJellister Run River another had been established only to be swept away with all these within it.

At the long enter street bridge, one of the strongest structures in the country countryman nation, this structure which still connects the central portion some distanced was over-turned, and the party was thrown into the very hot and scolding waters. Several of horses came along swimming for their lives. One of the of the city with the northwest side, which had been constructed from the gate and national funds on the beautiful swell of ground beginning from the extreme northwestern end of the city, is sadly a thing of the past. 100,567 houses here were swept completely out of existence. In the very centre of the flooded city stood Mount St. Ann's hospital Orphan Asylum, school, chief cathedral and infirmaries, as well as the Convents of the Sisters of the Poor Clares, the Carmelites, and of the Vincentian Order, which held thousands and thousands of rescued men women and children, besides the Orphan Asylum of the homeless children until the places were so crowded that those rescued afterwards had to go on the roofs. Many are said to be near death from exposure to the extraordinary heat of the was water. The buildings though far apart are on high elevation and the immense square surrounding the whole district affords a most safe place on which the helpless await boats to get to these places of refuge. No matter how high the flood was going even every hour, the deluge never came within reach of these buildings, but the rescued were marooned nevertheless for all about them was a turbulent sea filled with great jams of wreckage. Men in tree tops, on floating houses, and in streets on wreckage floors have been seen, and hauled to safety by rescuers, and two men who came to the Convent of the Poor Clares told of penetrating St. John's Avenue, and near St. Michael's Catholic cathedral in the heart of the stricken district, and seeing many men women and children either in the church galleries or on its immense roofs, and in its town towers and belfry, with the water coming higher every day and they without a bite to eat or water to drink. Those in the balcony were said to have been finally drowned as the flood towers towered above it finally, but this is at verified and it is hoped they have managed to reach higher portions.

Yet the death list was heavy in Francis Atlanta, somewhat heavier than any other city or town. Therefore as each boatload of dead bodies were landed outside the flood zone and rushed into automobiles trucks and wagons, and to the refugee camps, where a big registration bureau is being conducted by refugee officials under the very personal supervision of the Mayor of Francis Atlanta, names omitted.

The thousands of rescued were every day as quickly as they were picked up and quickly hurried into boats, wagons, and so on, and whirled around to the refugee camps or better spots. Responding to appeals, the contributions of money and provisions had a been very generous but could not be forthcoming as food and forest fires cut off all communications whatever. For those who cannot be taken out of the districts at all, even return boats with what leaves of bread clothing candles and drinking water and wines that the city could spare was sent.

Indeed where families are safe and well provisioned the policy has been adopted of leaving them until those in worse condition can be cared for, even those not as bad of were doing their share in acts of charity.

There were thousands who refused to leave their homes, preferring to save their effects from the flood, or from the report of disguised gladiatorial looters those activities have been reported to be even too much for any amount of companies and regiments of guardsmen and all the police, so that can be spared when the disastrous flood should abate. In the continued and most desperate rescue work for all sections, serious or less serious, and even dangerous and difficult, boats, rafts, wreckage pontoon, pontoons horses and the like were used. Many skilled riders were able to drive their steeds next to crumbling houses, and pull occupants onto the backs of the horses, or into boats. A troop of sixty volunteers worked from the Vincentian convents and the Sacramento Street landing and rescued 10,000 from their flooded homes. Also city policemen, fire men, gendarmes and soldiers and citizens worked side by side, aided by hundreds of brave and daring women volunteers. Given elder children dared the chances of the flood to rescue their still younger brethren. The majority of rescuers included many experienced boat and raftsmen, all using their own craft, or constructing their own rafts, and pontoons to aid in the work. Confirmed reports later on found that the dead bodies found in the flooded streets of Francis Atlanta amounted up to 5,678 all drowned. It was a terrible loss compared to the small death list at Angelina Agathia.

Such statements are here given to show the great impression made by the rise of the waters and extent of the flood. Among some of the remarkable incidents reported at Big Girl Knool as the slowly receding waters permitted access to all portions of the city, could be some of those to be related in connection with the experience of Henry Joseph in the city of Gladstone, a suburb of Big Girl Knool. When the flood first appeared in that section of the city, Mr. Joseph, got his wife and three children into a small row boat, and took them to the convent just across the street. An hour later it was again necessary for all even the inmates to move, and they were taken by rescuers out of a second story window. The raft on which the whole crowd were being transported, was dashed against a large house by the terrific current, and landed in fragments by the shock, one section of the raft going under. Mr. Joseph swam bravely in the unusually warm water for a few minutes, when he was picked up by some men in a large flat boat. Just before he was rescued he saw his wife sink for the third time. His baby girls and the children and inmates of the convent were floating down the street. At this sight he collapsed. Five hours later he regained consciousness to find himself in an attic, and beside him on the floor lay his wife, whom he believed to have been drowned. Ten minutes later a man of crawled into the attic window from the floating roof of a barn bringing with him the children. They had been caught in the branches of a floating tree, and were picked off unharmed by the same man who was riding to safety on the roof. Mrs. Joseph was rescued as she was going down the third time by a Galverinian boyscout on a hastily improvised boat raft. The boat was a member of the boyscouts of the Mobilization camps of Dorothy Gale city and had been trained how to administer first aid to the drowning.

The Nuns of the convent were saved in an unusual manner. They were rescued by men on a large raft, he and his helpers bringing them onto the raft from the water. One of the nuns insisted in bringing with her a large earth shovel rather than a coal shovel which she grasped from a floating mass of wreckage. Yet in attempting to round a street corner where a terrific torrent poured in from a large open square the raft was hurled against an electric light pole, and the raft was demolished and all were again in the water. A man in a boat rescued one of them, and the others floating close to a tall house were rescued by the refugees in the building who hung ropes from the windows. Hanson Heder who lived in Big Girl Knobel was one of the large number of life savers. He rescued a woman and her two children from the third story window of a flooded house which was afire on top of Linden street, who brought with her a long spade, clutching the spade to her breast she prayed, as she sat in the stern sheet of the boat. In attempting to run round a street corner where a torrent was pushing before it a mass of wreckage, the boat was overwhelmed by it, caught in the jam and forced to proceed in that direction. In the commotion Hanson lost the paddle with which he had been propelling his craft.

"Through mysterious means Our blessed Lord warned me this would happen," cried the woman, "Our blessed Lord has told me. Now how will we get out of this mess?" Yet Hanson managed to force the boat out and paddled with the pole to a place of safety. Other rescuers found a woman standing in water waist deep in the third story of her home in east Angelina Agathia. An hour before the rescuers arrived, the woman had given birth of a daughter which she was clutching in her arm. It was alive. Yet from her exasperated experience the poor woman is not expected to live. Just as he was coming out of the front door of his residence, at No 1587 south Grinnell street a high member of the Gemini was the flood coming. He rushed back to his stable and brought his horses and wagon around in front. Then he called to his wife and three children children whom he lifted into the car or wagon and then began loading the car with chairs and rugs from the parlor. On top of the chairs he piled a davenport, which ordinarily two men scarcely would be able to handle he being a powerful man. Then just as he was starting away the wagon was overwhelmed, and had to be deserted. They took refuge in a passing house which though floating by was strong. Then they were forced from this and threw themselves into a boat which had started out from a wharf not far away.

"to me it was an aphasia," the Gemini member whose name was Francis Grone. In relating his experience. "It happened so sudden that I don't remember anything much about it, but there stands the loaded wagon, ruined of course, and thank Heaven my home is still standing. After the flood he was engaged like all other citizens of Angelina Agathia in shoveling mud from his homestead after the waters receded. When the flood overwhelmed the wagon his wife and children became separated, and for two weeks the Gemini member could not find them. The interior of his house was ruined badly by water. Fire broke out in a building near his headquarters, where large numbers of the members held councils. In the building were invaluable plans and data dealing with the construction of the Gemini member. He was greatly relieved when he returned to find that the flames, had spared the headquarters and its contents.....2

Meldon Hicknellian, secretary to the Governor of Abyssinika gate to elucidate the real cause of the tremendous flood, and all the flood disasters of the past, prepared a chart, using the human hand and other means as an illustration. The fingers pointing north, represented the big stream flowing into the gigantic Mio-Holleston Run, which is the wrist in his illustration. The wrist was blocked by levees, and holes drawn in the levees showed the ruined levees either blasted or injured by explosion concussion, and other disasters to flood impediments, and by therefore with its own levees broken before could not take care of the influx of flooding waters of previous floods, and of its tributaries. Hence the flood.

Here is the problem of Angelina Agathia as summarized by the Governor of Galverinia two weeks after the flood:

"Two million five hundred thousand people must be fed, clothed, and housed for weeks to come. A million persons must be cured for indefinitely. These are persons who lost their all when their homes and household goods were swept away. They must be provided with a few necessary household goods, such as bedding, pots and pans, stoves, a refugee camp and a few dollars. Two million dollars could be used in this way.

Some distance was over turned, and the party was thrown into the very hot boiling water. Several of horses came along swimming for their lives. One of the the bridge to the river.

by the Relief Committee. Five hundred thousand houses must be restored for rehabilitation. Fifteen thousand houses, and twenty thousand other houses, or structures or what remains of them must be torn down. Emperor Vivian needs a new palace, as it has been swept away entirely in the flood. Millions of tons of debris must be removed. Hundreds of new buildings must be replaced where the fires raged.

A real horror or a tale of terror, which gives a real insight into the mental and physical strain suffered by the marooned in Franciamina city center was from that of one of the Sisters who lived through three weeks of horror with terror stricken inmates and fellow nuns and three priests in their hospital at Greenleaf Avenue.

"For twenty one terror filled days and nights, I despite my Holy Faith was almost one of the despairing number who were penned in with our patients in the great hospital. It was the fourth flood I went through in this city. I saw a whole district of buildings close to us and in front of us and behind and beside us burn or fall to fragments to the waters edge. I saw men in a hotel across the street frantically extinguish the blazing wreckage which drifted into the flooded lobby of the hotel only to light in vain and were driven from their burning refuge to other houses. I saw the head sister whirl down stream, from one side of the street to the other until she was flung against a telephone pole and killed.

Most of the things I and those with me have seen all those awful days, and nights, will stick in my memory as long as I live.

At the beginning of the dreadful flood probably on a Monday morning by the voices of people on a street corner below the corner window of the hospital. They were looking anxiously at the torrents of water that had crept through a half crumbling levee and was now within two hundred of the window. Many were crying out to one another that the city was doomed, and that flight was the only way by which the population could save their lives. No one was unconvinced, for they pointed out that though their city had yet never been touched disastrously by floods during the war, yet Angelina Agathia had been flooded but four times and the whole central part of Galverinia was now still feeding the dangerous rivers with the flooding flood waters of the past disasters. If few people lived through the first part flood and other disasters, it was a wonder if they too could make a good success of no loss of lives.

The employees house was the only second house from the explosion concussion shaken levee in the corner of greenleaf Avenue. Families in all houses around the hospital began to make preparations for the waters which might soon fill their homes. While they could many very unpleasant things about the enemy whom they felt sure were responsible for all this, and all the sisters and employees worked frantically moving the patients to all the upper floors and furniture and beds and all medicines also, and trying to place all hospital needed articles above what we thought could be the reach of the muddy waters.

About twenty minutes later I saw the water was breaking through the tumbling levee in earnest. I and all my charges became frightened and I and all the rest of the sisters had all they could do to prevent a panic. I ran upstairs, took one little three year old patient in my arm, and started a run for the higher part of the building. I saw many outside running until they were almost ready to drop. It seemed that they could never be able to reach safely. The weight of the weight of the child in my arms grew almost too great for my strength. As I ran up the stairs the water rushing into the building seemed to follow me. Before I had reached the second floor I happened to get a glance out of a window as we saw water advancing toward the fugitive fugitives from another direction. When I started up to another floor the water had reached me and was swarming over the floor above my head.

I was drenched by the water which poured in one of the open windows. I then thinking the water would not come higher stopped on the third floor and again looked out of the window. I saw a man run into a large building and beg a man to drive back to his home and get out his wife and children. In thirty seconds the water had overwhelmed them even though on higher ground, yet yet another man on a wagon was speeding through shallower water on his way to his own home, while my employees were doing what they could to secure accommodations for all the patients.

Just as soon as I had secured a room for my own little patients, I went as employee to the telegraph office on the third floor with a message to the Mayor of the city that do far I and all the patients and sisters were safe in the hospital, and that if he could he should come to the hospital, to secure better quarters for us as soon as possible.

Just then the flood was increasing in height and I saw many houses going going to pieces. I was almost frantic and the patients again became panic stricken. Those who could not be moved yelled and howled. I could see the water creeping up from the second second floor steps, higher and higher every minute, and to think that only three quarters of a mile away my own parents were trapped in their home and would certainly be drowned. I wonder I did not go inside. Yet the water grew deeper, until we were forced up to the fourth story. The building was no higher and we worked like mad to save the patients a third time. By this time as we observed from that height that the city was becoming encompassed and almost entirely drowned out of sight by a vast lake, and the water flowed swiftly and was of a yellowish color. We were thus marooned for two weeks. Every day it seemed dozens of horses and other animals were swept by the hospital windows, plunging and whirling in the current. The rushing flood was filled with junks of bread boxes, crates, goods boxes and every conceivable kind of litter and wreckage. The employees managed to secure a good number of these for the patients and ourselves, but there was no bodies that I saw. Thank heaven we were spared that sight.

Glendelina turned on the

Dach

Most of all of the employees proved themselves real heroes. I had never seen such unselfish heroism as the men employed or displayed. It was an inspiration to every one of the patient patients who were in the building. The heated atmosphere was terrible. The head sister stationed herself at the upper window of the hospital, to fend off timbers and wreckage which was thrown against the weaker walls of the building. Although many of the employees and we ourselves begged her pitiously not to risk her life, she stuck to her post until she fell out of the window, was caught by the current and whirled away. The swirling waters swept her from one side of the street to another until she was thrown first against a telephone pole and then dashed head first against the wall of a building within our sight and instantly and instantly KSI killed.

The children in the hospital were not frightened in the least by such an awful flood. They who were able to be out of bed leaned out of the windows and crowded with excitement and pleasure at the body of a horse, cow or any other kind of an animal would be swept by in the flood. They were too young to understand what it all could mean, six young men who were imprisoned in another strong building across the street from us, put on their bathing suits, tied ropes around their waists and managed to swim to the roof of a half submerged brick building, on the roof of which a large group of people were standing. One by one they tied the ropes around the waists of the marooned men, women and children and gave the signal for them to be pulled ashore. When any of the people refused to go, they shoved them into the water. Five minutes after the last man and child left the half submerged building, it collapsed and was swept away into the current.

A rope was thrown from the hospital, to the house across the street, when a taller house alongside caught fire, so that those who jumped into the water, might have the chance to grasp the rope and they were whirled under it, and allow them selves to be pulled to safety.....

Sixteen days later I learned that no one had perished in the flood. "....."

ANFUL

ARTFUL DAYS OF RECKONING FOR THE STATE OF NORTHERN ANGELINIA. ALL OF THE NORTHERN PART OF THE STATE AND FIVE OTHER STATES MADE DESOLATE BY ANGRY WATERS. EVEN THE BEST OF RIVER BARRIERS SWIFT AWAY, AND MORE TOWNS AND CITIES UNWASTED IN THIS HORROR DELUGE THAN ANY OTHER FLOOD HORRORS OF THE PAST COMBINED.

RELIEF OFFERED BY STATE AND NATION THE FRANK OF THE GOVERNMENT OF FOUR STATES REALIZED. THE FLOOD UPHEALED. ALL ANGELINIA STATE IN THE NORTH ETHUREN.

PICTURESQUE STORIES. THE WHOLE OF ABRIEMNIA DOES HER BEST DEWITE PARALYZED CONDITIONS TO RESPOND TO APPEAL

And then for both Calvernia and Northern Angelinia came another day of reckoning. Forced to gradually burst their bounds by other terrific explosions, caused by the forest fires that by their convulsion wrought fresh havoc in the territories to the north of the range of the Great Lake Mic-Holleston the peaceful waters of the Erminie Creek flooded by rains in mountainous regions, the Mic-Holleston Run once again, the little Erminie Run and a hundred tributaries in Northern Angelinia combined because of the convulsions in no one final onslaught upon the population wrecking a vengeance which in this story is unparalleled in the history of all the flood horrors combined though happily not attended with heavy loss of life though property destruction broke all records.

The whole nation as well as the amazed world itself had not yet recovered from the continued shocks and grief experienced one month after another relieving the awful news of the unbelievable loss of life and immeasurable destruction of property in all past fearful disasters and even now was not yet hearing all of the August and September horror, and the latter in Angelinia Agathia and other places and surrounding towns and villages.

The great industrial centers of Angelinia and other States were continually since June 1912 straining their energies to render all the assistance to their suffering neighbors and knowing the results of all the past disasters and the present Angelinia Agathia horror could not rest in peace. The whole world was becoming afraid of Angelinia. Indeed even the whole country of Abriemnia herself had been worried. Despite the disasters elsewhere throughout the State of Calvernia especially in the west there were storms of wild and frightful battles exceedingly violent and fierce, and in the southeast, west and north great floods and in the surrounding territory for months and months without abatement there had been a terrible forest fires. Past floods had not abated to any extent rivers whose dikes and levees whose dikes and levees had not been aided since the great floods had been treated were still letting at their waters over the land which, except in a few places, kept the seas of water to inundate the cities and towns and to ruin the crops.

Other streams were filled to their banks and as their waters flowed in anger menaced new territories territories as their levees were undermined by the present explosions. In every state in every part of the country there was great cause for alarm. From even the violence of battles of October and the months before it was evident the war was growing wild beyond description and comprehension. As it noted thousands of great explosions occurred. The war was said to still a revolting makeoff makeoff of the infernal regions around Ivin, Ickey and elsewhere during August and September. No goal beyond men are measures was the number killed in battle and immeasurable the size of the armies of injured, and still more immeasurable the monstrous columns of columns, and worse than all the numbers ill and insane from suffering and loss.

A thundering hell still raged with increasing fury at Ivin, Wickey and along the whole Western Calvernian coast, and that of Angelinia and Abyssinkila too, and the whole world was becoming worried. One thousand five hundred miles of forests had been burning, and countless leagues of forests were still burning, and forty ranges of hills covered with the forests extending one half the distance of the Californian Rocky mountains pretended they were volcanoes in eruption from the forest fires. And added to this a thousand miles of country side except the regions of Lake Pelicia, and northern section of Calvernia were still under water, and the country side still strewn with the debris scattered far and wide by the rush of water. Hundreds of the towns were still unaccounted for. The regions of the city of Abriemnia, and many other cities were still a vast lake slowly receding. More to towns than those devastated by the floods and explosions combined were laid in ashes by the forest fires. 10,000 miles of land were devastated by fire from June 1912 to September 1913 and the forest fires now were "burning the world" as to say. In standing of decreasing, the number of refugees was increasing. Ha. Ha. So were the christian armies. All men population of abled bodied conditions in Abyssinkila and Angelinia state were in the army already. Men of ingenuity had devised great stone dams, the levees and dikes to protect their homes and manufacturing establishments from the angry waters. This for ages proved a great success until Angelinia turned on the "Faucet" over Calvernia, and "Forgot" to turn it Fortunately so far 220,000 loaves of bread was in reach to be distributed, for six days after the explosion concussion but nevertheless because of the needs of the sufferers it was even doubtful if these loaves of bread would last throughout the seventh day. Perhaps the hardest pressed of the Citizens of both Angelina and Agathia and, probably, a Gals were the student physicians and surgeons. Although all of Angelina Agathia's doctors were in the various armies, or still among the refugees of the past disasters, and these line internes suffered severely in property losses because of the shock produced by the explosion they nevertheless administered incessantly and by sacrifice to the needs of others. In all cases there was scarcely time to ascertain whether their own loved ones were safe when the urgent call to duty came.

Several of those who were connected with St. Joseph's Hospital had their beautiful homes DESTROYED BUT FILLED with compassion for the injured labored continually, without hardly any rest in the work of relief. Among these was Doctor Hendro Gales, a Gals who lived on 12,667 San Pedro Street, an interne, and whose home was not exactly wrecked but made a "mysteriously kind of a disappearance". He found his home later six blocks away from its foundations. When the explosion shook the city the concussion after making the building do the "highland fling", partly destroyed the Giacomo residence, shaking out numerous windows and by rebounding from the falling ruins of another house as his residence landed on the street a huge twelve by twelve twenty foot long beam of wood drove its way straight through the house into his library smashing the cases, and scattering all the books on the floors. Yet as soon as he discovered that his own family was safe (not having been in the building at the time) Dr. Giacomo hurried out to do what he could in the way of assisting the injured.

The work of few other doctors were of like nature. Although they also lived in the stricken districts and were and were heavy sufferers they rushed to the scene of devastation where they were kept busy for a great many days and partly during the night too. Dr. Gales himself later went to the southwest end of the town, with a troop of nurses and special doctors with orderlies. Before the arrival of doctors at St. Joseph's Hospital a good work that any one there would say was heroic, was performed by the Chief surgeon of the hospital. Although hampered by the loss of light, either by gas, or electric electric this doctor, Mantena, I would with the help of candle light every day and night, even late in the morning getting at night only two or three hours of sleep helping the injured which incessantly applied in crowds at the place for aid and succor.

Although called upon to do a number of serious operations the need of hurry and the awfully large number of half desperate patients made it impossible to administer anesthetics. Many other doctors after taking their families from the wreckage of their homes also joined the relief squads. For this story no such catastrophes ever visited the city of Angelina Agathia before or after, and it was totally overwhelmed by it. The citizens however rose to meet the situation and the measure of the relief efforts were organized promptly. All the remaining Catholic priests visited homes that had been met with partial or total destruction in many cases administering the last sacraments of the Church. Within sixty four hours after the disaster $1,700,000 had been subscribed for the relief of the destitute.....

As far as possible all help in a substantial fashion was given by the State of Angelina to the stricken cities and towns of both states and so forth within sixteen days after the explosion shock did so much damage the Legislatures of cities and towns of Southern Angelina state took up a bill to bill to appropriate $100,000,000 for the explosion shock sufferers passed it over the head of the Committee as a whole and adopted it at once. Not a single was cast.

Not a single vote was cast against the bill. One of the odd situations presented as a result of the disaster was that which confronted the newly effected railroads in their operation. Signal wires, switch and block signal were completely demoralized and in the days following the disaster the railroad men had to resort to the antiquated methods of sending out all kinds of signal men to mark the passage of trains not hampered by the disaster.

Men carrying red flags were sent ahead to signal clear track, to give warning of danger or approaching refugee trains and the cars carrying passengers and freight and also forest fire and other refugees crawled in and out of the two big stricken cities at a decrease of speed which caused considerable delay, and anxiety. And out of the sorrow and settled and horrifying effects of it all, there grew immense indignation for even in the face of death and so many of their fellow men are suffering, all must know the real cause of it all. Who would be surprised at this as answer to this question from a man who stood gazing upon what had been his beautiful home in St. Peter's Street when a good and sympathetic friend approached.

"Well Mr. James what's your stand point on all this disaster..?"

Mr. James scratched his head reflectively and then replied in laconically "don't know except that this will put glandelinia in the hot soup pot for stay...."

off, but bursted the pipes and water systems. Ever since the construction of the levees of the rivers they had been made up in a way that for a century floods from natural reasons were a remembrance only. Now, glandelinia gave Calvernia and northern Angelina a deluge never recorded in true history, maybe worse than the great deluges of Bible History. True there had been expectations of the abatement of the present floods which remained from times past, in fact it was a dry season over most of the country, one of the driest seasons on record, almost a draught for some sections and it was expected that here and there throughout the lowland the waters from the remaining broken levees would still find their way over the earth to keep up a continuation of a small portion of the past disaster, and then with the continuation of the dry season added by the heat of seeds of forest fires to reseed, and allow the drained rivers to go on their way peacefully and allow the reconstruction of the damaged dikes and levees. But while Calvernia was dry, in Abyssinikila and northeast Calvernia, as well as all of Abyssinikila and extreme northern Calvernia, the weather had been unusually rainy all summer and kept the rivers up to their unusual flood tide. Therefore knowing of this there continually was great fear.

For all the past horrors, and the refusal of the past floods to reseed, and all the cloudbursting rain and thunderstorms up north on a rampage caused the nation great apprehension. Men women and children walked through the streets of Angelinian towns and cities, and pursued their daily vocations, or watched the fantastic smoke clouds of the tremendous forest fires, or read the news of horrible of unbelievable disasters and of the crazy fury of the war but always with that tormenting fear that their own homes may at any time share the same fate as that of the states further north and west, where angry forest fires, terrific floods, battles and pillage of the enemy had brought desolation to many million millions and still continued.

The fighting in many territories was no tribal business. Besides creating these fearful disasters it was quite the recognized principal to destroy harvests, cut down fruit trees and lay waste whole districts hundreds of miles of extent in order to starve the Christians into submission (if they can). Chiefly as a consequence of the war disasters, and the war itself beginning from 1912 up to the present time famine was raging in full away in all parts of southern and other devastated parts of Calvernia and other states killing as many as if it had lasted twenty five years. Even this famine was being exceeded in horror by a complication of pestilences, and the results of disaster after disaster, and thousands of doctors and hundreds of surgeons had to be sent to the districts and the refugees by the armies themselves. Now by now could not be obtained at any price whatever, and fruits of all kinds was a thing of the past.

The poor and the rich died of hunger. The streets of cities and towns not restored from the wreck, as well as many others were strewn with the dead and dying, and all of the plague horrors of this history could not compare one third with this. It was reported frequently that mothers allowed themselves to die so their own children could eat them as food. The Abbeinnian Governmental Authorities set themselves the tasks of relieving these states from the beginning of the horror, especially those ravaged by the terrible war famine and plague with communication was so destroyed that such means was extremely difficult; last alone with the frequent confounded interference from the enemy.

Everywhere was the most touching accounts of suffering. This aroused the whole nation in the act of charity. Food and other provisions by horse and wagon only could be transported to the devastated provinces, and this was to be distributed by all organizations of charity, but the distance in all cases was tediously long and all these wagons would take weeks to reach the nearest point. This was the most difficult problem. Of the exulted or exalted heroism of priest and holy women; many of whom died through overwork, hardships, and pestilence martyres of charity among the Calvernianians I have not space here to write. The three Chief Corp Corporal Works of Mercy in the tremendous relief scheme of the Abbeinnian Government were to feed the hungry, the burial of the dead, the restoration of towns and villages, to shelter the vast armies of homeless and destitute, and with the efforts of obtaining the seeds to bring on the following years crop. The feeding of the hungry was to be done by soup kitchens in refugee camps as it was done in Belgium during the World War and was to be conducted by the military, sisters of all Denominations and so on.

In many still wrecked and unrepaid towns the families of the highest rank, were also glad to accept this relief when it was forthcoming. But why when and how long would it take. Districts of Francis Atlanta, Marie Osborne, and many other places too numerous to mention here, were crowded with fugitives from the new disasters, as well as still retaining the refugees from past horrors. At Marie Osborne there had been within three months time 10,000,000 that had been continually day by day and so on by the thousands upon thousands per day in the "soup line".

Lack of sunshine because from the smoke of the numerous enormous forest fires, and other great conflagrations that shut out the sun all over the State increased the plagues, and suffering, added by the untimely heat. As far north as Vivian Wickey, the sun barely shone unless the wind was north. In the town of all the southeastern sections of Calvernia there was the same, distress and less relief, and to try and obtain relief the refugees had to chance the hardships and peril to travel to big towns and cities for help or perish one or the other, and they mostly had to go by foot or wagon or on horseback and so on in devastated towns in streets and fields countless thousands of human and animal bodies still lay unburied, spreading forth corruption and disease. Many Angelinian prisoners were drawn from internment camps and set to work to help bury the dead, and also give assistance in rescue work at the point of the bayonet. It was ghastly and dangerous work in which many lost their lives. The Government was also careful to provide seed for the land. The authorities collected huge quantities of seed every kind of grain seed from her unharmed states, all those that had escaped the ravages of the war, and they sent the seeds to the afflicted states. Millions were spent for this purpose. Just the same Oklahoma needed 10,000 St Vincent De Pauls for her afflicted districts. Everything was done that could be done even in relief measures the armies became the strongest support of the states in their hours of direst trial.

All printing companies in the nation published the scenes of suffering and had their distributed free everywhere, even at church doors. They were periodicals appearing every day. These papers increased the work of charity wonderfully. The people continued to contribute and increased their contributions. Refugees were relieved into their homes.

And then the new flood. Less than seventeen days after the explosion had shaken good portions of Angelinia Agathia and other places to ruin, and the forest fires had swept out of sight over the hills past these ruined cities, Angelinia Agathia the "dam and apo" capital city of Abbiannia was suddenly swept by turbulent floods that carried all of man's possessions before it. For an enormous extent death and destruction laid hand upon the districts of a countryside, shaken up by the concussion sent up rivers against its loose their unusual energies and burst through undermined levees, storms of forest fires still raged with ever increasing fury, and desolation grew in scores of cities, and gradually swept through five states. Of course if it had not been for the explosions everything would have yet have been all right. The swirling waters of the Angelinian gun brought high by continually receding the waters of the remaining floods swished against the powerful levees near Angelinia Agathia on September 15th 1913 and because of the concussion marked it a memorable day of the year of 1913 for all Angelinia State.

Within the steel and concrete banks made by man the waters welled higher and higher in its course. Many people remembering past disasters stopped to look at the angry stream. It had never seemed as angry as before.

"The water of the river is unusually high," they said. "And I guess it is from the receding waters of the floods up north. But as long as there are no more great explosions up north or near us there will be no flooding."

But yet they were alarmed. They had no confidence that the levees would protect them and the horror of explosions and their results was all always in their minds. It was also for those in the territories many miles down the river where the waters of the Angelinian gun joined forces with the Eralnia river and go swishing on toward the west that they feared.

So even though they went on their way men women and children shook their heads as the turbulent waters raced through the city and past and apprehensively went their way not even wayward sure of their own safety. Because of the enemy and the past disasters caused by the enemy thereon the most ignorant ignorant of ignorant of the people could not be too sure of themselves and of man's prowess, since they witness the results of the tremendous explosions in or about September 15th.

The waters of the Aronburgs also continually receding the waters from the slowly receding floods of the past and from rains up north and in wet parts of the country as well as the Mic-Hole H Mic-Hollester River had also joined forces and continually kept in connection with those of the great Eva St Glare and Eralnia creek and had dashed continually against the protecting levees. Yet if it was not for the explosions they would have held, even though the waters found some weak spots caused by the concussion of the Ot other explosion.

Whatever explosion occurred on September 15th it will never be known or even where it happened, as the flood erased all source of the explosion, but again portions of Angelinia Agathia was disastrously effected with a death list of forty thousand in an instant and the shaking of the ground with earthquake force over a vast terrible shock the levees sunder and a terrible flood the like never before known was gradually let loose.

Houses innumerable were rended and smashed against one another, their occupants having narrow escapes from death, or injury, hundreds of most expensive mills were washed away, hundreds of immense factories inundated, the fallen ruins of the shocks, washed entirely away, enormous city bridges washed or swept away, men torn from the side of their wives, children wrested from their mothers arms and horses and other animals swept down in the mad rush of water which found none able even if ready to meet the emergency.

In the city of Angelinia Agathia as well as Dorothy Gale every one of the sweetest deep in the streets were ripped out by the raging torrents, that entered their masses electric lights, telephone poles and all the wires were broken and torn from their anchorages, fires beyond control in whole districts of the ruins though blazing infernos smothered and put out and all the vaunted fact facilities and improvements for the convenience of the population were wiped out, or rendered useless.

Two cities as with as many houses as Chicago and New York put together in one, were facing utter ruin. Death stalked abroad and with the wash of the waters through and precisely upon the town of caused precisely to flood

When they abandoned their large and richly furnished homes at the first outbreak of the flood, this occurring on sixteenth street, located across the river from Gundandon. The children could be seen and distinctly heard from the gundandon side of the river. They were at every window day and night for two weeks screaming for aid, food, and drinking water, with the flood rising all the time till it was evident it would force them to seek safety on the roof. The water was in the first two floors of the building and to rescue them was an impossibility.

It was nearly three weeks before aid could come to them and they were half starved and in desperation drunk of the flood waters, and incurred many various illnesses. Throughout the whole city maniacs driven crazy by starvation nights of horror, or by loss of their dear ones, caused the soldiers and surviving soldiers no end of trouble. They would rush from house to house, and up and down the main streets through mud two to three feet deep screaming and yelling at the top of their voices and tearing their hair.

Nearly two thousand five hundred people made homeless and poverty stricken by the flood were housed in a refugee camp, outside of the city. Six thousand more were in the hillside some of them with nothing but a few rugs with which to cover themselves, and a hot scorching wind was sweeping through the city.

The Mayor himself took complete charge of the city, prohibiting the smoking of cigars and cigarettes in any part of the city, as the water supply was so limited that it would have been impossible to fight a fire should one have broken out and then the whole city would have been totally destroyed. And to make it worse all the fire departments were crippled. None of the dead were identified. Only Lucille Jackson and Jessica seemed to have a death list of severe numbers because of the flood so far.

Many thousands of people, without food or protection, from the heat, most of them sick, escaped from their homes and fled panic stricken into the hills. Appeals were sent to the Mayors of every city within a radius of one hundred miles from the flood and forest fire zones to rush food and clothing to prevent the entire population of the city of Lucille Jackson from being wiped being wiped out.

The Mayor of Lucille Jackson, sent back to the government a gruesome and official report, which is indeed a gruesome tale; he wired; "Two thousand one hundred and fifty bodies will be interred to morrow. Hundreds of horses were burned in the streets. A score of the principal thoroughfares have been washed into ditches twenty feet deep. Lucille Jackson city will supply a real problem because we have reached it until now through Pandora. It has been impossible to get there from the south, with the Pandora supply diminishing down to the point of need, and the Angelinian gun flood situation cutting off all communication from all sides, Lucille Jackson was practically cut off."

Among the interesting stories from the flood district were those told by James Francis Gruler of Angelinia Agathia, who had been flood bound at Lucille Jackson for several weeks. Mr Gruler had been in Lucille Jackson city since the beginning of the flood, having reached there before the disaster by going through Rosamtown from Angelinia Agathia. He said to those who interviewed him:

"When I left Angelinia Agathia on a Thursday there was absolutely no sign of a flood, but when the slowly moving train passed through Rosamtown we noticed there that for some strange reason or other the river there was backing up."

In Lucille Jackson on the following morning the first indication we had of a flooded condition was when we noticed the street sewers flood and pour out water onto the streets.

By noon the river itself had risen so high that several bridges were carried away, and what surprised me still more was that the land all around and on each side of the river also was becoming flooded, so that instead of the river overflowing the other water was rising rapidly with the purpose it seemed to engulf the river itself and turn it into a sea. By night, and hundreds of refugees were confined to our hotel on Thirteenth Street. It was from the roof of the hotel that we viewed the fire burning a whole block of houses and saw those structures go to ruin. Another fire broke out at Two Thirty in the afternoon, and was still spreading, when a week later I left Lucille Jackson by a strong boat. The bridges were taken out in a manner that surely surprised me. The first one to go was the Second Street Bridge, while went down at Seven in the evening, the next one being the structure at Six o'clock in the morning, and many others gave way late that night. I witnessed two of the most splendid bridges of the city go down, and the mighty currents I accomplished their feat as easily as any one might turn a hat over. The structures seemed to rise in the middle, then easily settled to below the surface of the turbulent flood. From the roof of the Hotel where I was stranded, I could view the fires which broke out in different parts of the city. The burning of twenty mills, and the destruction of others by the flood, will put nearly fifty thousand men out of work. As to the reported loss of life, I do not believe that the figures are correct, and I believe the loss will be far less than was expected. The loss of property however is beyond estimating, and will run far into the scores of millions. The property damage was so great that I do not think that fifty years will see Lucille Jackson entirely recovered from the effects of this flood visitation."

Probably one of the most thrilling experiences was that of a large number of school girls, who were rescued after a twenty four hour siege on top of the school building. It took four hours for any one to reach them, and twelve to bring them out of the flood some safely. Many other persons were swept out by the destructive force of the flood. For some time they were ducked and tossed into the water, and when rescued both were suffering from injuries received by debris which struck them occasionally. One of them said:

Back

"It happened so suddenly. We did not even know we were in the arms of death. We were in the third story of our home, when the water suddenly reached in and swept us out. We clung to each other, and almost before we realized our situation we were hurled into a tree partly submerged in the water. We both clung to it until we had regained our breaths. This was early in the afternoon. After a few moments we both began to climb into the top branches of the tree.

We had scarcely more than a house gown to our backs but fortunately it was summer and not winter with its bitter cold. We were soaked. And within an hour we had floated down fourteen miles with the tree which remained as it was while it continued to move. We called and called for help. I did not expect any one would be able to save us. But nevertheless the big hope held me and my companion from throwing ourselves into the swirls of the flood.

We had no drinking water for many days before this happened to us. We became so thirsty that we chanced the danger of drinking as far as we could scoop it up some of the clearest portion of the flood water. I and my companion shall never forget as long as we live the horrors of the two days and nights there in the floating tree. It appeared that every house or drift that sailed past us had many persons on it.

Right before our very eyes we saw hundreds and hundreds of old men, women and children thrown from their flimsy refuge and rescued by others with difficulty in the flood. Fourteen times rescuers tried to save us but the tree moved down the flood faster than any boat. Many on floating house tops managed to cling on and disappear from our sight. It was horrible. It was awful, and after we had shrieked ourselves hoarse, a few boats shot across the path of the floating tree and came to our aid. This was about ten o'clock in the next morning. They fought strongly, and reached us at last. He they tied the boat securely to the floating tree and reached up to us. It was painful, but we were glad to suffer the pain of being torn from the limbs of the tree. My foot was injured and swollen. It pained awfully. The rescuers put us into one of the boats. Our dresses had been torn by the whipping of the branches of the tree. The trip to a refuge camp seemed about the shortest and longest period of my life.

It seemed as though we were to be saved, and then in the next moment the frenzied waves would lick and curl about the boat, careening it until I thought we would be swallowed by the river. At last we got to shore. The rescuers carried us home, and one of them with the aid of his mother put us both to bed. Their mother called the doctor and did everything possible for us under the unler the circumstances....."

The house in which these two girls laid was surrounded by closely packed debris. The family with many others were living in three rooms on the third floor. It took a ladder to get to the window of the house.

Communications with Lucille Jackson had been said to be by the aid of field glasses and even written placards. A squad of soldiers on the west bank of the flood attempted to shoot a line across and secure telephone connections, but the attempt failed. The militia lines were piled all along the banks of the flood within view of the city. From early morning until dusk and night the militia men were beleaguered on all sides by frenzied relatives of those on the opposite side for news.

Later a government signal service was established between East and West Lucille Jackson and messages were sent from one point to another by means of an Abbessmuth switzer gun that shoots out a zigzagging wire with the message attached to the end of it. In this way communication was made somewhat possible between the militia men. All of the bridges small and large leading into Lucille Jackson were washed away, and on the arrival of about 1000 of the Royal Mounted, platoon, and pontoon bridges were constructed in various parts of the city. A small village north of Lucille Jackson known as Zinker has been completely washed away and most of her wreckage was swept into Lucille Jackson. However no lives were lost. A hundred and fifty men, women and children were marooned in as one big school house of the latter town. The water entered the second story of the building and was four feet deep on the floor. The men held the children, which numbered a score out of the water, and early in the morning rescuers who had learned they were there took them out of the second story windows in boats.

The Mayor of this little city, Henry Turner during the entire months period of the flood was marooned in the third story of his home with a three day old child and a very sick wife. The water was several inches deep on the top floor, and his wife was near death from illness and exhaustion.

Mr. Turner attended to the child and Mrs. Turner until rescuers were able to take them to the hills.

Men, women and children were falling from starvation, heat and sheer exhaustion on the streets everywhere, and it was a most common sight to see men by hundreds dragging their half starved wives through the streets in an effort to get them to a relief station to get enough food to keep them alive. They could get none.

It was her duty to save her babies, though of course she hesitated to leave her overconfident and foolish parents. So at five o'clock, when the final warning came from men in the street, she awoke the children. She even did not take time to dress them at all but put them both into a good sized garment, and putting a valise with them, she started for the high bridge across the river into the main and higher section of the city toward the Convent. When she was first across the bridge into the main section of the city there was no water in the streets but the river had increased to a tremendous volume and was roaring furiously.

But before she had gone more than a block or two, she could see the flood inundating the upper course of the river, overwhelming it like a rushing sea, and coming on behind her. She ran into a store at Third and First Streets. She was crying, and the men in the store asked her what the trouble was. She told them she had been compelled to leave her parents behind and wanted to telephone them to get a swift horse and wagon and leave at once. One of the men said he would go in his automobile instead for them.

She continued on toward the Convent. Soon the water on the sidewalk was over her shoes, and she was becoming terribly frightened. Hundreds and hundreds of others were running through the streets as she was. Many she could hear crying. More were calling to friends. She finally reached the convent and was given a room. Many women and children took refuge there. Soon the flood was in the lower section of the huge convent and rising above the second floor. When she looked at the window into the torrent sweeping down the street, she saw men and women swept apart by the current. They had fallen in near the Convent. They were carried past, part of the time on the surface, part of the time under. One of them a woman grabbed a pole, a telephone pole, she thought she was saved. But she was too exhausted to hold on long, and in a moment the current pulled her away. The poor lady went under and she did not see her again.

Horses and cows and other animals including many dogs and cats were struggling in the flooded street. There were many horses, hundreds. One fortunately found a foothold on the top step of the Sacred Heart cathedral near the Convent, against the door, almost across the street. He remained there two minutes until the increasing flood finally swept him along. Three other horses swept along by the flood found a foothold on a narrow ledge on the front part of the Sacred Heart Convent.

They were there for the full duration of the flood, and a warning was posted on the window opening on the ledge asking that no one open the window for fear of sweeping the horses of the ledge to their deaths.

While she watched the rising waters from the Convent windows, the first morning of the flood, contents of stores further up the street came floating past. They were not mixed. The contents of one store followed another. First the street was seen filled with floating furniture of all kinds, pianos, all kinds of musical instruments and even huge dining room tables. Then came counters of many stores, and every thing belonging to these stores, and thousands of pies, bread, and every thing seen in a bakery bakery. Then even came a tea store stock, and then the contents of other stores, and for days the water of flooded streets was filled with hot water bottles, and other rubber articles. So it went for days. During the night there was no light in the Convent and the air was uncomfortably warm both outside and inside. Food for all had been brought to the upper floors, but there was no water. Lights on the dining room tables were made of small salvaged altar and other candles of necessity, and even of greasy oil small dishes with a bit of tapers for a wick. With the reported evidence of the nearness of some portion of the ravaging forest fires, two days later, it became very hot, and people said Thermometers in the rooms registered 110. The children wanted to discard all of their clothing and go in the water not too deep on the lower floors of the flood, but we found the water to our surprise even so warm for comfort warmer than any one ever uses in a bathtub for bathing.

Then to make things worse fires broke out in buildings near them, and they did not know at what minute the fire might spread to the Convent. The first fire was in two dwellings near the back of the Convent. They all stood in the windows and watched them burn with a fear no one can suggest.....

Then a very large fire broke out on the other side. The employees of the Convent went through the building, and confiscated and hid every match for fear some of the younger children might play with them and set the selves and the Convent afire. Even after that there were no lighted dish and tape lamps. Another big fire was above them and burning wood floated down the current into the convent. Men took turns watching for each charred piece that floated down. A big hotel was still closer to the bigger fire. They feared this too would catch, and a rope was stretched across the street from the Convent to the buildings across the street alongside the hotel at the surface of the water to keep any one who might float down from being carried on past. It was not until the terrible flood had been on for nearly a month after that they were able to leave the Convent, that the woman herself learned of the experience of her parents.

No matter what was to turn up, or no matter what the peril they had refused to leave their home with the women who went for them in his "gas buggy." They told him over and over again they were not frightened, even though the water had risen to the second story of their house later on. Even then when they thought death was at hand and they really prepared to die, they feared not. Finally a boat came and forcibly carried them to a big ten story house further down the street. Hundreds of others were rescued from houses and taken to bigger and stronger looking buildings. In the convent with the brave woman who saved a her babies at a probable sacrifice there were fourteen and one sought refuge and who remained safely there until the danger was passed.

Her room was on the third floor of the convent and was no near the main flooded district, that she could see many of the terrors of the waters. The last week of the flood continued without abatement during that entire week. On that day she saw scores of weaker houses collapse and eighteen people drowned. She was standing by one of the windows in a dark morning when a child a ten year old girl came floating down the flooded street on a few pieces of lumber poorly held together. Two young men in a most frail boat, tried to rescue her, but just as their boat reached the little girl, the boat was struck by the raft on which was the child. The boat was capsize, and the men were thrown into the water. It was impossible to swim against the terrific current, and the two men were compelled to give up the fight and sink, while the raft, floated on to shore and the child was saved.

The two men were drowned. Everywhere every day that terrible month she saw houses collapse, taking with one persons who were marooned, and those who had been staying on the roof. One house went to pieces very swiftly, and the persons in it in it never had a fair fight for life. The sight was terrible, she prayed devoutly that she would never be a witness to another one.

Yet this poor woman could not understand how it could be that an awful flood of this character would occur. At despite all the horror of this disaster and while these floods were raging on, and covering more country than the size of the United States, and devastating just as many cities and towns to a finish, with every city and town, hundreds of cities, and all the thousand of towns smaller or large going through a horror worse than Galveston did in the hurricane of 1900 but of many weeks of duration.

If the horror of the flood would have been only that and nothing else to confine it can be of all probability that nothing else would have sufficed for the enemy.

But while these flood horrors raged, the enemy were getting more and more in possession of Calavernia; in the west, and east and south, forest fires of incredible and indescribable fury were devastating more forests than can be spared, the enemy were committing horrible massacres, and a thousand other disasters were raging, and fierce battles as we will see further on, those of planders, November River and Robespierre Danton, Gracchus and others.

Some cannot account why the horror goes on. The question is:

"What is the matter with the Calavernia Government?"

"Are they licked, or are they too dumb to take in the awful situation and stop these horrors?"

"What is going to happen to Calavernia, and her sister southern states if these dreadful horrors continue?"

"And why is this steadily pushing on all the time, after his 'glorious' glorious defeat' at Angelina St. Claire Evangeline St. Claire?"

And why is it, while these awful floods from the waters of Abbeism horror continue is the forest fires running all the way up to Gulf Bend without being stopped?"

"And whose fault is it, as is written before, that general Concentinism Aronburg army was surprised by the terrific forest fire and struck, and that in fighting the horror the general was badly burned along with his rescuer Walter sturring, and his army devastated, with the loss of all the tents?"

Why did the forest fire run general Vivian's army from the region of St. Claire or Evangeline St. Claire which he was supposed to guard?"

The horror of it all was unspeakable. All of it had its source from the waters coming down from Abbeism and the raging floods still there. But if it had come down from Abbeism and the raging floods still there. The portions of Calavernia that were not flooded were those of the high regions, where the forest fires and other disasters occurred. Therefore Calavernia had the combination of two huge disasters, fire and flood, while other disasters though countless was also unusual.

General Vivian on one occasion said:

"The conditions of the country is heart rending. About three quarters of southern Calavernia are wiped out by flood, and about nearly as much is devastated by raging forest blazes and the like. The loss of life is deplorable, even if it cannot ever be estimated for years to come. Maybe the loss of life will never be estimated, but the greatest stroke of all for Calavernia is the ruin of the banks in many cities, because of the destruction of Abbeism the great Calavernia Financial center in the world, with the destruction of the city of Abbeism over bank in the gate of Calavernia crushed, and a panic occurred. That is one of the most awful situations of all. That also puts us in a jeopardized condition of the war, and the floods block our armies so they cannot advance much. Only I and my brother can advance, and only follow the Hanleys. Elsewhere because of the flood the enemy has all the fun. Calavernia is literally in possession of glandolinia, and it will take many big armies to drive her out. If Abbeism cannot get her armies through the scene of desolation Calavernia is doomed and we'll lose the war. Heaven help our Country. Abbeism is the greatest horror of all."

Throughout the city of Angelina Agathia, for over sixteen streets and half a block distant the work of cleaning was most ignored. The health officers would run across instances in which many men who were cleaning had tried to find home that they might connect with a garden faucet, but had been unsuccessful. Then they had to go to work patiently with shovels to reduce the filth and mud on the floors of the houses where they were working.

Swiftly reaching and relieving the districts which endured the awful flood martyrdom of the month of disaster, the activities of the anti-contaminated districts of Angelina were finally turned toward the San Antonio River Valley.

Here a score of millions of beleaguered residents had entered into the flight fight with the greater flooded flood that was sweeping from Jesse Jencia toward the west. As fast as everything could be done, the local organizations were placed in charge, and got gross expenditures authorized from the Office of the Governor of the states now threatened. With general John Hendricks, commander of the military arm of that nation, the Chief Executives turned their energies toward the southern and southwestern sections of Angelina, the state, already the now spot emerged in the muddy flood tide.

Heldon, Tennellian, own having been entered by the expedition under General Painter, a depot of supplies was established, and some railway communication restored. Additional supplies rolled into this saved city, from the extreme north, and from other places in the northern north-west. Work was at last in the hands of the engineers, and some of the sanitary experts, while the capital city itself was being slowly but not crowded in good shape by men, thousands of well organized workers who reached and moved for every sufferer they could find. The one big spot in the extreme southern part of Calavernia state was Jesseism, where still even now, the most deplorable conditions were being recognized.

Being much more deplorable than those which existed and still existed in Angelina Agathia and Doron, Gale and other big cities.

In a word the city was utterly abandoned, and its streets were scenes of unusual horrors. While city after city, and town after town after town were still sending with sickening monotony stories of suffering and appeals for assistance which no one for a time could even believe, yet all told the same old, old, old story of danger passed and of a strong union of human forces dealing with the situation. This is a picture of wrecked Jesseism, a week after the world had ever thought the place had ever been stricken.

All factories were ruined, all people were cleaning away the mud and wreckage of the flood that had continually rushed over Jesseism for over thirty one days. The crying need of Jesseism is money. Thousands of workmen have had their homes and all they possessed swept away, and have nothing but the clothing they wear. Those who face this condition must have all kinds of help, and mainly substantial. The merchants and manufacturers have been wiped out, and can rely only on outside help, and thousands of working men will have to go to the city as they will fight to avenge this horror. Must be left, and many others who have visited Angelina Agathia, Dorothy Gale, and other stricken cities declared without reserve, that Jesseism has suffered by far the greatest loss of all, and yet because of the greater prominence of all other communities, they have gotten their distress before the country, while Jesseism almost wiped out of existence, all its factories wrecked, its business paralyzed, has been given much less attention because she cannot be communicated with.

Count de Biff submitted to the Governors of three or four states which had suffered from the flood an exhaustive report upon general conditions in Jesseism and other places showing that all streets with asphalt and brick had been ruined to a total loss. Every one of the sewers and the gas and other plants miles of every description in every home and residence and asylum were in such a ruined condition that for the people to live in them again would be an impossibility.

A large corps of Red Cross Nurses, reached Jesseism from the north to assist in family and distress nursing. All the teachers of the Catholic Schools were in the only surviving Catholic Church known as St. Peter's for instruction of preventing the spread of the plague, under Rev. Francis Hendro Snow M.D. pastor of the Church.

The Aronburgs, a partly ruined by the flood waters continually entering her but a new channel temporarily through the city and this did the damage. The city bridges, were all swept away and the havoc was complete. Every factory and manufacturing company in the city was not in operation and would not be so for months. The loss of one factory alone (there were hundreds totally ruined) is over $1,200,000, while the smallest factories would be two hundred and three hundred thousand dollars. At a conference of war correspondents and newspaper men, manufacturers and business men the total loss in K Jesseism was fixed conservatively at $15,000,000,000.

The following scenes in Jesseism were described by a lonely man whose name is not to be written here for his sake. He was not on his return from the flooded districts. He went there to search for his father and mother, who lived in the heart of the flooded district. He was also one of the few men with the exception of the state relief parties, who penetrated the rigid guard placed about the city by the Calavernia authorities. His description of conditions in Jesseism, Angelina Aguilera, Dorothy Gale, and other cities through which he said he passed furnished a stirring but graphic outline of the problem which these cities faced for days. The authorities pressed into service every wagon, truck, cart, motorcar and automobile, or any kind of vehicle that had some service value. If a relief superintendent saw a wagon load of supplies started from one part of the city to the other, he stopped the first wagon he saw, and ordered the driver to haul the load. The driver obeyed.

After this misadventure men found his father and mother dead, after their days and nights of horror, he prepared to take his only relative an aged aunt out of the stricken city. He saw a horse and carriage passing by. The carriage was stopped and the driver ordered to take the lady where her nephew directed. The city on the days immediately following the flood was almost entirely without good horses. The animals caught in their stables by the rise of water, broke from their halts and died in the streets. Even the following day, when the men arrived in Jeannette, bodies of drowned horses lay everywhere in the streets. The entire country was placed under martial law to obtain horses for relief work in Jeannette. Even automobile trucks which were in working order were used almost exclusively in the city in carrying supplies.

Many relief parties came to the city, and went to work. No trains were able to enter the city, but there were many trains of cars nevertheless. They had been brought down by the flood. There was a curious combination of baggage coaches, freight cars, Pullman Pullmans, cattle cars, and engines and cabooses. Even diners had floated down with the flood. The man who entered Jeannette looking for his father and mother first went to Dorothy Gale, where he got a pass the day to enter the lines at Jeannette. Jeannette was kept of in these passes. He was compelled to show his about sixty times before he even reached the city. When he headed first to go through Angelina Aguilera for a motor route, he was told that as the passes were for Jeannette only they would not be honored at Angelina Aguilera, providing that city was not his destination. He therefore headed for Jeannette and did not stop until he got there.

Hotels that survived the flood at Jeannette were crowded with refugees from even Angelina Aguilera. A man who thought Jeannette was not hard hit and had fled thither. Men were sleeping six or seven in a room. One flood sufferer cruised by the experiences through which he had gone—became suddenly violent on the streets of Jeannette one night, and smashed all the plate glass store windows he came to before he was overpowered. The most distressing sights in the business streets of Jeannette were related by this unfortunate man who had lost his father and mother. When the waters had subsided they led left and three or four feet deep over everything. Great quantities of expensive shoes from children had been swept away by the stage dolers and the checker shoes which had been saved were not fit for use. Parts of buildings, drifted and all kinds of refuse, which the flood carried through plate glass windows and doors were strewn over the floors. Men were at work cleaning what survived of their business, homes, with tanks, hoses, shovels and saws and brooms of all kinds. Clouds of dust and noise and on little girls and boys worked at the cleaning up with the men. Families floundered with their tops warped in all shapes carried off by the floodings by the flood were left stranded here and there about the streets. The man even saw a boat which the flood had carried into the second story window of a house with such force that the boat was bent about the column in the room by the constant pounding of the water waves.

AAAAAA as one of the closing chapters in this great war tragedy of flood waters, can be imagined a picture of the condition in Jeannette as it appeared to many rescue workers and relief crews and Red Cross Missionaries, of those could have given most harrowing stories, because many of these men trained in the art of preaching have to the public were better able to paint a good and reliable picture than even the war correspondents.

When the water began to subside in rapid succession, when the flood tide began to lower, and before midnight probably 1,000 bodies, many of them badly blackened by their many days stay under the awful wall, had been recovered. For the first time large relief parties, were able to gradually penetrate parts of the flood zone, and they made the most of it by effecting rescue after rescue, thousands of them barely in time to prevent people from starving to death. Hopes of the scores of thousands of flood refugees, which grew as the water began to go down, and the flames which had been raging for days had apparently burned themselves out, were utterly dashed to pieces, when the fire started with renewed vigor in the heart of the city. Two great districts were a mass of flames shortly after it was believed the fires had been out, and for the first time in fifty five hours the fire departments that arrived were unable to work. The water had so far subsided that a number of engines were brought to the scene of the mighty inferno, but all the most desperate fighting against the conflagration had no effect whatever.

A great fight in the two blocks, between Henriette and Augustine St. Claire streets, and on Third Street assumed terrifying proportions. It seemed to be spreading to the south-west and across the streets to the stores that faced on post and second streets. Also word was received from the headquarters of the relief Committee of the city that the minute horses and the fire fighting apparatus should be rushed to the burning zone, but a very few such equipment could be obtained for being rushed to the places. The police and a little militia that many Jeannettians disguised military looters were working the central districts, for all persons not able to give satisfactory explanations of their actions and who they were, and what they wanted in the city were therefore arrested. Also persistent and unconfirmed rumors told of such looters and incendiarism being shot. Excitement was running high. The wildest rumors were in circulation, and serious trouble was expected almost any moment.

Thirty three to forty four arrests were made during one night for looting. Two strangely acting men were caught early in the morning at the water edge with suitcases full of the city's government papers, belonging to the Mayor, and also papers and letters belonging to the military that patrolled the city. Their defiant answers were taken by the militiamen on a morning they had no right to the headquarters at the St. Vincent's school. They were taken to the militia headquarters and set the schoolhouse on fire, killing one of the guards, and injuring the chief officer in command of the city's whole militia force. They did not retain the suit cases however, and they were filled with all kinds of government and military papers.

One article was a love letter from the city's Mayor to his sweetheart in Pandora asking her for her hand in marriage. Another man was found with several military letters, and some gold coins, watches, and even silverware, which he refused to account for. He therefore also was arrested by the militia and taken to an office building, and was held under strong guard for further investigation. He later on was found to be a big professional Jeannettian spy. He was in all three buildings all of which were fiercely burning in the sections above the water, three thousand men women and children fought off the flames that threatened them badly.

Many of the party had been in the Jeannette Journal and Daily News buildings. Others were in residence houses. When the awful flames reached their rooms like Horror, after having ceased their ravages for two hours, these narrow streets, made temporary bridges over the roof tops and the alley to the main Tribunal building, which was one of the least type of reinforced concrete, with wired glass windows.

It was a thrilling escape those women and children made to the Tribunal building. The building stood at the corner of Seminary and Crosby streets. To get to the building from the structures threatened by the conflagration, planks had to be placed carefully over the all way, and to the endangered buildings. After the planks crossed to the Tribunal they climbed out to the roofs of the taller buildings. From this point the three thousand persons crossed the alley over the planked bridges. Once the men and women and children were in the Journal building, the men started a bucket line. The fire had approached from the Christie building, and the building was heated beyond endurance. On this and the floors, hundreds of barrels carried hundreds of pails of water and emptied it on the floor. Then the wooden buckets that were not needed by the bucket brigade were cast out of the windows filled and drawn in. By these methods they were able to fight off the flames until help arrived. The long sought for help arrived, when the relief workers carried the women and children to safety and then rescued the men.

All other kinds of hard work had to be performed by the men to keep the fire out of the Tribunal building itself after the wire glass melted. These were scores of heavy machines in the plant. Much of this was built of wooden parts. They therefore started in on this herculean task of moving these hundred tons of heavy machines shortly after they moved from the fire threatened residence buildings. It took six hours, but if they had not carried them to the south side of the building they either would have all been burned to death or drifted to their fate on twenty, improvised rafts, which they had built to float on. In the large number of fire endangered refugees, were many delicate little girls and boys terrified and crying as the flames threatened them. There were two hundred and eighty five women, and nearly eighty elder children, besides more than two thousand men. All these finally found safety in a tall building that was operated so wisely by the flood that no fire could reach it.

The only food the marooned people had was grapejuice and soured butter milk, candy, and condensed milk, which they got by foraging in other buildings. Nevertheless though scant this was the best tasting food to those really facing starvation. When the party crossed to safety from one building to another they could see the carcasses of hundreds of horses.

While the waters raged through all parts of the city, and the outside world really wrung its hands in sorrow for those who by hunger heat and death, had been threatened, there existed outside the floodzone a place in which planks had been

However the residents of that city in some sections were said to be very well provided and though the city too had suffered badly from the flood it would when possible render as much aid as possible to the city of Jena. There had been but in looking in some parts of North Bend, the information was given, and he was on his way to see the Chief of Police toward getting a system of public safety into effect. After a most nerve racking and nearly straining experience of sixty hours, the rescuers returned. Fully 100,000 people outside the flooded zone began to take on a most concise form, for many days even after the abatement of the great flood the city was actively paralyzed, paralyzed so far as protection of its inhabitants who regarded the ravages of the terrible flood were a concern. There were some militia companies from close by mobilization camps not in the flood zone with headquarters in the surviving buildings. And their instructions were to shoot without mercy any strange persons or disguised flood-line vandals caught looting. All these companies have been through fire in some of the just terrible battles led on on furlough, and therefore went through their work as though they knew what they were there for. One morning a strange sneaky looking man was seen climbing into the first story window of a partly submerged house in Center Street. One of the soldiers called upon him to come out or be shot. The man paid no attention to the soldiers but opened fire. The soldiers returned the fire with spirit, and the man who ever he was dropped back into the water without a cry, was caught in a swirl of the current and was swept out of sight. In addition there were six hundred and thirty

Four deputy sheriffs sworn in by the Mayor. These were armed with heavy caliber revolvers and repeating shotguns, and ordered to go to the limit in protecting life and property as the feet of glendelinian vandals and ghouls became rampant.

In addition there were the police, and the militia which were organized under the direction of one of the good citizens. These men were mounted on good military horses and patrolled all districts of the city not under water. Again in addition, all of the merchants of the great factories turned their foot police, and were therefore employed at busy corners as traffic officers. These men were supposed to be on full pay, not by the city, which was unable to pay any money, but by the guiding spirit of the great relief work that was being carried on by many of the Committee heads. Strange to say however, with hundreds of broken wagons being repaired and scotching through the streets being pulled by the few horses that could be obtained, not an accident was reported from this source. The Naval reserves of pandora arrived also and were given charge of the work of guarding the incoming supplies, from what could be feared of raiding glendelinians. One man a resident of the downtown district, when warned of the approaching danger after the great explosions, took his wife and children outside of the town to a high rise of ground, and left them with many others who had fled there for safety. He then took the chances and went back into the town, and was caught in the rush of water. He climbed a tall strong looking tree in front of a ice cream parlor. In this position he remained for a day and night until a rope was thrown him from a window of a big building, and he was pulled to safety by some men and women who had been imprisoned in the house.

He was rescued later as were the people in the building, and the ice cream parlor.

Their suffering was not as severe except from the strange and smothering heat caused as mentioned so often before by the far distant forest fires. They had secured extra provisions from the Fair building a half a block away, and also food from the pantries of the ice cream factory, which were situated on the second floor. The fair and the ice cream company were of use in the heart of the flood district, and are situated on fifth and seventh street between Center and Western Avenues.

Eighteen Red Cross Nurses though extremely few for so immense an disaster and who came from Francis Atlanta and who arrived at Jena were a most welcome relief to the corps of nurses who had been on duty for many days with few hours of sleep at night. The nurses were stationed at the different branches of the main city's relief headquarters. A rescue party that entered the main flooded district found nineteen hundred men and women and also children on the roofs of a line of strongly built brick buildings on North Center Street. Some inside the houses were forced to cut a hole in the roof when the flood struck that section and for twenty eight days and nights had alternated between living in water soaked rooms and on the roofs with only a cracker between them for food. Many were half dead with starvation, and lack of pure water to drink. Many from desperation took the chances and drank some of the flood waters. In one of these buildings the story of the death of a little girl, and the rescue of her brother was typical of the condition of human life and the experience of people in flood bound Jena.

Both of the children were young and they were imprisoned on the third floor of the house without food or water for ten days. However it appeared the little girl was more hardy than her brother, and while rescue was within a block of the building her brother died. She was saved and immediately given food. The rescuers were forced to leave her brother in the building.

In another of these buildings but not on the roof, two hundred and forty people were discovered, who had nothing at all to eat for nearly fifteen days. Rescue parties rushed a special boat of provisions to them, but could not attempt to make any efforts to bring them to safety on account of the swift current, that the frail boats would be liable to meet with. Of course when it was more favorable for boats to venture on such excursions they were taken off, but it took many repeated trips. One of the most odd incidents of the great flood at North Bend, Angelina gate, was that of a surprised glendelinian creature, that being a young one in some way managed to find its way on a large concrete railway bridge joining the two sections of the small town. The animal was packed first amidst wreckage and became nightly stranded on the bridge, when the too flood was rising, and soon the approaches to both ends of the structure were carried away.

The glendelinian creature had been seen there for six days, and during the height of the flood stood belly deep in the raging torrent. It was a case of glendelinian sense with the animal. It swam hundreds of times up and down the deepest of the flood, but good salmer as it was did not take much chances in the main current for fear of being taken away from where he desired to remain. When the water receded he flew away. A tale of danger is related concerning the aged grand parents of Henry Gundorf. The uncle was eighty nine years old and his wife though much younger was crippled. They lived alone when the awful flood waters started to enter their home, and they were compelled to go to the second and then the third story. The water followed, and when it continued to rise the old man put a table on a bed, and getting up on the table with an axe, drove a hole through the roof. Then they climbed to the top of at least he did, and brought her with him. To his horror the flood still rose, and threatened to engulf the house entirely.

They were in this perilous position for two days, when rescued by a number of men who heard his shouts. The two were rescued to a small school building a four story affair, and later were driven from there to a broom factory, and from there to a tall residence. When the water reached the residence they again moved to the city court house. The next morning morning they were forced to move from there, and were taken outside of the town to high and dry land.

Many graphic descriptions of the horror of this flood that swept many residents of North Bend, Angelina, to watery graves could have been given, but there were too much to be written and would take too much time and paper. But one can tell his story as follows he being the new hero of the calamity story.

He was weary, or tired and quite a nervous from the frequent loss of sleep and he the nights he had witnessed, and he was seen to stagger from the relief train of the stricken little city at, Garytown North Angelina Angelina State. A most vivid scene was the death of fear stricken women and children who perished when rescue boats capsize. The roaring current and the terrible sights had maddened them and they fought when they were to be rescued, as they feared to leave the houses and go into the boats.

"It was too awful, and no one can ever forget the scenes," said this man, with a shudder. "And the weather was hot and damp, the flood was thick with steam like a fog, and the sight of that black water at night rushing on pitilessly just seemed to take the heart out of most of us, especially the women and children, who refused to leave the houses and go into the boats, when they saw a few captives. I was plotting to go one of the rescue boats to a small but tall building, and the boat was pretty pretty well filled. Six of the passengers were women and little innocent children. We were moving rather shakily through one of the main streets, when of a sudden the boat was struck by drift and the women and children screamed. We all were plunged into that boiling fuming current. I found myself in the water. I saw a little arm stick up for a moment, the arm of a little child. I made a grab for it, but it went down. There was no chance to swim in that Niagara. I seized the stern of the boat, and floated down with it until, came under a window. Helped by some from the windows the boat was again righted, I seized the stern with one hand and gradually with their help got aboard. I secured some long boards for oars, and I picked up one of my oarsmen a little later. He was still alive. Later we were bringing another load to another house, when a house floating house struck us, ground us clean under it, and killed every one excepting the one who managed to throw me myself from the boat as I saw it coming shooting to the others to do the same. It was a fight for life, and I was busily engaged now in saving only myself a second time not able to save the others. Altogether four times I was thrown first into the water, and I am wondering how I escaped, but nevertheless owe it to my Miraculous Medal and my prayers to God. The current swept around street corners with tremendous force and only the most experienced oarsmen could propel a staunch boat with any degree of success. One of the sailors from Grayley City took too wide a turn, and we then landed in the tree tops.

While in the tree tops we heard a roaring as of lions, and saw a large glendelinian creature swimming with the flood. While it was a horror to us he seemed to enjoy his experience and was roaring with delight.

Other glendelinian creatures had engaged the waters, and started for shore, at the outbreak of the flood, and that was the last that had been observed of them.

Another thrilling story of the flooded district of northern Angelina was to have been told by a priest, who reported he saw rescuers take two hundred and thirty eight persons from a house that was about to be swept away. While there he saw many volunteer rescuers make many desperate and thrilling rescue by taking the chances with their omivies and swimming out into the swift current, and swimming back with a flood victim. A daring young woman swam out and rescued thirty five men women and children in one day. She was the bravest young girl that the priest, or any other person saw.... The priest saw a house with two women one man, and six children clinging to the roof, floating down the flood close in to the shore-dredger. The woman was silent, but the man himself and also the children were screaming, loudly for help. Persons on the edge of the flood had a good sized boat but they with the priest in it also, could not row fast enough to catch up with the house.

The house bore down on the Mc-Holleston and Pondera Railroad bridge, and with a loud noise crashed into it. The woman who was nearest caught the bridge, but the other two were thrown into the water. The children also went down but came up again near a tree. The eldest child helped the other two, and held on to the tree. The other women did not re-appear. The boat put out then and rescued those on the tree, and the bridge. Then ten minutes later, a large house with a crew of people on it floated down with the sea of water. Two women were lying on the roof. One old man was holding her. Suddenly the house struck a tree, and the shock threw every one into the water. Not one was saved. Then the rescuers put out in a boat, and caught up with the house. They saw an old man and woman inside in the attic. The old man had lifted his wife in his strong arms when the house started to float away, and carried her up to the attic. They were the only survivors. At Dorothy Gale city one could have seen the bravest man probably in the world. He was a farmer and lived across the flood from the town in a high ground far from the danger of the flood. He lent his big rowboat to a priest, who for hours used it for rescue work. They saved more than a dozen women and children during the first day. It was the only boat that could be used at that time. Although the brave priest could not rescue but three people at a time he sure was doing most noble work. Yet had to say many persons were swept away before he could reach them with the boat. Late in the afternoon the farmer came to the shore, and announced he wanted to get into the boat to help in the rescue work, as he had a large crew of people who could pull the boat and thus aid many more people. The priest protested but the farmer declared he would take the chance as he did not wish to see any one be drowned. The priest at first refused to do so, and so the priest farmer declared he would send hired men to take the boat by force. He said he wanted the boat to aid also in the rescue work, and that it was not suitable or respectable on his part to let a priest risk his life when he too could do something.

Still the priest refused to life up the boat, so the farmer got onto his raft with three men, caught up with the boat, tied the raft to the craft, and towed the priest ashore where the men gently but firmly made him go ashore. The farmer then made three trips, and rescued nearly a hundred people. Then in the heart of the flood they saw a rescuers boat capsize, and all the rescuers thrown into the water. Those in the water shouted for help. The outboard, who could not swim was clinging desperately to a porch post, and an old woman and two little girls, and a older girl of fifteen years were struggling in the water.

Believe me the farmer bent to his oars good and proper, getting to them just in time for neither of them could swim. When he reached them, the man and woman grabbed the side of the boat itself, and pulled it down until it shipped water. The farmer yelled at the men to let go, and got around to the stern of the boat where he could climb in. He sat in the boat, and he just had sense enough to obey. He managed, that is the farmer managed to pull the children, and the girl in on over the side, and had them placed on the raft, saving the woman also, and rowed them to a place of safety. The farmer at all risks kept up this work with the aid of his raft for days and sometimes at night with long dangerous hours of work, having many close calls, and seeing many strange sights, such as houses and cows standing on house roofs to keep their heads out of the water. At night when too far off from his own home the farmer then too tried to continue the work would secure lodging, and then the next day the work was continued, only it was harder as it was not and safety, the atmosphere sticky, and very windy.

He stayed at the same place that following night, so he had at least pretty good sleeping quarters, which was more than he ever expected. The next day as there were plenty of men by that time to run the boats, the farmer went out to manhandle, left, being helped all the way back to his shack where he was met by the priest who blessed him for it all, and saying that it was lucky that he took the dare, and went on the rescue work in his stead, for if he had not been there to operate both boat and barge, there would have been many people drowned.

The farmer had rescued 1,697 people mostly so a women and children. Many others could have related the scenes, indeed many of the women who witnessed, during the worst period of the flood, and also after the recession of the flood, and were able to point out the names of the people of Angelina Agathia and other cities and towns in extreme southern California, and northern Angelina, but they saw and the awful stories and experiences of those who were in the flood, relieved directly from them, have been so harrowing in detail, that they were prepared to be printed in as many newspapers as possible in order to arouse the people of the northern part of the nation as they had never been aroused before.

In North Angelina Agathia, they had observed the Arenaburgs had first flowered, flooded over and then broken a levee, and had carried destruction in its path for a month. Yet the survival of the awful situation there, as in other parts of Angelina Agathia was that the loss of life happily was not so heavy as first reported, but probably the explanation of this can be best understood when so many deeds of heroism that have been written about in these stricken stricken cities can be finally recorded.

Everybody in the whole city of Angelina Agathia is completely homeless, and dependent upon the good people of the Abilene County for their care until some arrangements can be provided that will take the place of their former home. But each thing full evidence shows cannot be done. Lumber and brick and all building material though plentiful cannot be transported because all railway lines in California and northern Angelina and all other states hit hard by the series of disasters are entirely wiped out, and surely railroad trains cannot run on ground. The government has advised the best thing to be done for the people who have lost their all and face starvation to expel from the scenes of desolation, and if they agree to do so, they will be guarded and cared for by the military.

Provisions such as food and clothing, and the like will take months to reach the nearest section disaster or struck, and Abilene herself acknowledges herself about beaten in the war, by the monetary loss because of the disasters.

When reached Dorothy Gale city, and then passed, through Heidi Junction six times devastated by floods, and also through Jessamine, Lucille Jackson, and other cities I found the stories of the flood had been far underestimated.

The most excited of persons could not exaggerate it.

The disaster passed beyond its bounds. Heidi Junction was a city before of a million and a quarter of inhabitants. The other past disasters, left her so badly wrecked that only houses for five hundred thousand persons remained. Now in buildings at least she is a thing of the past. So it is with Angelina, Agathia Dorothy Gale, and a hundred other cities. Truly it can be and is absolutely proved that these cities are totally destroyed for the buildings left standing cannot be rebuilt and will have to be rebuilt and replaced. Never before has even Angelina Agathia been visited with such a devastating flood, and the fact that the loss of life, truthfully from 1000 has dwindled down to a mere nothing, and that the bodies found are only of those buried in the wreck of explosion shock, the flood is nothing short of a miracle. But none of the cities can be replaced for the war time and long after. Angelina Agathia, fair and beautiful and the most magnificent city of all Abilene and the world in general, prior to the day of the disaster, I found on the recession of the flood, a prostrated and mangled city. A dead non-existing city, a city of devastation and hideous. The flood having leveled left only one third the buildings she had out of a population of twice the size of New York, and Chicago and others put together. May she ain't got even buildings left to house a hundred people and these will have to be torn down.

The Royal Palaces of the Emperor though still standing are badly wrecked, the Imperial Palace itself is leveled to the ground and where it stood are the ruins of wooden houses carried and deposited there by the water.

The Emperor himself and his wife the Empress is homeless and destitute, and the flood when going away left great deposits of slime and many places more than four feet deep, in all the surviving houses, the streets, and in the lush bus business places of the people of Angelina Agathia.

As I could see when taking in the view, the destruction of North Angelina Agathia was something terrible. I once was at Galveston during the aftermath of the hurricane and flood there, and the same jaws of wrecked buildings are seen here but in a much more scale, more magnitude than ten times a hundred destroyed lives. Wrecked wooden houses are smashed to kindling wood, crumpled together like sardines in a box, and into large mounds and mountains of wreckage.

This mountain of wreckage extends to where the Emperor's Palace most handsome Palace had stood. The loss encompassed the complete destruction of North Angelina Agathia where the one and two story houses of frame construction were situated which were in all instances carried away in the flood, together with their occupants before they were rescued, and then deposited down here toward the central section of the city. So many rescues of the most bravest and desperate kind prevented the loss of life among the citizens of the city, though some drowned were not of the city proper, buildings belonging to other cities and towns floated down to join this mass, buildings from Jessamine, Heidi Junction Dorothy Gale and even from Eugene St. Clara. People perished in these buildings before they could be rescued. Among the proper inhabitants of the city itself it is seen no one was killed.

Nevertheless the streets of and of the people who were cooped up in the attics of the ruined buildings which did stand before the flood as they placed out to see the many homes of their friends topple over and proceed with their belongings over the swirling current to only be rescued with great difficulty are experiences the distressed the distresses of which could and never will leave the minds of those who observed these awful sights for nearly thirty days and nights.

Besides the terror of this worst of all floods were as I had first seen and then observed the terror of great fires--some a hundred or more big fires occurring every day and night in the city of Angelina Agathia at the time the people were crowded in office buildings, in big railway stations, and in their more substantial houses, and the approaching fire to those who were exposed to its devastating path was a cause of terror and distress to hundreds of thousands of people.

It was such people under such trying experience that were called upon after the floods to dig out the mud and filth of some place of partial habitation

Dear Father

These are the experiences of the inhabitants of the city of Angelina, Agathia, and the beautiful homes of violet, and her sisters in the city of Angelina, and also Angelina Agathia are gone, and if the good no survives through all the into shed parts of Abbeanna can see the mad and alive in the homes of the people of the cities not immensely damaged by the flood there would be a revival of generous impulses that the money raised for the flood disasters of the past, and for the many millions still homeless as a result would sink into a most insignificant proportion.

The distress in all the totally affected cities of Calvernia and Northern Angelina State is most appalling, and the needs of these scores and scores of millions of people so great that the Emperor Hanson Vivian had been compelled to make a personal appeal as the word of one who has gone through the disaster himself, and know of the conditions as they actually exist. I'm that Emperor Hanson Vivian, and my brother too is homeless.

A most interesting development of the flood situation in Jessica was the establishment of a new and rather unique system of relief work, which as time wore on proved very effective. The plan was originated by the Mayor of that city and had for a feature the personal pledge of full responsibility on the part of surviving individual citizens for the purpose of starting a carefully planned and safe expedition as none of the surviving homes in this city either could be repaired or even ref to a returned. Jessica as said before was the hardest hit of them all. A sufferer of the flood was selected by the Home Returning Committee, headed by Hanson Held, and assigned to one of the volunteers pledged to try and rehabilitate a home that could be found without being wrecked to any title total degree. And the volunteer was held personally responsible for the execution of the work and the care of the sufferer, and the personal element entering into the scheme made it very appealing but the attempt to do so on the returning of homes was of no avail. The Committee arranged a long pilgrimage through the stricken districts of the city and invited all who could do so to inspect the apparently surviving homes after the receding waters had left them mud covered, washed and torn. This was done as carefully as possible, and they sadly brought back reports that not a single house was fit for any one to live in and even those still standing standing and looking all right from the outside were found to a total loss inside.

How were school boys from the St. Michaels Catholic School at Lucille Rickson City went on that they thought was merely a last only to find themselves confronted by the difficult task of lifesaving in the raging torrents at a third city, in Northern Calvernia and only twenty miles from Angelina Agathia is a story full of pop told by a school girl of the same school in a letter to her father:

"Dear Father,

The flood lasted fully a month but the first week of it was the most eventful of it for me." she wrote... I had many brand new experiences which thrill and exciting as they were I'm sure I would not have missed for any reason and yet through which I'm also sure I and all the school girls with me do not care to pass through again. In short though I'm only a girl, I'm a good swimmer and a good rower and I went to work to help in the rescue work. I happened like this:

"Monday morning at about two o'clock, it being still dark, and very hot, we school girls were awakened by the teachers, (none) who said that there was a big flood at Angelina Agathia, and that Lucille Rickson was also threatened and the streets were flooded. We High School girls wired for boats from Wineshik. The Mother Superior wanted some of the high school boys to help to load the boats onto the barges, and then onto the flat cars, which were to carry them to Lucille Rickson. Ten others and myself went over to help in the work and just as the barges were about to pull out with the last load, one of the fellows dared another to go down to Wineshik. The result was that we all took the dare and climbed aboard the train. Of course not any of us either boys or girls were dressed for such a thing as roughing it. I had a pair of light shoes and summer clothing, and many of us wore the thinnest clothing of all as the weather was very hot. Just as the train pulled pulled out, I borrowed a hat from a girl friend. On the way to Wineshik city, we were sure we were going on a lark, and no one ever dreamed of getting the chance of running one of the boats. We fully expected to return to Lucille Rickson city the same afternoon. When we got to Wineshik, that is a within a mile and a half of the town, which was as near as we could get, we found there was not a single man to take charge of the boats, and we just hopped into the work on ourselves, each each taking a boat, and towing another one behind him or her. In the first house reached they found a woman up to water in water up to her waist and she was holding a three little year little girl above her head.

We rescued them and brought them so safely. Another house a man in it let us first his wife and three young children, and then himself using the sheets and blankets of his bed for a improvised rope. I rowed them to a place of safety, and went back with my boat for load after load of people, taking them off roofs, and out of second story windows. More than once I thought a young girl had to talk pretty rough to women or children or they wouldn't do as I told them.

We rescued three hundred and fifty people. One time when coming down a a street with my boat I heard a loud shout for help and saw a boat which one of the very students and my own brother had been running overturned. It's carman would could not swim, was clinging to a floating tree, and an old man and his wife were wife were struggling and screaming in the water. Believe me I bent to my oars and reached them just in the nick of time for neither of them could swim, which I reached them they both grabbed the wrong side of the boat and would have capsize it if I had not threatened to strike them with the oar if they did not obey me and go around to the stern of the boat, where I could help them climb in safely, and he seemed to have sense enough to obey. I managed to pull the woman over in over the side, though I slipped water in doing so, and rowed them to a place of safety. I kept at work until midnight, having six close calls, and seeing many strange sights as young Biangigomenean Creatures swimming leisurely in the water. Some even followed me about while I rescued people. I received lodging that night with a man whose wife and three children I had rescued. The next morning the work about that time was the same only it was harder as the flood had increased, and it had begun to rise to the second story windows. I stayed at the same place that night, so at least I had pretty good sleeping quarters, which was more than some of the others had.

Back

The next day the flood threatening to wipe out the town and driving the people onto the roofs and top stories of the buildings we had to abandon the work as no boat no. would live in the flood, and we were compelled to give it up, and so we finally made for shore.

The boys from Lucille Rickson in trying to return from Wineshik to the city of Lucille Rickson found the flood tearing that city to pieces. The city for I was unapproachable, but nevertheless we had been lucky that we took the dare and went for it, for if we girls and boys had not been there to operate the boats, there would have been many people drowned. As far as we were able even on our return despite the fury of the deluge, saved people also from our own city.

Your Darling Daughter,

Minnie Angelino.

Lucille Rickson.

P.S. Lucille Rickson is as flat as a postage stamp, and every one is homeless. *****

ANOTHER PHASE OF THE GREATEST FLOOD CATASTROPHE OF THE WAR. THE DINE NEEDS OF MANY MILLIONS OF PEOPLE.

Probably, one of the most striking views... of the conditions of the flood situation at Lucille Kissen, could be presented here in this part of the long story because again it shows the many unusual phases of the awful tragedy which afterwards developed caused almost as much damage and as many heartaches as it afterwards developed. Indeed far more than any human mind can picture, or that a million authors can write in all their power of mind, is inspiration and thrill, were the pictures of the deplorable conditions revealed in this city when the death dealing waters receded far enough to permit the full and entire exploration of the stricken district.... Even bodies many of them mutilated beyond recognition were to be found on all sides, and a jumbled mass of debris served as a monument to what once was one of southern California's most beautiful and prosperous cities. Next to Angelina Agathia, ruin beyond conceiving was to be seen everywhere and also it was probable that many years would be past before even a part of the city of Lucille Kissen will ever be restored. Men who for many years were leading figures in financial and commercial affairs of the city, and who had given large fortunes also for the benefit of the poor were standing with bowed heads, outside the various relief stations begging piteously for food.

Flood and flames wiped out their entire fortunes in a few short hours, and in many an instance cast even a pall of death over their families... Many grew desperate in their efforts to secure rations, and resorted to brazen breaking into houses to secure the necessities of life. Several persons drifted to this were mistaken for... and shot down by the soldiers who were forced to carry out the orders given them to shoot to kill when it was necessary that they use their gun to preserve law and order. Looting by Glandelinians with gain as their object added to the horror of the awful situation, and many bodies minus fingers and ears were strewn about, and earrings were the rewards of the Glandelinian spies and thieves who stole to secure money means to help carry on their wicked and bloody war.

A temporary morgue of large size was established where one could be put up, but this was soon filled to overflowing, and many bodies were taken to a camp on the outside of the city. Even the finding of a single body only was a signal for a concerted rush on the two morgues by people anxious to frenzy to identify their loved ones, but the maddened throngs were held in check by the troops. Unusually warm weather, pungent with strange smoke added immensely to the suffering of the refugees, many of whom had to bear the heat outside and inside. Without any relief whatever, efforts to provide them with cooler comforts proved futile, as all stores and places were wiped out. Many were reported dying of disease in one big school building, where the troops stationed the first hospital corps.

Cavalierian soldiers doing strict sentry duty along the edge of the immense flood saw a man and four women and a number of little children floating down the flood tide on a pile of driftwood. They were all screaming and pleading for help. As they reached the foot of Hanson Avenue the driftwood was lodged against the roof of a wooden house that was almost entirely submerged. The soldiers made several most desperate attempts to go to them in a large boat, but the swiftness of the current at that time spun their boat around as if on a pivot and they were forced to make their way back to save their own lives. All afternoon the sixteen harrowed sufferers screamed, cried and begged to be rescued. As night time was approaching a canon was brought from a near by refugee camp, and a long rope shot to them. Tying one end to the drift they managed to reach safety. A cheer that could be heard for miles went up from the watchers as the people were dragged out of the water. They were taken immediately to the refugee camp, given treatment and then taken to an emergency hospital in a town not struck by the flood. They were expected to die as they were suffering from a deadly disease....

"It was awful," said one of the soldiers. "The rest of the world will never realize how much suffering and privation have been undergone by the brave people of this city, and of many others. I have never seen anything that ever approached it. It far surpasses the flood disasters of the past. A mass meeting of the surviving citizens was held and the entire city was divided into four parts to enable the soldiers and Deputy Sheriffs who were sworn in to do more effective work in aiding the sufferers...."

Four thousand four hundred orphan children and their attendants and men and women were marched in the third floor of a big brick residence.

Emperor Robert Vivian himself also was caught in one of the refuge homes by the flood flood was the first man to make his way to the outside when it went down. He accomplished this shortly, early in the evening. When the flood showed evidence of falling Emperor Vivian was in a large tenement house when he was first caught in the flood, and when the water began to advance he with most of the royal members attempted to make their way to safe points. They were overtaken by the waters and without about twenty members of the Royal Courts sought refuge in a large tenement house, in third street, between St. Charles and fourteenth St. Angelina Agathia. For over thirty days the royal members and the Emperor himself subsisted on crackers and stale bread bits. At length when the flood was beginning to subside the Emperor leaped into the water in front of a taller building. His members tried to restrain him.

"I'm not trying to commit suicide, but I've got to get home to my wife the Emperor. He shouted as he began swimming. He managed to swim to a higher level in one of the flooded streets, and waded several blocks to safety. He ran for over two miles to where he knew his palace was. As he staggered into the room of what was then left of the building before it went to pieces altogether he fell to the floor unconscious.

He was rescued from the palace before it finally collapsed, and medical attention said his collapse was caused by exposure, and overworked nerves. The Emperor said that when the flood reached its height, he with many of the royal members at the tenement house rescued a woman and several of her children. The father and two little girls were struggling in the water, and as they passed the tenement, the Emperor succeeded in seizing hold of the man. He was pulled to safety. The children, two girls and a boy were rescued afterwards. The Emperor said that the refugees in the tenement building could see many dead bodies of men and women, and that they counted among them two thousand bodies of children as they floated and bobbed past the house. Evidently they were bodies of those killed amidst the wreckage of the explosion shock and the flood had washed them loose. One of the most awful things he saw was a score of men and women fighting for their lives. They were rescued by people from third story windows after much difficulty. Some interesting light was thrown on the situation at Jessica in the story also told by the Emperor.

"The spectator is never to be seen on a middle ground," said the Emperor when he was asked what he witnessed, after I went there at all risks to myself to see what the flood did there. The mind is put to such a test that it is at one extreme or the other. When I think of it now I am reminded of a school room of pupils bent over our difficult lessons which will result in their promotion or not. The blindest quiver sound outside the room sends them into hysterical laughter. We were just like then when penned up so long in the tenement building. But at Jessica I never imagined I would see such ruin and devastation. When we finally bucked the awful barriers of and we found a city of survivors, half or more of whom it seemed had gone mad temporarily. Most of them were even apathetic, and all the population were facing rank starvation. We wondered why they did not move about a little livelier and a try to stop that heart rending screaming that was coming from the nests of misery.

We got to the relief headquarters at Jessica, and were given what baskets we could secure to pass to the hungry. One man with a strange rowboat probably was like a jointraff or jointraff was risking his life every moment rowing to and from shore and bringing loads of refugees from the water bound houses. That said hundreds of words against Glandelinia and her flood and disaster making which though not exactly sinful to pronounce were not fit for printing nevertheless. He also promised anything he could do to for those poor unfortunate he couldn't reach, he told of the water slowly receding, of the danger growing less but too slowly to suit his will in their behalf, and whatever else he could think of. He then hit on the plan of attaching the baskets of food to a long piece of stiff cable wire. The wire was pushed up and the refugees from the flood seized it and drew the basket upward. That man with the strange rowboat is and will be there but not doing and unheard of if I can help it. He made about a hundred trips in twenty four hours. When I asked him his name, he bowed and granted, but readily accepted one of the medals I pinned on him. Then he rowed out again to get more food for the houses.

During the full fury of the flood at Jessica a man and a woman were seen clinging to a tree. They had sagged dragged themselves high above the water. At that time no boat could live in the an choppy swirl of water that raged around that tree. The woman appeared half fainting and the man hugged her to his breast. His other arm was wrapped around a tree. Time after time she looked wildly about her. She saw no help would or could come. She would look down at the fiercer waters below her and then struggle more closely to the man who held her. The poor fellow patted her with his free hand ever as he held her in the crook of that arm. God knows how long they may have been there before the man in the rowboat rescued them. The girl was taken down first and the man next and rowed to safety. Both collapsed as they were brought to shore. There was an appalling shortage in boats. Many more lives would have been saved had there been craft of sufficient strength to combat those raging waters. There was plenty of lumber but no boat builders.

I saw a large wooden house swept by waves. I was told it contained fourteen bodies. Another frame structure rolled by with the flood. Two ghostly faces looking most appallingly toward the shore showed in the twilight. I believe both were man and wife. The man himself was hanging from the side of the half turned house. The woman was holding to the roof. They rode by in the grim procession of death and destruction and were not seen again. Sickened by what I saw, I then kept away from the windows as I dared not to see any more. The tenement was surrounded by water. It was full of refugees. And I declared martial law in the tenement. This was one of the strangest and most terrible nights I saw in the grim city of Jesselton. Even then, I was marooned in Angulinia Agathia, and when the flood began to rise, scores of refugees of all kinds had taken shelter in my own palace thinking it would withstand the torrent. They were told of the dangerous nature of the flood but most of them not dreaming of the seriousness of the situation, remained there. We were all marooned. Later the old men torn with fears over their families and remorseful over their failure to leave when they had the opportunity began to think over it. In the meantime a district of houses a block away from my palace took fire, and the blaze could be seen from the palace windows. This to me and all the others occasioned a horrifying thought, and a committee men among the marooned formed a Vigilance Committee.

No drinking, smoking, no lights were allowed and I confirmed the orders. Nothing connected with matches or fire of any kind was allowed. I placed the movement under martial law. They took down the lace curtains. The wives of all the water-borne refugees however have all reported themselves safe, I hear by signalling to their trapped husbands. No fresh water was to be had had in the tenement, but some one of the men with the genius of a Robertson Crusoe, betought himself of a large water bucket, and we all took chances with drinking the flood water, but he allowed it to first be boiled as we had plenty of fuel and then strained with thick cheese cloth the dirt and filth out of it.

During the fifth day of the flood, I observed a team of horses belonging to a factory transport wagon floating down on the flood. They brought up in front of the tenement, and were seized by a refugee perched on a window. The driver who was still on the right rig unhitched the horses, and was lifted up into the tenement house. I even saw a glenglybunna Great tree swimming down the flood. I did not hardly sleep all the night. Then fearing the flood would devastate the palace I left it by getting a raft and got away. But I could not get any further than the highest bridge in the city which still withstood the flood. I tried to secure a skiff, but the current was so swift, that no man with a skiff or skiff or any kind of a boat would venture into the raging torrent. Yet I finally found a man who would attempt reach the shore. The man whom I hired was Frank John and the skiff in which we were riding was washed down the transformed street, not a swift stream. The water was by this time up to the second story of many buildings.

We were washed against a large telephone pole, and one side of the skiff was smashed in. As we neared a tree, I managed to catch on, and climb out of reach of the water. As the boat with Frank John shot away from me, I shouted to him to gain the next tree but he was swept against a building, and I saw him grab his hand through a window glass. He managed to hold on to the frame until several times three a clothes line from a window above. In this manner he was saved. I thought a great and famous Emperor, adored by my whole colony, nation, and fairest daughters in the world, was compelled to stay in the tree for nearly two days and two nights. It was terribly hot, and a heavy fog of some kind seemed to envelope the city at times and at night the far away horizon sky was lighted up with a glare as bright as a electric light. Finally becoming fatigued and the flood rising higher and higher until it threatened to either reach me or take away the tree, I began to shout for help, but the roar of the water was so great that my cries were of no avail.

Finally, I was aided by a man, from the window of a large tenement house, from a window of that building. I then climbed to the top of the tree, and dived through the large window of the building, protecting myself from being out by holding my arms close to my face. I heard knocks on the floor above me and thought that the people there above me would or were chopping a hole through which I might get up.

The water kept rising and there was barely room for me to keep my head above water. I attempted to dive down and open the door, but the muddy water had stopped that possible exit. I then managed to float to a strange bar near the door. I then hung onto this and kicked the door open. I swam through and when I reached the surface of the water, the men who had called to me pulled me into the room. Besides this man, who would not reveal to me his name, his wife and three little children, his two nephews and no niece, and a score of others were in the room. I was exhausted and was helped by several of them up into the attic where I remained all night. The next morning I was able to be up and went down and joined the party or reached Royalities in the Tenement building. The water was up to the third story by this time but sat on a stationary. There was no food, no fuel on hand, and the only drinking water to be had was to be obtained from the clearer portion of the flood which we took chances with though of course we had fuel and boiled it and then strained it as much as possible. That night for away we heard five explosions as loud as volcanic eruptions and looking at the windows we saw immense rolling clouds rise high in the mid air and a great red

He saw district after district in the residential and business sections of the city where the street lines were virtually eliminated by upheaved and overturned houses. It jammed against each other and against buildings which withstood the shock, is great and almost broken heaps of debris. Frequently tossed by floods the city was one third now destroyed totally.

Every side walk within view were torn up to a total loss, all telephone poles were broken off at their base and giant trees uprooted and embedded on the shapeless mountain of ruin which marked the broad expanse of a lately prospering city. Henry Belt as the Secretary's name is, received words of commendation and approval from the Authorities. The governors of the flooded states also were delighted with the work that was done at Lucille Hickson by the Secretary. He considered it a most remarkable military achievement. The residents were in terror for fear of a glendolinian army or ghouls before the troops reached the city, and the streets were blocked and the sanitary conditions were of the worst. As the waters went down the Secretary organized his own forces and began the work of restoring order. When he reported to the Governor of Galverinia he was personally thanked and urged to keep the work on under way. Lucille Hickson city was one of the hardest points in the state to handle because of the city's condition, and the destitute circumstances of its inhabitants.

Secretary Belt who was touring the flood district as the personal representative of Emperor Hansen Vivian, went to Big Girl Island next by boat. So impressed was the Secretary with the awful manner in which the situation was here being handled, in fact could not be handled at all, that he tried to wire and telegraph both Emperors Vivian and Hansen that every thing needed for the emergency was not lacking but could not be forwarded. The Secretary himself was told that the death list here would not number even one but the property loss might run into more than $4,000,000,000 whether exaggerated or not for so large a city. With Secretary Belt were Major General Hendrie, chief of staff of the Christian standing armies, and four royal Government messengers and members of the main Gemini Leaders. G. Belt noticed that the swollen volumes of the Mic-Hollester and Arminie Han Rivers early left their natural course gouging out for long and record breaking extents that for the time being was virtually a new river course. The flood was indeed making river breaks.

General Hendrie who went over part of the ground twice, thought the railroad bridge above the city of Big Girl Island which fortunately remained perfectly flat during the on onslaught might have been somewhat responsible for the diversion of the mighty current so far from its regular course. He went into this phase of the situation with the army engineer leaders, and asked for a full investigation and report. Among these who sent to their deaths in the performance of duty were James Bonline, a member of the Gemini, and Francis Schilden of the Angelinian National Guard at Jesselton city. Both were drowned while doing relief work, Francis being caught in the current when a boat in which he was trying to rescue a number of women and children was overturned. At the time the current ran so awfully strong it swept all seven houses before it. On each of them persons were seen clinging, and their cries could be heard pleading for aid, which could not be given them. One large house had seven persons on the roof, and many in the upper story. The tricky current carried it to Alsea Island where it lodged among the trees, the refugees climbing into the tree tops when they broke the next morning the people, island and trees had disappeared. It was afterwards nicknamed the "floating island". Fifty seven hundred persons marooned in a factory were given aid by soldiers who succeeded in taking them water and food and other provisions by boat. A hotel just across the street where it was said a hundred and sixty people had taken refuge had collapsed, it being in the residential part of the town. Thirty bodies were recovered from the ruins in the first hour of the search.

With sixteen boats in the service, Hansen teen Abyssinkia Abyssinkia conveyed at great risk all flood flood sufferers to every available camp to be cared for, by the relief committee appointed for that purpose. 10,000 persons were made homeless in St Vincent city as the result of the flooding of all the homes by the back-water of the river which crept up following the spread of flood in that direction which pressure undermined a levee and caused it to collapse.

What was nearly a disaster was averted when a refugee train carrying only children on the B.M. railroad stopped just over a washout in the truck. The engine had passed over a hole. There were two hundred and sixty five girls and boys on the train, all of whom were taken off by nearby farmers. Forty others were taken off another B.M. railroad train which became stalled as the result of a washout. The water rose to three feet beyond any previous point ever reached. About seventeen hundred houses in the southern part of the city were entirely submerged by the water. The people were taken care of by refugee camps. Sixty boats, six freight boats, and the others gasoline gunboats and steam launches were put to work day and night removing people threatened by the high water, hauling from St Vincent that day a child disappeared in a washout on the Angelinia State side about ten miles. The trains had stopped running between these cities and the boy had started out to take a view of the flood. On the Angelinia State side the boy who was walking ahead, suddenly disappeared in a washout. All the homeless were moved from the vicinity of St Vincent into Lumbandon by people who happened to owned boats. About only 1,000 here were made homeless as a result of the water which penetrated far up into the higher streets of the city... indeed what the breaking of one of the big protecting levees along the Mio-Hollesater and Grinnell Run rivers meant to the hundreds of thousands who lived along the shores of the mighty streams close to the border line of Abbeville and Calvernia and with what fear and trembling they watched the rising waters, and wondering what was wrong with the rivers, for they never acted this way before up here, could be understood in the following description of the breaking of one of these protecting levees before the force of flood waters at St Andrews, northern Calvernia 111-1-1.

With a terrible roar that could be heard for miles around like the Niagara Falls, more than one hundred feet of the levee broke at six fifteen in the morning and at eight o'clock the entire city and surrounding country was under from thirty feet to a hundred and sixty feet of water. Fortunately every resident of the city had been warned on time and had therefore fled to the hills, the warning having been given to them four days before. Therefore no lives were lost, but it is impossible to predict the loss of property. Hundreds of thousands of persons standing on the hilltops several miles away saw the large count down that had withstood high rises in the rivers for a hundred years most successfully now give way, and each turned eyes to the portion of the city in which their homes were located as the waters like an ocean, however the break had been duly expected and everything that the people were able to take from their homes and business houses were removed. Several persons with field and spy glasses saw hundred and hundred of houses collapse, every home and business home in the city was covered with water the whole town being submerged entirely. At the highest place the water stood one hundred and thirty feet deep and in the remainder of the business section and in the residence sections the water was two hundred and twenty five feet deep. The Abbeville, Bondinia and Calvernia railroad trucks running along the top of the levee were washed away. The levee partly surrounded the city, the Mio-Hollesater Run River running on the south and the Aronburg Run a few miles east. Newgreen is situated situated on the hills west of the city, and Greentown is south of the point. Every manufacturing company were heavy losers, and all the city's railroad depots were also under water.

About 15,700 persons had gathered at Greentown, a section of St Lawrence city and from that place they watched the destruction of their homes. Hundreds of persons had refused to leave saying that there was no danger but as the water neared the top of the levee all hopes of remaining in their homes were finally vanished and they were compelled to sought refuge with their friends and neighbors.

Newgreen is also a small town, but also here every house was thrown open and every one of the homeless were cared for. The supply of food and drink in drinking water at Greentown were most of the refugees sought the same relief. As was more and if not time would soon bring relief 15,000 including the people of the town itself would face starvation.

It was impossible for any one to reach any of the flooded cities or towns, not because the flood itself could be considered impassable, that was not so with its depth and width as long as rescuers would use strong boats, but the forest fires raging anywhere else the floods were not manifesting itself and therefore all provisions being sent were brought in to other cities, and safely placed where it was possible forest fires or floods would not ruin and all attempts made to pass the forest fires by streams and lakes, the lakes being purposely made to join the floods as far as possible so the rescuers could reach the marooned. But this indeed was very slow work. All provisions were taken to St Lawrence and San Salvador Junction, and also to Greentown but they were soon exhausted.

The water supply was even shorter than the food, and a committee was organized to take care of what there was and see that each person was given an equal share and see that not a particle was wasted.

The sight was most pitiful. Aged men and women, scarcely able to walk were compelled to leave their homes, even sick women and children, knowing for certain that everything they owned and had saved during their lives would be washed away. When the final bulletin of danger which was flashed through the city came the persons who had believed that there was no danger became panic stricken and had not it not been for hundreds of men and many children also women, many others would have perished. Every effort had been exerted to prevent a break or overflow of the levee. Heavy work had been thrown up on top of the levee to increase the height and works were even piled against it in an attempt to strengthen the lower levees or lower portions. Several thousand men went to work on the levee and every woman and child used the picks and shovels and other tools hammer for children.

Captured a swirling sea of murky water WHICH HE described as more powerful than the Ocean current in a storm, a German volunteer in the ranks of the rescuers at San Salvador when the flood struck that city, was saved by boatmen who put out from the improvised life saving station at the San Salvador Junction shore internment or refugee camp. This German Member whose name is Franciscom Aloyus had put on a raft at the Glades Avenue bridge and started southwest in the purpose of rescuing people marooned in a wooden wooden house ready to flood away. On his sudden rapid trip on the flood waters he said he heard a number of rifle shots fired and listened to the pleas of about one hundred persons who said they were starving, having had nothing to eat for nearly a full week. The waters of the flood rushed so fast, said Aloyus that he was unable to attempt to rescue one of them who frantically pleaded for help, and before he had time to REALIZE IT Aloyus was being carried down the flood a part swarms of floating houses with people on their roofs or in upper story windows and attics. His own cries for assistance brought men from the shore of the flood who risked their own lives to aid him, and he was taken in tow. According to Aloyus nothing but a powerful motor boat could withstand the onslaughts of the waters of the flood. Aloyus reported that about two hundred and twenty five or more men were on the roof of a saw planing mill called the George Hanson window sash company... loaded with the greatest difficulty and at the risk of loss was taken to these men by boat from the food provision camp on the nearest shore.

Aloyus said he counted ninety women and children mostly little girls in one building that threatened to go to pieces, and fourteen in another all on the third floors. He said several young men who started out to rescue these, were now themselves hanging to trees, and that they had asked him to send help. Aloyus said he thought he could be of use as he had managed a raft in the floods of the past but the currents he met in the flood at San Salvador were total strangers to him.

The rescue of a planglomenian creature, unusual to even itself, showed that even these creatures even though they can live also in water because of their swimming abilities in the seas for deepest fish did not fancy being hemmed in a muddy dirty flood by wreckage. The rescue was started by a man known as Franciscomithery. Smithy going over the flooded district near the Jinnie's Street a bridge heard the planglomenian crying out and giving forth its signal noises for help from its kind never expecting a human being would be around. The poor thing and quite a large one though young was found closed in among a mass of wreckage of jammed houses, and timbers and furniture of all kinds, and because a wing and its legs were held was unable to free itself, and it was almost covered with wreckage. Even planglomenian creatures were flood sufferers. No wonder they take it out on the glandelinians.

Smithy managed to get a human hundredmen to help him and they managed in a days job to chop away the wreckage from the legs and wing caught, and soon the creature was free to swim off at will. Then when where the creature followed and after this it would not leave Smithy's side but remained, finally other planglins finding their comrade safe were overjoyed.

The arrival of a boat containing a priest and his mother recently operated on for appendicitis presented a pitiable scene. The priest and his mother had been taken from the priest house at which she was visiting when the flood started. She was stricken there, she could not move and the men lifting her from the boat to the train feared they would injure her. She was taken from the third story window of the flood surrounded priest house.

Another man suffering with a strange disease had to be carried from the boat to an ambulance in a blanket warm as it was, another rescuer who worked two days and most of the last night, had his boat accidentally overturned and was nearly drowned before he was rescued by his fellow boatmen. He was taken one of the camp hospitals where he died of his injuries later. Another boat man fell out of his boat when something or struck it. He was taken to the refugee camp where he was taken care of. It was reported that an elderly man was kneeling down for hours praying in a house half submerged in water and that he refused to be taken out for the reason of the glandelin glandelinians he said being responsible for the flood. Another boatman reported that several persons were in a house on the second floor and refused to be taken out. After darkness of the sixteenth day of the flood had settled over the depressing scenes, one boatman seen a light in the fourth story of a big wooden house. The boat came up alongside to the window the water being almost up to the fourth story, and he knocked on the window. No reply was heard and the window was broken. This aroused as of one of the two who were in the house and he roundly cursed the glandelinians and swore he would not be rescued until the glandelinians who were responsible for the disaster were caught. Neither of the men would come out.

Probably the presentment of an Franciscom woman saved an entire family from being fatal victims of the Angelina Agathia section of the flood. A month before James Jerrysonia who lived on north St Michael's Street (Angelina Agathia and who was a draftsman remained in Angelina Agathia to work there for a lumber concern, telling his wife to rent their home and prepare for removal to Angelina Agathia. Mrs Jerrysonia liked Franciscom city and was in a no hurry to get away. All along she felt sure something would happen that would make it unnecessary for her and her children to move. Besides she said the city of Angelina Agathia was too near the war zone and she feared something would happen there more than elsewhere. The husband however kept writing for them to come, asking them if they really loved him to make all preparations to join him in Angelina Agathia. Sometime later he suddenly became ill of the plague plagues then raging because of the other disasters and returned home the week before he the flood came. However Mr Jerrysonia soon grew better having had only a mild attack and he personally directed the packing of his household goods for shipment to Angelina Agathia. Not having yet obtained a house in the city of Angelina Agathia he temporarily stored his goods at Franciscom, and the family was to go to Angelina Agathia the day of the flood horror, but on that day it was impossible to get even out of Franciscom city as it too was flooded to a considerable degree. When they read of the Angelina Agathia flood they quickly decided to take their goods from a storage and return to their home. Frank Litson, who was in the city of Dorothy Gale, told to a group of war correspondents and newspaper men together a graphic story of the flood disaster which overtook the city of Dorothy Gale. He said that up to the time that he left Dorothy Gale by boat many bodies had been recovered from the flood, bodies of those mostly buried in wreckage of buildings overthrown by the explosion shocks before the flood, the waters having probably washed them free, and it was estimated that many more would be found.

"For ten days and nights amid continual darkness day and night, and strange almost suffocating heat I was imprisoned with many others in a orphan asylum crowded with curious and frightened children and praying nuns. I said 'Lithonia' and we all could hear the shrieks and cries of people who were being carried away by the flood. It was a frightful experience and for nights far off the skies would be in three directions as red as a sunset that glowed unquenchably red. The flood came up most rapidly so rapidly that we were all driven to the third story of the orphan asylum, and there we waited until I succeeded in securing a raft large enough to convey most of us to a place of safety. I sent then to a rise of ground to view the flood and in thirty minutes saw at least a legion of bodies pass by on the waters. The conditions of many bodies gave us evidence they died more from suffocation being under debris from the explosion shocks more than from drowning. One man told me he had counted two hundred and seventy-two out of thousands of houses in one part of the city only three could be seen. All of the others appeared to have been washed away." "In Abbeysian Language the city of Dorothy Gale 'Napoleus'."

The great Manufacturing state of Abyssinkile, never before had added of the records of disasters of any kind before the war, but now as conveying an idea of the vast extent of the flood of water which has caused more damage to that country than even Angelina State, a few lines are given to show that even western Abyssinkile suffered to a most enormous degree, although there was comparatively little loss of life. Property damage to the amount of $24,000,000,000 could be the estimate of the extent of the worst of the flood in western Abyssinkile. Over sixteen million people were made homeless, while business in all big cities touched by the flood were at a standstill. Railroads and street car lines suspended traffic, while hundreds of industries employing hundreds of thousands of men and women were forced to idleness.

The hot wave produced by the distant forest fires which swept over the flooded districts added to the discomfort of the sufferers. In Roseharon no lives were sacrificed according to the best reports from that place but the property loss was immense. Indeed the property loss there with its suburbs will be $11,500,000. The relief committees were unable to cope with the situation. The president announced that an offer from a member of the Christian Society could not be received. A rescue boat sent to the home of a woman and her three children upset as they were being removed, and they were rescued from drowning with great difficulty. Bodies of many animals were taken from the debris at Grand Junction three miles south of Roseharon. Hundreds of workmen were busy at work cleaning up streets and steel plants. Troopers of the State police, the local police and a local independent military organization policed the town with hot weather and cessation of the rise of rivers the flood at Grand Junction fell slowly and fear of further damage passed. There was no loss of life, though destruction of property was great.

In Newburg over half a hundred thousand families camped out, their homes having been swept away by the rushing waters of the flood, which held that place in its grip for over two weeks. The loss in this neighborhood will be enormous. Other places hundreds of families were huddled in second stories of their homes, the water reaching a depth of six feet on the first stories. Under the direction of the flood supply Committee of Grand Junction, organized to aid victims of the Angelina State flood, the Steamer Agathia went to Newburg. Calvernia, so loaded with provisions and clothing. The Algate river at this point reached three times the height it ever went in its existence. Information to the citizens from the up river points on the Evangelina St. Claire, from which a branch of the flood came said there was no further occasion for alarm. The Evangelina St. Claire, Angelina gun and the McHollister Run Rivers with their many branches were still receiving other flood waters and going continually out of their banks and still spreading a heavy sheet of water over the low lands and wide stretches were still inundated, and at Quine thirty thousand persons were driven from their homes. Scores of industrial plants in one city, located along the banks of the Evangelina St. Claire were still under water, and there was easily 156,000 persons at work at out of work at one time. In the business section of the city pumps forced water from cellars of every building while the sidewalks were piled high with debris removed to escape the waters.

Pictures of the early scenes in the flooded cities convey vivid expressions and impressions of the situation that were later presented. As in the case of the more severe cases of the flood the one at Indiana was due to the flooded river overflowing but not breaking down one of its levees. Elsewhere the barriers gave way with a report that could be heard for miles through the city, while thousands of persons were driven from their homes, a property loss caused that cannot be estimated, public service corporations paralysed and hundreds of thousands of acres of settled territory devastated. The work of the flood here began with the rising of the Evangelina St. Claire above its levees and this was augmented with disastrous results, while its channels went over their levees at many points flooding a large part of western Abyssinkile, the high water ending street car service, putting the entire water works system out of commission, and threatening other public service corporations in many cities and towns. The gas service of every city and town was also threatened, and the mails were held up by the flood. The catastrophe which became greater and greater resulted finally in the rupture of the Frankford Street Wells River Levee at St. Nicholas which up to that time had protected west Abyssinkile from the worst of the flood.

Within a short time the raging Evangelina St. Claire River had swept down two spans of the A.B.C. railroad bridges on the West Calvernia side, and was threatening bridges on other crossings. The eastern section of Calvernia bordering western Abyssinkile was flooded and there was predictions that the worst of the flood would occur at this point.

The breaking of the levees of the Evangelina St. Claire River was the most disastrous of happenings as it permitted the complete inundation of a very large territory to the northwest and southwest, as well as south and east. Were 2,345,678 people were driven from their homes and a more vast amount of property loss was occasioned.

Of course even for such a flood disaster as this there have been here and there some who injected some color into the gray mass of tragedy and turn a little sunshine onto the darkened horrifying scenes. One of these was George Lamerton who refused to leave his home at 1916 Cromton Avenue, Dorothy Gale city in the heart of the flooded district. He told reporters that formerly he had lived at Angelina Agathia, and was not afraid of any flood, whatever. Whatever he proved this statement by rescuing many of the marooned in upper floors. He being on a boat came to a eighteen rooming house where people were in the upper floors and after a full day's perilous work rescued them all.

The first mail delivery after the flood brought a letter to his son Frank in a high section of the city in which the man said among other things:-

"Do I do not boast as my sonny I have been rescued about four hundred persons. Mr. Lamerton rescued even some special friends of his, three other men, whose houses were not of the two story kind. He took them off in his boat. Elsewhere many men and boys even risked their lives when they entered frail rowboats, and shallow canoes, or went on rafts, and attempted to seek those in need of relief, and take supplies to those who preferred to remain in their flooded homes in Dorothy Gale City. They also rescued many people working day and night from the time of the beginning of the flood, till they almost collapsed from lack of sleep and exhaustion. One night these men rescued thirty people all living in a small brick house on North Avenue. They all had been forced to flee to the third floor of their home and had abandoned hope abandoned hope of ever being saved, when the rowboats reached them."

This rescue party also saved a number of orphans from a burning flooded home on Dorothy Gale Avenue, and on their last trip before being prostrated from exhaustion they picked up two women, three children from a house in Center Street and brought them to a hotel near the Main Street bridge....

By others several trips by boat and attended with unusual peril was made over to St. Ann's convent and school where nearly fifteen hundred children were marooned for two weeks, but the sisters and children marooned there refused to leave. They asked for food and pure water however, which was sent to them later. Many of the rescuers were armed with grappling irons and visited every house possible and rescued every one they could find. One boat had returned to the shore at noon on one of these days with two children and a man. One man who attempted to reach the sisters and children marooned in St. Ann's School and convent with a boat load of food and provisions got lost in a large coal yard. He came down to the flooded district in a boat from some point below, and just as he reached Main Street his boat was driven into the yard. To make it more difficult for him the waters were falling and before he could get out of the tangle of trees the waters had receded below the top of the fence, and he could not find the gate. Three men got on top of the orphan asylum and threw him a rope, which he made fast to his boat. For about four hours he rowed around the yard in an effort to find the gate, but was unsuccessful. Arrangements were made to take him out in a rowboat, but those who went to rescue him were captured and were rescued in turn by the children who threw him ropes.

The friendliness and faithfulness of a young Blenglonemenean creature was soon demonstrated to one party of rescuers. A small black creature with brilliantly colored and spotted wings was discovered in a large hall of a flooded surrounded house about two hundred yards from the bridge. He was giving some of his cries, and a number of rescuers called to him. The young Blenglonemenean finally braced up courage, jumped into the water and swam to the levee. The rescuers picked him up, placed him in a wagon, wrapped him in a rug and in about two hours the creature was dry and had quit crying. The rescuers left the wagon for a minute, and when he returned he saw the creature still waiting for him. Finally it proposed to remain with him for a long time.

A man was underneath his wagon in front of his home making repairs to the bottom when the water began to rise. Several men and women who were in the the vicinity and who ran when the waters began rising called to the foolish man, according to their testify he refused to leave the wagon and the last they saw of him, he was "tinkering away and the water was beginning to creep up on him." Another witness said he saw the man's wife and two children one a boy, and a girl who lived in the neighborhood make her way to the railroad tracks, that he heard her and even the children call the man a number of times and finally she and the children appealed to some men to save her husband or father. He was forced almost roughly to head her call and when he still refused four men picked him up and despite his struggles carried him away saying "what is that wagon worth to your life you poor boob." "....."

Becl

Another man whose name we'll mention here was Hank Weaver who lived at 1144 Landstone Avenue said that had people within his districts heeded the warning spread by himself and many others no one would have been caught or marooned. He said he rode on his motor motorcycle through St. Peter's Street, Morris, Center Street and adjoining streets warning the people that the flood was rising and discovering the levees and advising them to flee to more substantial buildings or to higher ground. Weaver said that only a few of the people followed his advice but that others closed their doors, and did not seem to either mind the threatening danger or thought he was fooling and did not believe him. "....."

Good work was done by Major Hanson Equal and many other members of Company D of the Mobilization Camps in addition to patrolling the main levee that did not give before the pressure of the flood, and preventing persons without passes, from entering the danger zone, they manned boats carrying provisions to the flood bound people, manned all kinds of relief boats and did all in their power to aid those in distress. The solid soldiers changing off shifts would be on duty during the whole duration of the flood day and night, and when the watches were changed those relieved from duty managed to get a few hours sleep in a number of abandoned abandoned cars in San Pedro Street near the bridge.

Maude Finney whose home also was in the flooded district had been also engaged in rescue work for nearly forty five hours, and with little sleep that time. He was less than forty five years of age, but he did the work of a young man, and he proved he had brought one hundred and forty five persons from their water bound homes. West Dorothy Gale city made a most brave effort to take care of itself, when rescuers and others from the city proper were able to reach the other side of the flood that found that probably 10,000 people had been provided for.

West Dorothy Gale's people on the far side of the flood waters rose as one and took in the homeless, the ill and the hungry.

Many big public places were thrown open and hundreds were taken to these places from boats that took them off from any point and landed at any street most easily reached. While so much rescue work was being conducted mostly at great peril and under great difficulties at any point of the city, rescuers were working tirelessly from the far and north and south sides, and the stories of heroism from countless persons and suffering rival those from those from any flood disaster in the war yet. Work on the West section of Dorothy Gale was carried on with still more difficulty, perhaps a trifle more than on any other side because of the limited means at the disposal of the people. At first not over two boats could be mustered in the section. Then carpenters fell to work, and made good strong boats of a crude, flat bottom type, but boats which could be handled with home made paddles and oars and which could not be capsized or swamped.

Hundreds of firemen and policemen who were continually at work in the west side of the city when the waters rose led the rescue parties. The engine houses were absolutely absolutely under water, but the men had managed to escape with all the apparatus. Every fireman remained on duty as a savior of life from water.

About two score women from an organization that established headquarters at one of the refugee camps with the purpose to distribute as much food as could be obtained for the hungry. Every one was required to register before receiving help and also the greatest care was exercised that bread and clothing which was so hard to obtain should not be distributed to imposters. Nevertheless the organization was badly in need of clothing, especially for women and children. So many came out of the flooded districts districts without sufficient clothing, and with the dangers of sickness being great that the situation seemed desperate.

One of the head members of the Gemini, about the time was in one of the districts and who had come with the advice of some of the generals to investigate the flood disaster said when he returned that he had frequently predicted the disaster that had come to flood the country as it is now inundated. "....."

"I have been repeatedly to the various governments of the State States, and also to the Board of Levee Works, to the engineers of various cities, and to other official officials of city and government. 2.2.2.2. "The same" man told them we would have another big flood disaster if all explosive materials were not removed from the path of the big forest fires then raging along the east of the Angelina State boundary. If not removed at least if the forest fires were not stopped in that direction. I knew that near the reach of the big forest fires great camps filled with explosives were situated for the purpose of working in blasting for farmers and others. Near one of the bends of the river the engineers had been constructing a new levee where a break had been made by some past disaster, and there gradually extending it along the river bed, and manufacturing establishments have been dumping cinders and other solid solid materials into the levee increasing the pressure of the torrent going over them. The cause of those explosions, and also why the munitions were there in the path of that nothing hell of Heidi gate is also at a loss to determine, and investigations cannot be made as the conflagration spreading to northeastern Angelina gate have wiped out all means a bring about the results of an investigation, destroyed all clues entirely. But it seems absolutely suspicious. It seems also plausible but so far even Science has been unable to trace such connections. The cause therefore is a mystery.

The flood came also at the very time when stormy weather failed to come since the beginning of June. We do not always have storms of any kind in this part of California during the summer months, except far north. However it is a bad time of the year also when the weather is so dry, not to see to it that even our forests are guarded more properly, and therefore forest fires of these kinds could even be expected through even natural causes let alone done by the enemy and the war. Science therefore cannot offer no reason for this situation of the war. One point however that strikes as peculiar in that the operations in the river when even receding the waters of the past floods could not be even such that the weakest levee would have given way without some unknown and unusual cause. It looks though some thing is wrong concerning the concerning those explosions started by the forest fires. I understand also that the great damage in Angelina Agathia, Dorothy Gale, and Jencia, in California State was due to the overflow of the reservoirs of the Mc-Holaster Run proper because of their being lowered by the concussion of the explosions produced by forest fires.

The enemy can be prevented from doing this. All places where reservoirs are should be guarded. The fault of this great damage done and the loss of life is due to the carelessness of our authorities, rather than to the fickleness and caprice of nature and the enemy.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN
BRAVE DEEDS BY ALL, HUFFS AND STATIONS, AN ADORSED NATION. CAUSES OF FLOODS AND FLOODS, ABLENNIA BEETHING WITH ANGEL OVER FIRE AND FLOOD DISASTERS, FLOOD CONDITIONS UNDER ABLENNIA TO BEHOLD FURTHER CATASTROPHE CAUSES.

During this tremendous disaster, bravery lacked neither rank nor station. It may thrill the soul of all great heroes of the past in Ablennia to meet such a foe they needed a hundred Napoleons or Wellingtons, and George Washingtons, Grants and Abraham Lincolns. It may never the soul of the most humble. From the ranks of the most lowly have come many countless persons whose daring could have inspired any history. It was so during the flood horror in Angelina state and throughout southern Calvernia. Everywhere in countless places the story of this great flood is marked by feats of daring and fearless accomplishments. Brave men by the countless thousands contributed to the richness of the heritage that will be history for Ablennian in all time. Those whose quiet bravery was effective would receive medals there would be such a long list of them that two hundred books would be needed for their names. The long list of men and women and even elder children who faced peril not for a moment but for days and weeks, and passed through with great credit, men and other heroes who were far from the spotlight when their gall came may never be known. In thousands of various ways men saved the helpless public in a large way. In Angelina Agathia, in a large Telephone building, an unknown man marooned alone for forty thirty four days, sent messages and delivered orders for the military and the chief executive of the state, a service that saved many lives, sticking to the tank when waters threatened, and the menace of fire appeared.

Not once in all that long vigil did he falter. The Governor of all states has proclaimed him a man in a whole nation, who forgot or did not care for his own safety that others might have a larger chance for life. Side by side with him in the most fearless devotion was another unknown person whose voice appeared that of a woman from some Telephone company in Big Girl Knool. Before the wires went down disrupting all communications she telephoned thousands of miles through the flood sections, issuing warnings, seeking out bits of information, for the military officials, and the Governor, carrying to a score of places the first welcome message that help was coming.

From Angelina Agathia, to Little Girl Knool, from Marie Korman city to porothy Gale time after time she searched the flaming hills and forested dunes of the fire ravaged state for news and to deliver messages of warning to town in the path of the "red plague" while hundreds of thousands of dollars a waited for the company if its wires were commercialized, for eighteen days over ninety per cent of the service was gratis, done for the good of the state, for the benefit of humanity, done to save human life.

One of the soldiers, and who was member of the military company at Little Girl Knool, and his company did their work in a manner that when heard of aroused admiration and surprise in the nation. Out of communication with Jessonia, and knowing troops had been called for, Colonel Hendon volunteered to go to Angelina Agathia, forty miles, for orders. He made it through seas of water and mud, and took church with near by forest fires as well, and even was occasionally fired at by the Glandelinians in ambush. Part of the time on a motorcycle, part of the time wading the water, part of the way on foot, fighting his way through bushackers and ambushes, he walked and fought his way into the Angelina Agathia state house, covered with mud and drenched and asked for orders.

Through the mud and water and facing perils, innumerable he made his way back to Little Girl Knool, and the company turned out. Two miles out on the rail way the waters stopped the train. Out tumbled the soldiers and waded and swam the waters and for eighteen miles trudged through the deep mud, through a fierce hot wind. They landed at the Jessonia improvised refugee camp at ten o'clock at night and went on duty there. There was their arrival was a Godsend. There were hundreds of thousands of frantic people who had been rushed from their homes. Families had been separated, many lost, men, women, and children were frenzied. The place a total ruin was in darkness, without police protection and vandalism ran rampant.

The military force superfluous, restored order, and the refugees numbered safely. At every turn there could be stories like this to be told of the National Ablennian Guardsmen, ordinary citizens called to duty, of government, officers soldiers and life savers, and of every other person who went to the aid of their fellow man, and as many militia as could be forthcoming responded to the call.

It was hard and most dangerous work, hours were long, and accommodations not what they could have been desired. There was neither lodging nor complaining. Men on duty slept on stone floors after long hours of toil in the waters, and rose to repeat the same uncomfortable and dangerous tasks. Not in any other history of real flood disasters, fires or war horrors has there been a scene similar to that which maintained at the many stricken cities and towns in the flood zones, when wherever possible the Federal, State, and Civil Authorities established a "Tented city" for the flood refugees. WHERE hundreds of thousands of homeless people were temporarily sheltered. Yet with the lack of bright sunshine, sweet pure air, and a fair portion of supplies the people were not cheerful, and did not face the future brightly. An ample provision could not even be provided for the stay of all in the camps built of wreckage, and these improvised refugee cities grew slowly. Each shelter accommodated fifteen persons but because of the badly crowded conditions it was necessary in all instances to put more than half this number in a shelter until others could be erected from the wreckage. Many of the refugees who found their way into the improvised city went from buildings which was the refuge of many thousands in the early and later days of the flood. To augment the care of such an enormous number which the flood left an entirely homeless, with a cure proposed of being entirely without shelter except improvised tents, additional refugee stations were established in various sections inside and outside of the torn up cities and towns. Even the very army camps outside of the flood zone and the mobilization camps at porothy gale partly untouched by the flood this time were used for the purpose, but these of course were not sufficient. All the hundreds of thousands of tents sent by the War Department and from the Headquarters of the Angelina state National Guard could not arrive until a few weeks or longer because of their slow transportation down the rivers and through the flood zone, the only way open, though a risky trip. As communities began to realize the effects from the raging fire storm and flood effects this little story can be related to show how effective was the angry waters.

Completely cut off from the outside world, for probably many months to come and forth a whole month and a few days hemmed in by swirling currents, at the junction of the Great Mic-Hollister River, and the famous Aronburge Run, and wholly inundated in every place the flood waters at their very least being in a depth of from eighteen to twenty feet, the whole Ablennian country through one lone foreign war correspondent learned on October 8th 1913 for the first time that Emperor Vivian lost his palace and his all, was for a time until he could get off to go on duty, in the bread line, that the war in the West was going insane with fury, that the battles of Evangeline St. Claire and Big Girl Knool were still claimed not christian victories, that Glandelinia was already victorious in the south, that a terrible plague was sweeping hundreds of thousands of lives out of existence, that Jessonia, and Angelina Agathia were totally destroyed, that the Glandelinians were mobilizing as far as her armies were, that a series of battles had caused more enormous loss than the death list of all disasters combined since October's entrance, that many of the best and most reliable christian generals are dead or disabled for life, that Little Girl Knool was destroyed, hundreds of cities with her, that the awful fires in the forests were spreading toward the Marie Osborn and Mic-Hollister woods, and threatening hundreds of town not touched by the flood, that 678,899, 578,000 had died because of the plagues, that many towns had fallen into the hands of the enemy, that to the enemy Calvernia had now fallen the inhabitants fleeing, and that the countries of Angelina and Calvernia and many other states was now emerging from the worst flood disaster of all record, and all aid to the stricken districts, to even those formerly made homeless by past floods was cut off by the worst forest fire ever heard of.

Also that a hundred other cities even as far as southern Angelina and southern Ablennia and Abyssinilia is without electricity and other means, every town plunged into darkness. At Jessonia, the Ablennian occupation garrison reported thirty dead from the effects of an unusual hot wave coming from the southeast, and in addition there are hundreds of prostrations. A message even from Zaneville northern Calvernia said forty people were sealed to death when a boat they were riding capsized in a river flowing northwestward, and which was carrying away on its surface burned trees and limbs. And unrelenting heat, lack of sunshine, a strangely white hazy sky, and strong winds hot and burning have turned large sections of the states into a October swelter, so far north when for that region winter should be already on the start, with snow ice and cold waves. Populous cities which usually at this time are covered with heavy smiles of snow, are experiencing through mysterious causes 110 in the shade and will going up, without any sunshine to boot and a strangely yellowish white sky, while great rivers especially the northwestward bound are so warm that no one dared wade in them. Millions of cooked fishes are discovered.

From all parts of Calvernia overwhelmed by the southeasterly or southwesterly winds comes unceasing reports of the worse human suffering, inside the flood zone or outside from worst weather conditions in three hundred and fifty years, and no let up, and neither ruin, and neither rain nor sunshine, while a stinky haze covers the towns at times like a fog.

Too many large cities to mention here are isolated, and their populations stay indoors to escape the greater heat outside. Even now to make matters worse all railroad service has been utterly demoralized. Angelina State is being isolated from Calvernia and the rest of the world, no communications being possible. Over the Angelinian zone further east, a strange fog hangs for days which smells like smoke. Trains connecting the near east with northern Calvernia and Abyssinilia south, with continental Ablennia have been unable to proceed beyond Pandora and Francis Atlanta because of impassable fire barriers. The Ablennian government announced that if the heat continues it too would soon be compelled to seek cool cooler regions to do their work. Near the northeastern boundary of Angelina state it is also reported that thirty villages have been wiped out by a fire plague sweeping upon them. And because of the complete shortage or stoppage of a transportation the authorities have been unable to send rescue food and relief to any point of the double disasters. As far north as Sacramento, Abbeville, every one was suffering intensely from hot weather. And so many industrial establishments have been closed that because of the heat millions of workers have been forced into idleness. Schools throughout the country are shut, and hospitals are crowded with sufferers; from heat and prostration. Passenger passage with Abbeville via California has ceased, and in northern Abbeville southern warm winds had or has prevailed there in October for the first time in his history, for which at this time 10 to 28 below zero is the coldest. It is thereby evident so tremendous are the forest fires that this coming winter only the farthest north will see cold weather, except when the winds are off the north. So dangerous are these forest fires that now from every city and town in the whole nation all men not in the army were volunteering to be transported to go and fight the blaze, and standing armies were ordered to do so too.

In Appleby Town, near where Jessica was almost annihilated, a conference of Geminis with local Realty owners all over the country and officials, estimated the losses of the forest fires alone for timber burned up to this time of probably twenty billion dollars.

An important phase of the flood history is that which I can relate to the manner in which the first news of the disasters reached the northern sections of the nation and the extreme south. Practically all the flood, and forest fire, and war news which was given to the newspapers, for weeks after the flood, emanated from the Angelina Agathia, and Jessica districts over one small little telephone wire secured by a Pandora newspaper.

From this this point the news, and also many official messages were so quickly disseminated by circuitous methods, for instance one telegraph circuit was made to reach Sacramento, Abbeville, consisted of telegraph lines to various cities not in the war zone, and back from there to Angelina Agathia. Pandora, in Abbeville State received its news and information from the stricken section, by way of Francis Atlanta, to or through Central to New Agathia, to New Albany, and back to Pandora. In some cases a circuit was established by using a telephone line newly erected to complete a telegraph circuit and it was not for two weeks that even a small line of telegraph service was established.

The difficulties of re-establishing the telegraph service in an unusual section where can be witnessed on the fourteenth day after the deluge reached or passed its worst the early risers in the city of Igloo rubbed their eyes and for the first time since the flood beheld a full fledged steam boat floating over what once had been cornfields. Far out on the yellow lake the boat rode on water that washed the back yard fences of the community.

The boat was feeling its way over what had once been farm lands, pushing thru wreckage. Therefore there was a surprise, when this brave boat crew worked their big boat through the dangerous flood, and in that hot weather engaged in the dangerous mission of getting the north and south close together again by splicing broken telegraph wires. There was a crew of expert linemen on board, and the boat which was chartered by the Abbeville electric wire company was loaded to the water's edge with cable. The task proved most Herculean. When the big bridge, Abbeville-Bondina and California Bridge over the Evangeline St. Claire was swept away, the wires snapped and the poles were snapped away. A cable was stretched across the river and the broken end was attached to it. Where possible, poles were set upright. The work was rather crude, but it was necessary and it worked. Then while the people Igloo strained their eyes the boat backed out, and went over the flooded bottom to the spot where the big bridge over the river once stood. There the same work was performed and the wires were repaired at other spots along the former right of way of the railroad, twisted out of all conformation by the flood. Later the boat dropped down to the site of the boat bridge near Nelson Bridge, and the same work was accomplished there.

Throughout the whole duration of the flood the weather in two hundred and fifty years continued the hottest without abatement in all sections also of the flooded region, and those who did not die because of the flood died because of the heat, and thousands were prostrated. Heavier smoke in the skies than ever caused more than the usual darkness, and at night the darkness was pierced by strange ruddy glows. Outside Pandora sixteen persons were killed and thirty five injured when two flood relief trains missed their danger signals in a smoke fog and plunged off the tracks near a washout and into the flood. Reports came from Francis Atlanta that the Mic-Whirther Run River was strangely steaming for the first time in its existence, and that millions of fishes were floated on the surface dead.

Many rivers also were floa blocked with wreckage causing great difficulty to the water traffic. A severe hot wave from the northeast is being felt throughout the southeast of Angelina State, but there also is unusually little sunshine, but here railroad traffic has been able to proceed regularly.

The weather in Angelina Agathia was the hottest for weeks in four hundred years with a temperature of 144 degrees, pouring natural summer hot weather and the highest mark ever exceed 102. Several times however when the wind here veered southwest the mercury would sink to normal, but the moment the wind veered east or west, or north west and north then the heat wave was terrific, and sticky. For some reason or other the hot wave was felt more in Angelina Agathia than in other places because the city was, have been nearer the forest fire zone than any other place place to receive the heat from them. The Forest rangers headquarters announced that California and Angelina is divided by two cyclones of forest fires, one raging in southeastern California, the other above the southwest and moving the same direction, northward. The wind is sweeping them on headlong. It cannot be said which forest fire is the most gigantic, or whether the bigger one will last the longest or whether the many fighters coming and attacking against it will win out, but the flood naturally saved the main cities from being burned out of existence altogether.

If loss of life was small from flood the death list nevertheless mounted from hot weather conditions throughout all sections of the country except by the heat when blown by winds. All advices emphasized the severity of heat, smoke and lack of sunshine throughout most parts of California, and sections of Angelina State. Death attributable to the hot weather occurred in all the larger sections of the Nation closest to the forest fires. Yet though the heat is felt in southern California, Abbeville, Concanina, Tripconina and other places, California, one of the worst forest sufferers. In Pandora, California, it was 110 degrees, here by this time the highest usually is 45, at Francis Atlanta, where the usual temperature is the same at this time of the year it was 124, the hottest spot in that section. The northwest section of California was harder hit. Six persons here overcome at Pandora, strange animals from far distant woods have entered the city, and one man saw two deer in his front yard. Passengers of the Interstate Express told stories upon reaching Francis Atlanta of having been visited by animals of the forests all kinds even terrified wolves, which howled around the cars, scratching the doors and windows and trying to enter. Overhead in many spots Bling, looms creatures flew excitedly to and forth peeping at a snubbin with their signed roars. The stories of attacks upon Grandchildren came by the Hongkong were numerous from western California, and the neighboring woods.

In Angelina Vine the weather changed from moderately cool to intense tropical climate, an African heat. A fierce northeast wind bursted many thermometers of thermometers so high they rose, and it was so hot hundreds died and thousands were prostrated.

The river relief boat which left for the sons of flood and was due to arrive at Evangeline St. Claire from Francis Atlanta did not arrive until three days later than expected, having been held up. In the great Mic-Hollerter River in a blind fog smoke cloud and fierce hot headwinds, and stopped in its progress by a terrific burning fire far in front, though three miles away made it too hot for any one to remain on deck. The crews and relief workers had experienced a most terrifying ordeal.

Far out along where lines here the conditions along the entire Mic-Hollerter river as they prevailed provided a panoramic view of the flood. Flood isolation provided in every town along this river for nearly a hundred miles. They stood engulfed in the flood with the water in many of them to a deep depth from ten to twenty feet in the more exposed sections, and they all too suffered from the heat and lack of sunshine. Their inhabitants were thrown on the care of the Government of the flood and river line, and the country people did their part most nobly. Haveright suffered less than others, Harocian was more fortunate, but they were submerged districts, with hundreds of houses wholly under water. Some houses were carried off bodily by the current. Across the river at Mic-Hollerter city, a hundred thousand houses had to be vacated as the water rose around them. Osborne had the water up to the roofs of many of its houses. One of the sights near the town was an isolated patch of ground. Inhabitants of the menaced districts at the coming of the flood made desperate efforts to reach the foot hills. The condition of Osborne was repeated at Dorfil. Flood supplies were scarce and the residents had taken refuge with the farmers. Milton showed little signs of distress, though it was badly flooded. Pelton was deep in the waters and its former residents were with their former friends in the highlands. At daylight the flood had full control of the whole town. The citizens occurred for their own good as far there was no call for outside aid. A hundred other villages were no longer on the map. Hundreds of disconsolate looking men disconsolate looking on from fishing at boards from the river in the vicinity of their former homes yearned to be all that was left. Many of the houses are under water, all others have floated away. The city of Angelina Junction, a thriving and busy Angelina city was a sight to behold. In the few days of the flood one quarter of its beautiful beautiful houses were wrecked, or swept away, while all the others there had to be abandoned. All the roads leading out to Angelina Junction were blocked. The county pike to Angelina Agathia from there was under forty feet of water, not even the cross arms of the telephone poles pointed out whence this beautiful beautiful Angelinian thoroughfare passed. Milton was supplied with rations. It had been under the waves. Many rescuers on boats of great trouble with hot northeasterly winds, and their crews said it was the best urged that the Federal Government, a government of the State of California should undertake works to prevent the enemy from making further floods, on the main big rivers which happen to run through the more vital sections of the states. It is clear in such cases, if the enemy cannot be prevented at all from doing these things then it is better for the Federal Government to have nothing to do with flood prevention during the war.

3. Also another thing, if of important discovery by the enemy plus was the extent to which the Federal and National Government had participated in the expense of constructing a reservoir system at the headquarters of the River Engineering St. Clair which had been determined in such particular case by an investigation of the Government experts possession the necessary training and facilities for undertaking a study of this nature. The investigation showed that the promotion of the preventive of the flood horrors will require the reinforcement of the flow of a huge stream during the dry and wet season through the aid of great storage reservoirs, and showed the number and cost of such dams necessary for this purpose and though the Federal Government had a satisfactory basis for sharing in the expense of constructing a larger system intended also for preventing floods, the enemy leaders decided first to allow it to be accomplished and then to surprise the workers and blow them and their work up. The enemy knew which was also a coming evil to their cause would it be accomplished and it was this, that should the successful floods being prevented come about, and that it would be a great success for river navigation it would enable Christian war fleets to fill down the rivers and lay a snail in every direction upon the California valley.

Under any condition the enemy was to prevent this if possible, possible, hence though the Virgin River knew it not, and will never know, this is the reason why the enemy knew these floods, to never navigation down the rivers.

They planned to destroy all river boats and they could not be deep enough to float even a sailing vessel. The only river they still had to do this with was the Klamath. This was as it is feared to be their next object.

While to carry out the recommendations of the waterways commission as to reservoir construction and other works, and which were to be introduced early in the war. Cases were seized by the enemy spies and brought to the Glendale government, who snatched them to the Glendale government not on the specific question of preventing future floods the commission said.

"Despite all the attempted hindrance from the enemy the commission has given special consideration to the feasibility of constructing reservoirs on all the tributaries of the rivers, and the work to be covered night and day, by armies of troops with machine guns. From the information obtained it appears that such a plan might have greater prospects of success here than any other part of the flood in the country. The damage caused by the floods of the past and the forest fires now raging are enormous. In the second place all investigations show that a large number of actually good reservoir sites exist on the principal river branches.

And a study of these floods in California shows that most of them occurred from November 1912 to September 1918. There were a large number between July and August however that were not as severe or damaging. The government engineers decided that had such reservoir systems been in existence, and all losses and damages caused as they should have been when the war was in its infancy, the catastrophes of the past years and now would have at least been partly averted. The Angelina and California states decided just after the first big flood ensued to adopt the plan. They proposed to carry it out by sound leases, and asked the Federal government because of the benefits which would result to navigation—to co-operate by bearing a share in the expense and by authorizing a strong corps of engineers to construct and operate the system of reservoirs. They urged prompt action because from the approach of the dangerous foe the most desirable reservoir sites were in danger of being ruined. Everything was done to obey this appeal, and everything with success by the enemy was done to frustrate it.

The waterways commission also declared that the job of reservoirs would be feasible for the prevention of enemy-made floods, if the dams are of sufficient size and quantity but the enemy would interfere. The government has pursued the most expensive policy of trying to bring a stop to these flood disasters, but to no avail. The combined efforts for flood prevention, from additional sources, and from a more uniform effort of all state governments, unless if the foe still remains in possession of any part of California will be of no avail. It also has been demonstrated that more forest have been destroyed by the enemy, than there grows in the Western world. Therefore although a far from complete, fully cannot be fully protected from fires, yet drastic measures must be adopted to protect and devastation by the enemy's torrid, in all regions should be adopted.

That the country is aroused to the highest pitch is also indicated by the indicated by the attention of all organizations, local and National also and which following the awful horrors one after the other called on the Abilene government to adopt drastic measures which might in some regard safeguard the cities and the people.

Among these was the General Branch of the Abilene State waterways commission, which adopted resolutions requesting the Imperial Government itself to consider the propriety of treating the problem of flood prevention in the region of the Arroyo San Miguel, the San Miguel and other great rivers as a national problem, and also in order that the enemy might be dealt with according to means probable without delay. Count De Biff, framed the resolution. And then he said in a thundering speech that lasted for hours which only a little is given here:

"All these flood, forest fire, and other great disasters caused by the foe will not only continue, but will come in greater and greater intensity with still more disastrous consequence, while we stand idly by and monkey with the means to guarding lives, and not trying to form armies big enough to drive the damn foe out of our lands. This last flood might naturally have occurred mainly, because the other big rivers were carrying away by gradual process the remaining waters of the past northern Californian floods, and for them to carry off all this water without a new disaster when levees now are undermined by explosion concussion is utterly impossible.

The most feasible and reasonable plan to prevent future floods such as we now are having, is not the deepening, and straightening of the rivers, or making reservoirs, and especially the widening of these streams, but to make the enemy do the "rabbit" race out of the country. It is easier to prevent future floods that way than to go through all the trouble of constructing reservoirs, and to remedy the consequences of the floods. Host of the rivers which did not flood us did not flood us cured for their own usual burden by overflowing into the natural national burdens or basins found along their course, and they would have not flooded us at all even at high water mark from rains and melting snows if it had been for the enemy.

With the enemy being at hand the reservoir system will or not do. I have one reservoir which in this country is as large as the State of Illinois, Indiana and Ohio in American with a depth of four hundred feet, and which hold the water that was emptied into the northern California State at the great flood which wiped out Abilene and other great cities. Many good railroads which had been constructed at an enormous expense have been wiped out. Great factories by hundreds which have been erected along rivers have been destroyed. All other northward bound and southward bound rivers receiving the waters from the past floods is required to do ten times the work that nature intended. All the past floods permit unusual amounts of waters to flow in a very few hours rapidly into the remaining rivers, that under different conditions would be days and weeks reaching the streams.

You can restrain the waters in reservoirs, but in so doing at this time of unusually violent war, you store up greater disaster for the future. The enemy would wait for times of abnormal winter snows, or abnormal rainfalls of springs to fill these reservoirs to a great measure and then wait for a good opportunity to break them with explosives, with a dreadful resultant damage and loss of life. One lesson comes good on this like with the disaster of the Lake Bellona reservoir. Levees which keep the waters to the channels and which have always been builded higher and higher have not been guarded with the care they should have been. Any attempt also to prevent the enemy from forest fire taking in my judgement is ridiculous. Facts and figures and this big fire and many other now raging prove that. This year of our greater forest fires now are being. Our government started to prevent a recurrence of the flood that devastated the Angelina and other counties. A survey of the flood which had receded was made by one of the engineers. They found that in addition to the damage in Angelina Agathia already known, a two thousand five hundred and sixty foot bridge between Jessica and Hilda over the Mic-Hollester River had been swept away. Its strong powerfully made abutments had been washed out. All other parties who considered plans for preventing a repeat repetition of the war made floods which have usually cost the residents millions of dollars per street, to say nothing of the cost of lives, but there was no means for the work to be under. The new disaster of northern Angelina placed the devastated states in the position of facing the largest problem of reconstruction and refinancing it not only has set but which because of the enemy in possession of large parts cannot be done under any conditions. All public service corporations were hard hit. Hundreds of counties in California alone are staggered by stupendous losses and municipalities have burdens doubled and quadrupled a thousand times.

Indicative of the awful situation, in Northern Angelina State alone, one of the many flooded counties alone lost forty nine big bridges, that it will cost a million to place or replace alone for one of them. A similar situation existed in every other county, differing only in degree to a bigger sum. This does not include the damage to railways, highways, small and big culverts, and hundreds of little bridges. It was estimated it would cost $150,000,000 to restore the bridges claimed by the flood. Cities, villages, and towns and districts, shouldered the load to a still greater degree. Municipalities have the burden to carrying for the unfortunate since flood and other disasters started and the more... expensive problem of rebuilding with a great hindrance from the enemy.

The proper birth place and the progress of a conflict, the general course also half of the damage done by the flood would fall upon the railroad. One of the high officials of the Mc-Holleston and Pandura railroads, which had corps of engineers declared it would require $56,000,000 to restore bridges on the Pandura system through the war zone states, and that all transportation facilities, need not be looked for in years. Besides bridges however the railroads of these states, and of the nation lost many while depot systems in the cities and big towns inundated along with communication. The Abbelesonia, Gondina, and Calverline railroad and hundreds of other lines suffered in proportion. These losses because of the war cannot for a long time be financed. Every piece of material for piling, bridges and also quick reconstruction of the roads could not be found in these states, and would have to be loaded for shipment from the extreme northern states.

Back

Bonds in great numbers were sold to raise the funds. There was no other way of financing. Bonds are slow sale in Calverline, with public ownership of utilities, home rule and franchise revocation all open problems to bond buyers. Because of the enemy investors take no chances. The problem of re-financing this way becomes doubly serious. All traction lines in the flooded states were cut in bits. Bridges innumerable disappeared, tracks more in number than even in the United States. States and Groups were wiped out, and enormous damage was done to the railroad in property of trains of cars, thousands of them, and many most expensive engines. These losses will also have to be financed.

It will test the fiber and foundations of all the large and small corporations. The estimate by all authorities and the governors of the flooded states that in this last flood alone the property loss would exceed that occasioned not only by all the past flood and other disasters combined, but by all storms as well, proved to have been modest. An odd feature of the immeasurable loss was at first so little of it was insured. Most buildings were only insured against fire and cyclonic storms, except in Angelina. Agatha the loss from fire was inconspicuous so far as known. Sixteen States, the hundreds of counties, and the many cities are now face to face with the most discouraging or problem of all, in which there was not even the ray of hope of the traditional capacity of the Abbelesonian to surmount all obstacles.

The Angelina State Legislature immediately after the first and other floods continually took up the consideration of measures and flood prevention plans formed by the many city committees, and they have not been carried out. These plans were sanctioned by the Emperor since the Abbelesonian horror. The plans however are of a comprehensive nature and include an investigation of the natural sources of the rivers, water, soil, forests, coal gas and oil by all committees, at the risk of being assaulted everywhere by disguised and dangerous Glandelinians so dangerously that very little of this has been accomplished. The investigation proceeded proceeded legislation to prevent the enemy from producing floods, and so fierce was the enemy's efforts to prevent all these intentions, there could be no agreement as to what was best to be done.

Some had suggested it would be well to guard streams in the lowlands with whole armies, there danger from the enemy is more serious, and floods are by them more rampant. But this so far cannot be done, or if done the enemy can fight the armies off. This would only add more to the present trouble.

What to do to stop floods in this situation said one of the Committee men calls for study, and also to stop forest fires there is need of preliminary investigation of how the forest fires are made by the enemy. To do this is more risky than taking a chance on the loss of a man's soul. We have haven't any forests in the south east and south east of Calverline that isn't burning. That is all there is to that. No disaster came like this in the history of the world before. The enemy have struck us, and struck us hard as if with a battering ram. We cannot do anything now. We are whipped in hindering disasters.

Also there were two bills made up, one to prevent forest fires in the state forests, and the other to up hold all who start up forest fires, and to give them no quarter. The first bill authorizes the D.R.G. as the agent of the state, to take up numberless forest fire rangers to scour the forests day in and day out to watch out for the slightest signs of fire. Near Soundfend on the Mc-Holleston and moving northward the forest fire has consumed in twenty four hours nearly seven hundred thousand acres of forests. The farmer in the region of these burning forests must sacrifice his farms for these fires. Near these forests there had been built long ago a series of storage dams on the headwaters of the rivers, and the retaining of as much rainwater as possible on the watersheds which served for the three purposes, of keeping farms moist, supplying towns and cities, and of making navigation possible seemed necessary to be blunted by orders of the state government, and risk a new but forewarned flood with the purpose of trying to stay the conflagration. Yet to do so seemed a waste. Much of the soil constantly carried off and lost became sediment in the dams, and was recovered, the water so held filtered through the surrounding areas, stimulating vegetable and forest growth, and preventing wells going dry, and they have usually seen the sudden flow of waters causing more disastrous floods than have yet happened. For fear of a flood too severe in results the plan to burst these dams to stop the progress of the forest fires was fiercely opposed.

In Pandura where the flood manifested itself to some degree a throughout inspection was made of every house and result it was plain, determined that it could be a very long time before any of the houses could be repaired. It was estimated that 115,000 residences and buildings would have to be repaired, painted, plastered, and fixed up before they could be regarded as houses. There were found 4,567 houses, where it was necessary to build foundations to strengthen, to repair, put in floors and windows, rebuild chimneys, and make other repairs before any of their owners could move in again. There were 2,000 houses which it was found necessary to raise or rebuild. The Citizens Relief Committee on advice from engineers, decided that this reconstruction work could require nearly two years even if building material could be promptly obtained, and so far as the business and industrial buildings building, are concerned it was estimated by architects who have looked carefully over the different premises that it would require four years before repair work and also rebuilding could be accomplished.

Only in the main section of the city proper did factories, and all houses escape entirely, and only on the higher ground where the flood was only from one to four feet in depth. The Chief Engineer of Pandura Pandura Commissioned by the State government, completed his plans for rebuilding Pandura beginning the rehabilitation. He announced that fourteen departments had been created, with an assistant engineer in charge of each. One had charge of the building of the streets and alleys, another the levees along the wide river of Pandura running through the city, another the sewerage system, still another the bridges, the street car system and so on.

Ever since the big disaster began the great sympathy for flood, explosion forest fire and other sufferers, has made the whole nation in to every one. Stronger and stronger and more stronger grew the will and resolution to help, even when it involved great sacrifice, and this was general, and in many a case it meant devotion to the giver, who did good in every possible way. The Red Cross and many other Catholic societies have filled the wage earner with their contributions, these in all cases were a part or half of their means of support that could ill be spared, and men and women and children too, who wanted nothing said about it, and then turned and went out to face the struggle again many to enter the army.

Those who entered the army gave all, and not one of them thought twice, about whether they should give in greater respect, than their own. They had been helping one another all their lives, and it seemed not so much an unusual source of rare duty as a natural thing to do to respond to the call from the west, south and north, and southeast, where an unknown number of people from series of on series of terrific disasters have lost their lives, immeasurable amount of property, and whole millions for months and months were homeless and suffering from plague, disease, hunger and hot weather, and lack of sunshine.

The spirit of helpfulness was so much abroad and so active and unselfish following these series of disasters among people of all conditions that even the acts of charity broke all records known. It is a good thing for everybody, not only in this war torn country I'm writing about but for our own country as well. Sympathy is a great means, a greater teacher of charity toward one another. The man of means gave tremendous, just enough that would not destroy their wealth or make them go broke.

In Abbelesonia the man of position and wealth seen the working folk folk ungenerously giving to the relief relief fund for weeks and months without a month forgetting, half of his means and wages and depriving themselves of necessities, in the giving, and therefore the man of means not to be outdone in charity charity who denies himself something when he signs a check, a heavy check to help in the common cause, and also give money to help in the plans to see that levees and dams are protected from such a dangerous foe.

The Abbelesonian Government ex, experts who made a study of the floods, and this particular big one declared there was no direct relationship between the big flood that swept Abbelesonia off the map, and the floods which devastated northern Angelina and other states, as a climax for the month of September and a part of October of 1913. The authorities therefore are of one opinion regarding the floods.

That in a general way, the greater rivers were continually relieving the receding waters of flood after flood after flood a north and west, coupled with the fact that wicked Glandelinians by fire devastated the forests, burning away the trees, causing the forest fires to hit dynamite sheds filled with explosives in conflagration the ground which each effort of the enemy to undermine levees, or to purposely at the annual flood time to crowd the banks of the rivers until the widest channels were not sufficient to carry off the water.

Forest fires if in explanation might be local however and of various types, but they too when they grow into intensity, beyond escape can from the terrific heat, they produce form in their advance violent connotations of the atmosphere, and differing from other atmospheric disturbances in the extent over which they spread, say for instance the size and extent of the fire on its advancing side, and the sudden changes which take place in the direction of the hot winds over wide areas. There is perhaps no question in science in which there was as large an addition of speculation with the attempt made to reduce in spite of the enemy the phenomena of these tremendous forest fires under general laws, the reason being that the forest fire observations are too few in number, and too wide apart to represent the proper birth place and the progress of a conflagration, the general course of the hot gales they come, without drawing level, on a point over. At the beginning of forest fire, however, the area of almost every forest burned over is either oval, circular or elliptical. Rarely in America and America and Canadian forests is the form of forest fires much more elongated. The outline is occasionally very irregular, but in the case of California and elsewhere, the forest fire storms have passed into two three or four more distinct fire hurricanes, or it comprises three or four distinct several immense fires like the ones now raging, some may even call it. If they please satellite or regular forest fires.

The animal peculiar form of Soviet life is one of their general characteristics. This is a most important feature, whether in determining the practical rules for the warning to towns in danger, or for the forecasting of their approach, at particular points, in respect of the direction from which they are expected to come, and the veering of the wind to a terrific screaming hot gale during their approach.

The extent over which the forest fires spread also is very variable, being according how long the fire without hindrance, but in California often two or three times greater than the size of a hurricane storm, and more rarely, even five times that amount, as for more than the whole of southwestern California it being overruled by a single forest fire at one time the area of other forest fires lasting elsewhere at the same time varies in size, sometimes extending and sometimes contracting like storms according to the action of the wind, and it is worthy to remark that when a forest fire contracts, it is a calm it is doing so.

On the other hand when it increases in extent, the heat becomes fiercer, the configuration increases in its burning, its winds increase in violence, and if meeting with obstructions in broken up into two or three parts, which become separate forest fires, with the fire height increasing accordingly by each.

The direction in which the prevailing motion of forest fires take place differ in different parts of California—not always being determined by the prevailing winds, as their fury and heat will force them to advance against the winds if assisted by its own fire hurricane. Thus, for example, the wind is supposed to be a north-easterly, but not break the usual south-easterly forest fire in travelling both from south-west and south-east, and at other times portions of it set of every wind, but travel toward some point in the quadrant lying between the north-east and the south-east, namely like some great electric storm.

Normal Junction, National Gravel, the north branch of the Big Muddy, and the southern portion of the Normal Range region, but such westerly course was temporarily due to transverse heat setting trees afire far in advance while the mother fire was moving due northwest, the northeasterly course being afterwards resumed by these westerly moving fires also.

parts of the most violent section, sections of the forest fire fall under this head, present fires do not always proceed in the same uniform direction from day to day, and through the change which occurs in the direction of their progressive motion a general small, yet occasionally, it is very, great, and hurricane force which is felt; these are the cause of the conflagration.

Thus, of the many interesting features peculiar to the action of this great southeastern California forest fire, which raged on up to present time in the first part of the war, none are so remarkable as that the latter class of its progressive action, it was first observed in the general fire, when it struck Irwinville, from which it suddenly changed course, and advanced east to general Conceptionville. A change camp with a view to the city of San Bernardino, where little Jannie was lost for a time and in April, and then turned northwest, through the Horton and Hinsdale Counties, devastating the forests like a flame ocean of hellfire, it thence retraced eastward straight through Joshua tree, to action to glorianna region into, Carol, passing those cities which were at once saved from the flames, it flooded, from which it passed to northeast toward Evangelhoe. So clear definitely, the time it arrived near this city it was a half by the flood and it turned northeast and twelve miles later it had taken such a turn and a whole army of men could not stop. It was so trailing, for during the times of general action and finally, and completely, it was extinguished, a certain, all of the smoke.

[illegible][illegible]

The direction of the eddy of the fire whirlwinds, especially, when it only rages in the path of the fire differs from the rotation of clouds in storms. In that it may take place in either way, according to the position of the fire.

Also, according to the direction of the fire, the terrific forest fire given rise to ascending column of terrifically heated air to prodigious heights, which in swelling descending currents of colder air continuing to these results in eddies that draw up with them large clouds of flames and burning embers and upon the whole produce of the conflagration is borne forward by the fire winds to yield its produce. This is the origin why a terrific wind always precedes a terrific forest fire. Thus the fire make the forest fire appear on a scale of the most appalling and large.

This exhibition of the film continues to portray whirlwinds like tornadoes, and cyclones by the use of lighting and other contrivances in all their variousness, and are generally accompanied with heavy rain, hail, and electrical discharges, as forest fires are also of frequent occurrence in America. One and many other stations during this immense exhibition, being great dangers to forests and plains, but a further north they have not yet occurred. During the advance of this electric fire, whirlwinds of flame have been to occur, forming a column or so high, could about 4. The ball pillars of fire arising from the main mass of flames below the 4. Whirling around their axes and exhibiting the progressive movement of the whole mass.

as previously in the case of humans. The sea of flames at the base of the whirl fire vortex is more intense violent combustion, resembling the surface of a solid in rapid oxidation. This is generally a lack of the heat of the flame that would produce this, and has been seen for really in forest fires of California and other western American places. But there are a few distinct physical phenomena and probably not too diverse at the swirling action of a vortex combustion.

They are merely a shoots of flame in a well defined stage, of a very local character and they may not be accompanied by anything resembling, only, generally occur in a violent line that gets far beyond all control, being, quite caused by the amount of forests blazing at one time, from which the flames may differ only in point of temperature, size and the amount of fuel on which they are burning, at once, with the sudden blast of a suddenly heated air to back.

That that a forced life, a dependence on the dominating side, a violent system of discipline is needed, but it has been done. The side on which the strength is most easily obtained is most violent, and this following only in the course of the life, like the case of a transformation of discipline. Heated kills too is their actual strength, but they sometimes are treated like in violence. In the heat of the fire as well in the heat there is a sacrifice like sacrifice in their character, while at the same time the intensity of heated atmosphere is stronger, and more above the fire the fire becomes more immediately into evidence for its violence, and the side follows the same course as the fire, but the strength differs only in the heat of the place in which.

1. A large part of the Christian nation, not affected by the disaster, the wave of great humanitarian action and self-sacrificing love since the first flood disaster occurred was quickly made aware of some of the needs and the extent of the ravaging forest fire spread through the United States. I found expression in a host of demonstrations in all cities and towns of the States farther north, editorial tirades, and contributed articles, and in taxing the resources of the most vitriolic columnists.

The new papers are filled with strong resolution of a program to fill all vacant, long held, and established jobs of every conceivable unit, including chemical, mechanical, electrical, hydraulic, and nuclear, the necessity of additional highly specialized technical training of all segments of the energy sector, and the need to drive the energy out of the marketplace. "Rush," however, is not a mere proclamation. It is the first of a series of letters to Congress and the public that will be sent out in the coming weeks to explain a program that will be developed and implemented.

A third demonstrator, Dr. H. P. Pender, Altoona, Pa., wrote to me after his imprisonment during the storm, that a day and well into the night, he, along with a "big" fellow, a colored man, were taken into the town for having a draft board station because they were not accepted by the military. They were held all night in the jail and finally released without documentation. These individuals will go for days and days, tried without conviction, the old religion. Communist infiltrator, the general idea of the storm was to be responsible for the disaster. Of course, the idea was to get the flood, because the flood

332

WALTER STARNING EXPLORES THE HORROR OF THE AWFUL CALAMITY IN FAITH OF THE AFRICAN REGION, AND BEHOLD, STATE.. HE HEARS INDEED OF THE TRAGIC DEATH OF HUNDREDS OF THOUSANDS OF PEOPLE. FRIGHTFUL NUMBER OF THE DEVASTATION FOR HIS MEMOR.

"WITHIN fifteen minutes in the Bengal state, hundreds of thousands, nay millions of men, women and children swept to sudden death while in a bed. Beautiful cities and towns buried under mudslides in a few minutes, or wrecked under in appalling downpour of wreckage hurled by explosions far and wide. For months after scenes of suffering and immeasurable devastation that beggar a description from a hundred million libraries. The whole of western, and southern Calvernia, and the uppers parts of Angellina and other states devastated by resulting floods, and the whole of Abhrentia, and the rest of the civilized world, horrified by the appalling news of the greatest calamity of all kinds ever known. Such is the tragic story of Calvernia Calvernia and other states."

So thought starring as he after having traveled miles with his followers viewed the still flooded ruins of Murchanna. He said to Angeline Jones who looked at the scene wide eyed in horror:

"There have been in the past during this war, and also throughout the world many disasters, by flood fire, explosion, earthquakes, volcanic eruption hurricanes and the like, but none of them put all together could equal this one. Even the Lake Belvidere calamity was a far less malevolent horrible as it was. The dreadful Arronburgs Pan flood which occurred somewhat later did not result in an eth part of the loss of life that has visited Murchann and other cities by flood and explosion convection and other cities whose doom has been sealed by this dire calamity. In fifteen minutes, or even in the twinkling of an eye in Abbeysan as it were a whole city full of sleeping people were plunged into the jaws of a sudden death without evening without even awakening to realize what was upon. Fine residences shared the fate of the most humble buildings of the poor. Even buildings devoted to business, churches, markets ships in the river harbors of the city, all were consumed by the ruthless rain of fire hurled by the explosion or shaken down into ruins by the shocks."

"The awful news of the overwhelming disaster had come as a shock to the whole world," said Angelina Jones. "In my trips back from the disaster zone to find my way back to the Christian lines, I observed bulletins in all the places I passed, through being surrounded by great masses of people, desperate in their efforts to obtain the very latest reports. I know they were among many of the friends and people who had stricken friends and relatives of all kinds in the stricken region, and they were kept in suspense as to their fate. Every where I went I heard them speak of the terrible calamity with bated breath, and I saw that in the towns committees of relief were being formed. As we continued on, through other towns the magnitude of the disaster grew from day to day, and every fresh report added to the horror already experienced, and it was made very clear to even me by girl and boy companions that many hundreds of thousands of inhabitants had been swept out of existence by flood and explosion. We had our experience in Abbeville but we said nothing. We believed they would think we were crazy if we said we came out of Abbeville alive, after what they read of the fate of the city."

He began to realize that Abbeville was indeed the scene of the most tremendous explosions, whose consequences had terrified the whole section of Abbeville for over fifteen minutes, and indeed he realized the disaster culminated in a series of explosions which indeed was a most devastating and far reaching cataclysm, no explosion of any volcano ever reaching such a maximum, he knew now that in Adelaide fifty thousand people had been buried in a single moment, and ruin had been wrought throughout the whole state by the consequence. The explosions no doubt surely did vomit vast clouds of smoke and debris, which darkened the sky for an entire morning and spread over three hundred miles of land. The explosion even had as mentioned changed the configuration of the land, and sunk a whole country, and made cracks over the country side o for over five hundred miles.

ABOUT two hours and a half had passed, and what had once before been a narrow yellow canopy of blue northern Californian skies, was now a strongly grey um like that which heard deadlands on approaching thunderstorms, but the color also told that it was smoke. General Thomas, now Walter Starnung had lost himself in these woods during one of his scouting tours he had hummed softly to himself, and had thanked God that he was still alive, and had escaped two widely rushing wings of the worse and most terrific forest fires he had ever seen in his life, and which he declared to himself was worse, ten times worse than any Violet, and her sisters had ever observed. Whatever the blow might have been he did not know. Before leaving the army for the scouting trip to the city of Calverino he had blessed general Robert Vivian for detaching him to this most important military mission on which he had now been bent for four days before this adventure. At first he had been more than glad that he was traveling alone, and in the deep beautiful Mc-Hollister Woods, and thing that as he felt sure for many weeks his unusual adventure would carry him deeper and deeper into these beloved woods which he had long before desired to explore. Before being overtaken by the first rush of the maddened Red Plague he had made his morning coffee over a little bonfire of his own at the edge of the most magnificent Mc-Hollister River, with the green forest of fir and spruce and pine crowding like an inundation of walls on all sides of him, and for that the he had come to the bonfire for a hundred times that just then it had been a nice thing to be alone in the world, for he was on what his comrades, the generals themselves and the whole Anglinian and Abbeoninian armies and even the Vivian Girls called "a most hazardous undertaking, which they themselves were not in favor of, especially in these terrible days when the war itself was growing insane."

"If anything happens to me through the army, accident, or forest fire," Walter Starring had said to himself, "There would not be any one to notify except the military and the Vivian Girls if necessary. My father and mother had died at the hands of such Glandolphins, a long time ago, then again."

One of the very tender himself knows, Walter Starring was never a man who talked very much about himself, and also never liked anyone to talk about his or even give him praise, not even from the superintendent general Vivian himself or others not even from the Vivian girls, yet there was not a zo soldier in any army who knew him who did not love and respect general Walter Starring, and the whole nation and all the generals placed their confidence in him and talked of him as one of the best men since in the whole christian army next to the members of the "Comdine. General Vivian knew much about en Walter Starring, which he might have told, but he and his friends kept it to themselves for they too knew as they sensed the shoredness of it. Even it may be said that even Walter Starring did not know that the secrets that he never spoke of to any one was known to general Vivian and his staff, and also to Violet, and her sisters.....

Of that too he had been thinking of, even while fleeing across streams and swimming over and across small lakes while in his desperate flight before the branch of the great fire. It was the thing which first of it, had driven him to do his great scouting and spying work. It might have twisted and disrupted the earth under his feet for a time, but nevertheless it had brought about results. For he had come to love his country and Country in its time of distress and with a passionate devotion. He also in a way still more adored God. And it also seemed to him that the time had never been when he had lived any other life than this while scouting and spying under the open skies of a clear day. But to my under smoke clouded skies was a different matter and an unusual one. When he first came to know Violet and her sisters he had been thirteen years old and now he was fifteen or a little over. A newly made member of the Company through their effort and designs he was now as good as any of the members. But he was not always a good natured officer. Above all else he was unusually severe in his nature, even worse when he made prisoners of the Glandolinians, and he was a lover of his adventures no matter how thrilling they might be. He was a great worshipper of God and His Blessed Trinity, and his devotion to the Blessed Mother and the saints was unusual so that the Vivian Girls looked upon him as a fighting Saint. He was also a worshipper at the shrine of Gods own Crucifixion Calvaryish country, so onward before the fiercely advancing forest fire he had fled, deep into the smoke laden wilderness of the Mc-Hollister Run eighty miles north of Evangeline St. Claire, sometimes congratulating himself on the present effort of his escape being a success though for hours the fire was always within great nearness in his rear and from even that distance of eleven miles the heat from the conflagration was suffocating and a great wind was blowing. A hundred and sixty miles further on he knew was the main sweep of the great forest fire burning of a course of many miles unknown to him, and sweeping through valley and up slopes of ridges like a great adze advancing hall, and the city of Fort Mic-Hollester as it is generally known was in its path, while another main branch of the fire and the general one which was darkening the skies over hundreds of miles of country was two hundred miles beyond that, and he had heard that the city of Gainer was being destroyed, and still beyond that the main northern branch of the great Red Plague was sweeping like a fire hurricane across the Mic-Hollester Run, extending to extend its full length of fifteen hundred mile trail to the western sea. He was unusually surprised and apprehensive, for there seemed to be no end to this world of forest fires to him. He was glad there were few towns or people in its path, for all people of his own side who were so righteous he loved. That hour ago while fleeing the secondary branch he had looked out on the river, as a number of boats looked out on the river as a number of boat loads had forged up against the stream, all loaded with men going somewhere to aid other rangers to fight the terrible Red Plague.

The boats were large and there were six rowers in each boat, twenty men to one boat. They towed smaller ones which had their fighting apparatus in them. They were quiet. Their clothing was wet showing what nature of a fight they were going to put up. They rowed swiftly like Vikings, and to him they were the appearance of fire fighting demons of another world. He had watched them until they had gone upstream far beyond eye sight, and then he had halted to view which way the swing of the fire was making. And Walter Starring felt the thrill and excitement of those hours, when strong men were coming from everywhere to try and overcome the Red Plague, and when the smoke clouds in the sky darkened far the landscapes of fair Calvernia like a ugly as a red hot iron, when out of the deep wilderness, threaded by the branches of the Mic-Hollester Run came a adventure and courage, and red blooded fire fighters. He felt sure he was north of Evangeline St Claire city, yet he wondered why he heard a strange rumbling and roaring sound in that direction. Maybe it was the noise of the forest fire. Yatsoon would be fire now that way also, for at night the distant black blaze reddened the trail toward that city. It was the fires triumphant—at the edge of a Calvernian Eden, the northern fire also victorious, and yet apparently paying its tribute. For at the northern end were battling it along a stretch of many miles, the 100,000 fighters of all kinds, added by the four hundred rangers, with all the effort behind them giving lives blood and labor that a holy land will be preserved from total forest destruction.

Walter Starring had thought of these things that hour ago of swift flight through blazing brush and ground fires, as he now crossed by wading and swimming a narrow section of one of the rivers smaller branches known as the Krimine. From down the other nearest branches, the St Ann and San Pedro, the Red Plague had been sweeping in ravaging fury, since the first signs of it three days ago. The Red Plague here was a seething inferno. Steadily week, after week, the northern stretches of these woods had been consumed by the Fire Plague, while elsewhere through long months of summer and winter of the year before and now, in millions of sections of the country and other states, fires of all kinds, the Red Plague, explosions and floods and so on had run rampant, while in every city and town, and in the story of these terrible plagues of disasters brought on by a terrible foe had been written as Calvernia's fate. A story of the triumph of Glandelinia by means of disasters. A story of tears, a story of unspeakable millions, of hunger, disease, and drownings, of quick or slow death, a story of countless strong men and women, and helpless children and babes in arms living in the faith of the Grand old Catholic Church with the best blood of Abbeinnia still surviving in their veins even though they were reeking in Calvernia being wiped out in floods and unspeakable disasters which astonished the world.

Walter Starring knew that through those same winter and summer months, the greatest learned men of Abbeinnia had been having investigations made for the cause of such awful disaster plagues. Now the hundred and fifty miles of trail and roads and railroad lines between Evangeline St Claire and Pandora City, the only only door that opened to Calvernia without being in a possession of the foe, were now packed hard by thousands of men, putting up a desperate fight against an enormous forest conflagration, that for other fires in the past year was as a world conflagration compared to mere bonfires.

In competition fought the rangers of the forests. It was believed the fire started with the late July disasters of flood and explosion, sweeping a domain reaching from Evangeline St Claire regions to the Calvernian sea coast. Freight that grew more precious with each mile it had advance down streams, and which must reach the beginning of the waterway was in the path of the Red Plague.

How the fire started no one could tell, but it started before the battle of Evangeline St Claire as said before. The fire storm was at full sweep by now. Yet in temperature that almost scorched men lungs the men and rangers did not cease their fighting against it. But then there was no let up in the furious rush of flames heading on toward the cities of Edmonder, Winnie, and Mot or went rose, and other points across the river. This fire fighting which Walter Starring knew of was no effort of philanthropy. These men cared not whether the fires went on ahead or not, whether the fires destroyed all the forests or not so far as destruction of woods was concerned. But too many towns lay in the path of the Red Plague, and unless the fire was checked or put under control, there would not be any checking of the world's greater fire disaster on record. go the awful pendulum swinging touching on the one side, horror disaster and devastation of war and its disasters, on the other great loss of lives and property, heat and hardship, deep fire mucks blazing forests for hundreds and hundreds of miles, and skies darkened with smoke and flaming waters blown by great winds, with many refugees fleeing in all directions. Now now in this second late portion of the war, the glory of a brave nation was at hand, and even wilderness town people were coming up with all kinds of weapons and materials to meet and fight the Red Plague. Many branches of the Mic-Hollester Run were athrill with the wild amulesead fire fighting battles. Countless droves of on all fire fighters went on into the wilderness, countless boats drove past the slower and lighter we scow bridges, huge ships with two rows of oars heaved up toward the conflagration tightly wove cribs of timber, and giant rafts made of many cribs were ready for their long drift with fire fighting materials into the forest fire regions.

Out on this hundreds of miles of waterway threatened by gigantic fire storms a world of fire was gathering like an enormous red hot storm. It was a fire swept mile of the Calvernian Country, and each post and gathering place along its length was turned into a mob of fire fighters, splendid with the strength and bravery of Red blood, clear eyes, and souls that always read the World of God in every position possible way even in wind and tree, and battle and war disaster horrors.

But it was an hour ago that Walter Starring had vividly pictured these things to himself close to the big river, while watching the far distant fire and the enormous cumulus clouds of rolling black clouds of smoke forming into mushroom rolling thunderheads and even other shapes, and many things may always happen in the sixty minutes that follow any given minute in any mans life.

When he first started on his way hisone great purpose was the same as the Vivian Girls, it was to bring back information why the enemy created all these horrib horrible disaster, and impossible to bring back the man who knew of it dead or alive, for the enemy surely was responsible for this terrible Red Forest Plague, who had for the last year destroyed countless lives, many towns and immense valuable forests and farm lands and plains of high grass in a blind scorching passion of demon vengeance. For the last year it had been thought that even because of war such forest fires could not even exist. But now the evidence was finally observed. Fire was raging in many sections of the country and also in the state of Angolinia. People by hundreds of thousands had fled before them or witnessed them from afar. Fast always followed rumor. The existence of the most tremendous forest fires became a certainty. Therefore the military law took up once more a hazardous trail, and following on the course of so many other tremendous disasters, Walter Starring was the spy it sent.

"Get the information or bring back the man who knows of the cause of such disasters dead or alive." were general Vivians last words, and backed by the impatient words of Gertrude Angeline and Violet and her sisters, so then to help him went on the same quest as told before but in an entirely different direction.....

And now thinking of that parting injunction, Walter Starring grinned or smiled, even as the sweat of heat and death damped his face and body in the heat of the far distant forest fires. For at the end of the so two hours hours and a half that passed since his escape from the two branches of the pursuing fires, the unexpected happened, like a thunderbolt out of the smoke clouded skies. At this time if I have to tell it Walter Starring was huddled behind a rock, not hardly any larger than his own body, and he was groveling in the hot white sand of the river shore like a small bird making or trying to make a nest for its eggs, and as he did so Starring told himself all this without any reservation. He was as he could have really said in an awful fix. And he had nothing to cover his head for a bullet had swept his hat from his head, and his black hair was filled with sand and dirt. He was sweating all over mainly because of the heat of the atom atmosphere. But nevertheless his blue eyes were alight with a grin sort of humor, though he knew that unless the ammunition of the other party ran low he was going to be a dead man. For the two hundred and twentieth time in as many minutes the general had looked about him. He found himself directly in the center of a flat area of sand and river shore gravel. One hundred and fifty feet from him the wide river passed on swiftly. Two hundred and fifty feet on the opposite side of him was the dark green wall of the fire massed forest.

geon wall of the fire menaced forest. The thin wisps of smoke playing in it seemed to him like laughter now a whimsical sort of strange merriment roused by the sheer enormity of the strange joke that which had seemed to inflict upon him. Between the great river and the trees mostly balsam and spruce also fir was only the low rock behind which he was now crouching like some small animal seeing a wolf and therefore afraid to rush out into the open even for escape. And to make matters worse his rock shelter was a mere upjutting of the solid floor of the shale that was under him. The river wash sand that now covered it like a carpet was not more than four or five inches deep, and at a point where he saw it more extensive and deeper a sensation of some kind told him the sand stretch was a dangerous bog. Therefore he could not dig in, and he was even dangerously close to the edge of the quicksand. There was not even enough of his shelter and not even enough of the quicksand within reach to scrape up to pile near his rock for a protection. And his enemy who ever it was, was more than a hundred yards or so away, nay it was more than one enemy, and who ever they were, they were most determined, and the deadliest shots he had ever known. Eight times Walter Starring had made experiments to prove this, for he had in mind a sudden rush to the shelter of the distant timber, rather to face the forest fire than be shot at like this. Three times he had raised the crown of his large hat slightly above the top of the rock, and three times the marksmanship of either one of his hidden enemies had put a little hole through it with neatness and dispatch. The third bullet had carried his hat a dozen or so feet away. Even whatever he happened to show a patch of his clothing a bullet replied with unerring precision. Four times they had drawn blood. And the humor now faded out of Starring's eyes.

Not long ago he had exulted and had been thrilled in the bigness of the scenes of raging forest fires so close to him, and where strong men of both sides met hand to hand and eye to eye in battles and skirmishes. There were the other kind also in it, the sort that made his profession of man hunting a thing of real reality and danger, but he always expected these in spying and scouting trips-- forgot them-- when the fire through the wilderness itself filled his vision. But his present situation was something unlike anything that had ever happened in his previous experience with Glandelinians. Throughout his services in the war up to now he had faced many kinds of danger. He had fought with Glandelinian scouting parties, prowling spies and child stagers. There were any times when he had almost been killed. The leader of a Glandelinian scouting party who had raided many a Christian wagon train of provisions, had come nearest to trapping him and putting him out of his misery. This Glandelinian raider had been a desperate man and had few scruples. But even this Glandelinian officer would not have cornered a man with such blood-dripping unfairness as Walter Starring found himself cornered now. He also had no longer a doubt as to what was in the others' mind. He felt sure his enemies were not shooting at him to wound, and make merely a helpless wreck out of him. It was absolutely to kill. And it was not difficult to prove this. And this he did by a test. Careful not to expose a part of his arm or shoulder he drew a white handkerchief from his pocket, fastened it to the end of his rifle, and half the flag of surrender three feet above the rock. And then he had with equal caution slowly thrust up a flat piece of shale, which at a distance of a hundred yards might appear as his shoulder or even his head. But scarcely was it four inches above the top of the rock before there came the report of a rifle, and the shale was splintered into a hundred bits. This proved his enemies were even tighter. The accuracy of the marksmanship of the others was appalling. He knew that if he exposed a part of himself for an instant to use his own rifle or the heavy automatic in his holster he would be a dead man before he could cross a trigger. And that time he felt equally sure would come sooner or later. His muscles were growing cramped. He could not double himself up like a four-bladed jackknife forever behind the altogether inefficient shelter of the rock.

His executioners no doubt as he observed from the puff of smoke were hidden in the edge of the timber, and not directly opposite him either, but nearly a hundred and fifty or more yards downstream south of the distant forest fires. Nearly a hundred times he had wondered exceedingly why the Glandelinian fiends with the rifles did not stealthily creep up through the timber, and take good open pot shots directly at him from the good and vantage point which lay at the end of a very straight and direct line between his rocky shelter and the nearest trees. For he knew from that angle he was not able to properly shelter himself and his enemies could really get him. But the snipers who were more than a hundred yards or so below had not moved a foot from the ambush since one of them fired the first shot. And that had come when Walter Starring was crossing the bog so close to where he was threading. The string of the bullet had left a singing sensation at his left temple--half an inch or more to the right and it would have surely killed him. But swift as the shot itself, he had dropped behind the only one protection at hand, and this was the sheltering rock. For more than three hours he had been making efforts to wiggle himself free from his bulky shoulder pack without exposing himself to a coup-de-grace. At last to his joy after a more desperate effort he had got the main thing off. It was a tremendous relief when he thrust it out beside the rock, almost doubling the size of his small shelter. Instantly there came the crash of six bullets into it, and then some more: He heard the rattle of pans and wondered if his skillet would be any good after to day, and whether he would have anything to drink left. But for the first time he was able to wipe the sweat from his face, and then to stretch himself. And also now he could think. Walter Starring as he always does possessed an unalterable faith in the infallibility of the mind, which he always believed was better in all cases than the best of rifles. Now that he was completely at more ease he began reassembling his scattered mental faculties. Who were these strangers who were sniping at him so treacherously and which such deadly aim and hatred from the ambush? Who in the world were they and? Another crash of lead in tines tinware and steel put an unusual and very unpleasant sensation and also emphasis to the question. One of these shots was so close to his head, that it made him wince, came now with a wide area within reach about him--he began desperately scrambling up the sand for an added protection. There came a long and tiresome silence after that third clatter of distress from his cooking utensils. To Walter Starring, even in his long hours of most deadly peril, there was something about it that for some moments brought back the glow of humor in his eyes. It was hot sweltering hot in that a packet of sand, and the fire of the blazing forest was sending sweltering fads that made it very uncomfortable for him, and sometimes as far away as the great forest fire was he fancied he saw clouds of flame reach almost straight overhead, and it was growing a twilight darkness. He could have tossed a pebble to where a bright eyed Galverinian Toucan was cackling itself backward and forward in its strange jerky movements accompanied by friendly little chirping noises, the strange singing and ad scraping of the long bill these birds usually do when singing.

Everything about him seemed friendly and he did not seem at all to have any fear of the distant forest fires. The river rippled and murmured in strange bubbling song just beyond the yellow throated Toucan. Just beyond him. On the other side the still closer forest though smoke wrapped like a thin fog, was a strange seemingly hidden region instead of a paradise of shade and contentment it would have otherwise been if it was not for the forest fire smoke gloom, and outside of the strange fearless little Toucan it was devoid of hidden and bird life as everything had fled before the Red Plague. Outside of the singing of the Toucan he could not even hear the beautiful twittering of the birds which he loved so well. The Toucan now fluttered up to the end of a silvery birch limb, and it seemed now to Walter that its yellow throat must surely burst with the burden of its song and its body swelled in and out with its effort. The little fellows black body, scarcely smaller than a rabbit some times seemed to swell in and out in his effort to vanquish all other song.

"Go to it Toucan" chuckled Walter Starring. "Go to it. But better beat it before the forest fires consume you."

The little Toucan that he might have crushed between his two hands gave him a lot of courage. Then the beautiful bird suddenly stopped to regain its breath. In that interval Walter starrng listened to the more stranger noises deeper and deeper in the forest. Strangely crouched on chronic sounds of winds they were over without a break in the noise. And these surely were bloody war days. That was the odd thought that came to Walter Starring as he lay half on his face, his fingers slowly and cautiously working a loop hole between his shoulder pack, and the rock shelter. The air was growing hotter. These were awful war days, all up and down the big rivers, where now no matter where they may be no man or woman sang for joy, and where no children now layed played, and who could be forgetful of the long hard days of the winter last year when the war for a time threatened to be wildest. And in forest, plain, and swamp, was this spirit of grim war also devastating the land. It was supposed to be the mating season of all feathered things. But there was no sound, which usually is heard from countless nests, the peeps and twitters of a new life, no mothers of the first born were seen anywhere teaching their bird children to fly, even though the dora of Nature school stood wide open. But the beautiful Toucan songster at the end of his birch twig alone seemed to proclaim his own joy over something, and appeared to challenge all the world to beat him in his auditions.

Walter Starring found that he could hear between his pack, and the rock to where the Toucan was again singing, and where his mysterious Glandelinian enemies lay waiting for the opportunity to kill him. Even if the slightest movement betrayed his loophole his minutes were unnumbered. But it was taking a chance, for he had worked cautiously and carefully an inch at a time, and was confident that the beginning of his effort to fight back was up to the present moment not discovered by the Glandelinians. He believed also that he was sure where the ambushers were concealed. In the edge of a low hanging mass of fir and balsam was a fallen evergreen lying close to another quicksand bog. From behind the butt of that pine, he was sure the number of shots had come.

And now he was even still more cautious than before as he began to slowly work the muzzle of his rifle through the loophole. As he did this he was thinking of some hidden Glandelinian spies or agents. And yet almost as quickly as this suspicion took possession of him, he told himself that the thing was utterly impossible. It could not be any kind of a glandelinian, or any of the scouting parties behind the imeloc log. The idea was inconceivable indeed, when he considered how very carefully and hidden the secret of his mission had been kept before him. He had not even said good bye to any of his best friends not even the Vivian girls, leaving by the rear of the lines as if he was only deserting. And because he was after information concerning the great war disasters of last year and this, he was stalking his prey out of uniform and totally disguised as an idiot. Surely, and positively there had not been anything to betray him. Besides the nearest Glandelinian army must at least be more than fifty or more miles away, unless something had tempted the rebel generals to come up the river to rescue general Federal.

And now even more cautiously, than he had made the tiny opening, he slowly began to work the muzzle of his long rifle through the loophole. If he used logic at all there was but one conclusion for him to arrive at. The assailants might have been or were some clever Glandelinian agents who might have shadowed him all the way up here up here through forest fire and peril.

A nother ad series of smashing captions among his comestibles, and other possessions, came to drive home the fact that even that part of the situation was absolute out of the question.

Whoever were the snipers, had small contents or small respects for his persons entirely, and yet his enemies surely were not in grievous need or a good gun or even ammunition or the contents of his pack. They could not even be vandals. A sticky mess a condensed cream was running over Walter's hand, and this made him doubt if there was a whole tin in his kit. Therefore he lay very quietly for fully two minutes on his face after probably the one hundred and fourth shot. His eyes were now turned toward the river, and on the far side, more than a quarter of a mile away, a number of boats were moving swiftly up the swift current of the stream. They were driven by motors. The smoke almost shrouded them in a heavy veil at times. Across the water came an unintelligible shout in response to the rifle shots. It therefore occurred to Walter, that he might make a trumpet of his hands, and shout back as loudly as he could, but then he realized the distance was too great for his even loud voice to carry its message for help. And besides now that he had the added protection of the pack he felt a certain sense of humiliatlon at the thought of showing the white feather. And also if a few moments more would make things come all right and good, and all went well, he himself would settle for the enemies behind the long log...

However he continued the very slow operation of working his rifle barrel between the pack and the rock. The Toucan had discovered him however, and for some reason or other seemed very interested in the operation. It therefore left the birch branch alighted to the ground and came a score of feet nearer, and was perking its head and snatching on its short legs as it watched with inquisitive inspection the unusual manifestation of strange life behind the rock. It a strange note had changed to an occasional sharp and querulous cry. Walter of course wanted very badly to wring its neck. These cries of the bird might have told the other fellows in that he was still living and moving. It seemed an age before his rifle was through, and every minute he expected another volley of shots. He therefore flattened himself out in the fashion of an Indian, and sighted most carefully along the barrel. He also was positive that his enemies were watching, yet he could not make out anything that looked like even a single head anywhere along the log. At one end was a clump of deeper foliage. He was sure he saw a sudden slight movement there, and in the thrill of the moment was tempted to sent a bullet into the heart of it. But he saved his cartridge. The reason was because he felt that if he fired only once--and missed--the advantage of his unsuspected loophole would surely be gone. It would also be transformed into a deadly menace. Even as it was, the next bullet of one of his enemies should enter that way. He felt the strong discomfort of the thought, and in spite of himself a great tremor of apprehension ran up his spine. He now even felt a greater desire to wring the neck of the inquisitive Toucan. The creature had circled squarely in front of him, and stood there tilting its short black back tail, and bobbing its head as if its one insane desire was to look down the length of his rifle barrel. The bird was giving him away. If any of the enemies was only half as clever as his marksmanship was good--))))))--Suddenly every nerve in Walter's body tightened. He was positive he had caught sight of the outline of a human head and shoulders in the foliage. His fingers pressed gently against the trigger of his musket. Before he breathed again he would have fired. But a shot from the foliage beat him out by the fraction of a fraction of one second. In that precious time lost, his enemy's bullet entered the edge of his kit-----and came through. He felt the shock of it, and in the space between the physical impact, and the mental effect of shock his brain told him the horrible thing he dreaded had happened. It was his head, his face. It seemed to him as if he had suddenly hurled his face and head suddenly into the hottest water, and that what was left of his skull, was filled with the rushing and roaring of a great flood. He staggered up, clutching his face with both hands. Then the world about him appeared to be twisted and black, a dizzily revolving thing--yet his still fighting mental vision pictured clearly for him a monstrous bulging eyed Toucan bigger than a mountain. Then he toppled back on the white sand, his arms flung out limply and he lay with his face turned toward the direction, wherein one of his murderers lay.

As he fell his body then lay very clear of the rock, and his pack, but never theless there came no other shot from the thick clump of pine. Nor for a time did any one show himself. The Toucan a bit startled at this sudden change in the deportment of his friend behind the shoulder of rock had flown up to a high tree top, making a terrible racket. And it was this racket that roused Walter staring to the fact that he was not dead. And it was a discovery that thrilled him, that, and the fact that he made out clearly a patch of sunlight in the sky, or was it the gleam of approaching fire, as it still seemed also very dark. However he did not move, but opened his eyes wider. He could see the blur of the timber through the smoke. On a straight line with his vision was the thick clump of all various pines. And as he looked some foliage at some distance parted, and a figure came out. Walter drew in a deep breath, and finding that did not hurt him, he gripped the fingers of the hand that was under his body, and they closed on the butt of his service automatic. He would win yet against the assassin if god gave him life a few minutes longer.

His enemy advanced slowly. As he slowly drew near, Walter closed his eyes more and more. He must keep them shut, and he must pretend to be dead, when the other came up. Then when the second bullet put down his gun, as he naturally would--his chance would be at hand. But if a quiver of his eyes betrayed him-----He closed them tight. But again dizziness began to creep over him, and the fire in his brain grew hot once more even hotter. He then heard the faint sound of footsteps unlike that of a man and softer, and they stopped in the sand close beside him. Then he heard a human voice. It did not speak in words, but gave utterance to a strange and unnatural cry, and sounded more like a child's than an adult's. With a mighty effort Walter assembled his last strength. It seemed that he brought himself up quickly, but nevertheless his movement was slow, even most painful-----like the efforts of a man who might be already breathing his last.

The automatic hung limply in his hand, its muzzle pointing to the sand. He looked up trying to swing into action, that apparently dreadful weight of the weapon. And then suddenly from his very own lips, even in his utter physical condition, fell a cry of surprise wonder and amazement.

His enemy stood there in the glare of distant fires, staring down at him with big dark blue eyes that were filled with horror. They were not the eyes of a man, neither that of a boy or woman. Walter staring in this most astounding moment of his life found himself looking up into the face of Angelina Aronburg herself. And in her possession was a rifle. She had shot him.

For a matter of over over thirty minutes or more--may to Walter Starring it appeared even longer--the life of these very two seemed to express a most vivid and unforgettable tableau. One half of it that Walter saw--the thickly smoke covered sky, the dazzling bright flames far distant and apparently near, the little girl in between. The pistol had dropped from his limp hand, and then the weight of his body tottered on the crook of his under elbow. Then mentally and physically he was on the point of collapse, and yet in those few moments every detail of the picture was painted with a brush of fire in his brain. The girl wore a large round hat. Yet her face just now was as white as no other face he had ever seen/ living or dead, and to him as he had observed her eyes were like pools that had caught the reflection of some kind of a fire, he saw the golden sheen of her hair, the poise of her slender body--its shock, its stupefaction, and horror. He even sensed these things without without doubt even as his brain wobbled dizzily, and then the larger part of the picture began to fade out of his vision.

But her face remained to the last. It even grew clearer like some strange kind of a cameo framed in some iris, a beautiful, staring horrified face, with shimmering golden tresses blowing about it like a golden veil. He noticed the hair, that was partly undown undone and not in curls as if she had been in a struggle of some sort, or had been running fast against the strongest hot breeze that came up the river. Maybe too she was a fugitive of the forest fire. He fought with himself desperately to hold that picture of her, then to utter some word, and make some movement. But the power to see, and even to live died out of him. He sank g back with a queer sound in his throat. He did not even hear the answering sound or cry from the little girl as she flung herself down with a quick little prayer to God for help on her knees in the soft white sand close beside him. He did not even feel the slightest movement when she tried hard with all her little strength to raise his head in her arms, and with her bare hand brushed back his sand littered hair, revealing where the bullet had struck him. Then the first sensation that came suddenly to him was a cool and comforting something, that began to trickle over his burning temples and his face. He could not tell whether it was water or air. But he was water, and subconsciously he felt sure of that, and in the same way he began to think, even though it was very hard, desperately hard to pull his thoughts together. For some reason or other they apparently persisted in hopping about, like a lot of crazily moving, obscene objects in a dance, and just as he almost got hold of one, and reached for another, the first would slip quickly out of his reach. He began to get the best of them after a time, and he had a strong desire to say something. But his eyes and lips seemed to be sealed tighter than ever, but later however came the beginning of light, and a flash of consciousness. The little girl was working over him, he knew that for he could feel her and her movements and sense them. Then finally he heard a voice close over him saying something in a sobbing whisper or monotone which he could not understand. After a desperate and most mighty effort he finally managed to open his eyes. "Thank God and His Blessed Mother you live sir!" he faintly heard the voice say, as if coming from a long distance away. "You'll live. You'll live." "Trying to" he mumbled thickly, slowly, feeling a sense of great elation. "Trying."

He wanted to curse the light for leaving him, for deserting him, for as soon as she was through, his eyes and his lips shut tight again, or at least he thought they did. But nevertheless he began to sense things in a most curious and strange sort of way. He believed some one was slowly dragging him. If not why did he feel the grind and screech of sand under his body. But he also sensed the intervals when the dragging operation paused. And then after a very long time he seemed to, or fancied he heard more than one voice. There were two, three, four--sometimes a murmur of them. Then odd visions came to him. He seemed to see a girl with shining golden hair, and darker eyes, and then swiftly she would change into a number of girls, and boys, with hair neither black, brown, or like blazing gold. Then there was a different girl. He sensed all were pretty and sober especially his twisted mind would call them together.

The second vision that he saw was like a radiant bit of the sun, her hair all aflame with the fire of it, and her face a different sort of face. He was always glad they remained close to him. Maybe he was dying, and angels were coming to claim him or his soul.

To Walter Starring, this most interesting and happy experience in his life night had occurred an hour a month, or a year for that matter. He seemed to have had a most indefinite association with the beautiful Fairies. He felt sure he had known them a long time, had seen them somewhere else before, that he surely knew them a very long time and very intimately, it seemed. Yet he had no memory of the long fight, in the hot sand, or of the river, or of his flight before forest fires, or of the inquisitive Toucan that had so unconsciously marked out the line, which his enemy's last bullet had traveled. He felt sure he had entered into a new world in which everything was vague and absolutely unreal, except those visions of beautiful children about with their pale beautiful faces. Several times more he fancied he saw them with marvelous clearness and each time he drifted away into absolute darkness as black as ink, with the sound of a voice growing fainter and fainter in his ears.

Then for the soldier came a long period of time of utter chaos, and worse than that, of soundless gloom. He fancied or dreamed he was in a large dark ravine or pit in the forest, where even his subconscious self was almost dead under a crushing oppression. At last a red glow began to glimmer in this pit or ravine, a glow pale and indistinct, and a long distance away. But it increased and crept steadily up and forward, through the awful eternity of intense darkness, and the nearer it came, the less there was of the blackness of the dreadful "night." (Unconscious still) From a glow it grew into a flaming sea, and with the rush of two flaming seas came a sudden dawn. In that dawn he heard the singing of a bird, and stranger still the bird seemed to be low but above his head. When Walter Starring opened his eyes, and also understanding returned to him, he found himself under the silver birch, upon which had been perched the Toucan.

For a long while he did not ask himself how he had come there, nay nay he was not able to, or able to comprehend it. For a long time in a half dazed manner he looked steadily at the river before him and the wide strip of sand. He noticed that across the river on the opposite side were the rock and his dunsmack pack. Also his rifle. Then instinctively his eyes turned to the fir ambush further down. That too was in a shroud of smoke now. But where he lay or sat, or stood, he was not at all positively sure what he was doing right at that moment, it was not so shocking with smoke and not quite warm as elsewhere. The green of the cedar and spruce and balsam and other fir and pine was close about him inset with the silver and gold of the thickly leafed birch. After some moments he discovered that someone had bolstered him up against a spruce sapling. Between these two especially where his head rested, was a high pile of soft moss freshly torn from the earth. And within close reach of him was his own kit piled filled with clear and sparkling water. He was very cautious and careful, as he moved himself forward, and then he slowly and almost painfully raised his head to his head. His fingers came in contact with a bandage. For four minutes or six even after that he sat without moving, while his amazed senses seized upon the strangeness and significance of it all. In the first place he knew for certain that he was either still alive or had died, and was in another world. But even this fact of realizing after all he was living was less remarkable, than the other things that he began to realize had happened. He remembered the final moments of the strange and unequal duel. It was astonishing for a former and best friend of his was Angeline Arnburg or as she is called, Gertrude Angeline. Moreover after she had blown away a part of his head, and had laid him helpless in the sand, and dangerously close to a treacherous sand bog of unfathomable depth,--she had, in place of finishing him there--dragged him to this nook, and tied up his shoulder. It was hard for him to believe, but the ball of water, the moss behind his shoulders, the bandage, and certain visions that were reforming themselves in his brain convinced him. A girl friend had shot him. And surely she had worked like the fiends to kill him. And afterwards she had saved him. He grinned as another realization came to him. Before he left camp he had met her and she told him she was going forth to trail a glandelinian spy who had escaped her and to kill him for shooting her two months ago and swiping her plans. He grinned. It was final proof that his mind had not been playing tricks on him. No one but a real spy would have been quite so unreasonable. A real foe not making a mistake would have completed the job. In the dark and mark of the forest fire, she had at that distance mistaken him for that enemy.

He now began to look for her up and down the white strip of sand, but he saw nothing but the smoke mark like a gray fog. And then in looking elsewhere he saw the very Toucan perched on his or on the toe of his shoe looking carefully and attentively at him. He chuckled at its nerve, for now he was exceedingly comfortable, and also as exhilaratingly happy to know that the incident so far was over and he was not dead. If the Toucan had been a man, he would have been willing to shake hands with him. For after all if it had not been for the bird getting squarely in front of him, and giving him away, there might have been a more horrible end to it all. He shuddered as he thought of the mighty effort he had made to fire the shot into the heart of the fir bush--and perhaps into the heart of Gertrude Angeline.

He reached for the pail, and drank deeply of the water in it. He was surprised to observe he felt no pain. His dizziness was gone, and his mind had grown suddenly clear and alert. But the warmth of the water told him almost instantly that it had been taken from the river some time ago. He had observed the change in color of sky and shadows. With the instinct of a man trained to note details he nulled out his watch. It was almost seven o'clock in the evening. More than five hours had passed since the Toucan had got in front of his gun. He did not attempt to rise to his feet but scanned with slower and more careful scrutiny the edge of the smoke smudged forest, and the river. He had been mystified while bringing for his life behind the rock, but he was infinitely more so now than before. Never before had he any greater desire than this which thrilled him in these present minutes of his readjustment--desire for the return of the girl scout and her companions again. And then all at once there came back to him a mental flash of the other girls. He remembered as if something was returning to him after a dream, how the strange and whimsical twistings of his sick brain had made him see three or four faces instead of one, three girls, and some boys. Yet he knew that the first picture of his mysterious assailant, the picture painted in his brain, when he tried to raise his pistol was the right one. He had seen her dark blue eyes glow, he had seen the bright sheen of her golden hair rippling in the wind, he had seen the white pallor in her face, the slowness of her as she stood over him in horror and fear--he remembered even the clutch of her white hand at her throat. A moment before evidently mistaking him for the foe she was after she had tried to kill him. And then he had looked up and observed her like that. It surely must have been an unusual and uncomfortable trick in his brain that had seemed to flood the very skies with golden fire of her hair at those.

His eyes gradually followed a long furrow in the white sand, which led from where he sat bolstered against the tree, and under red now she put his across the river. He felt sure it was the trail trail made by his body, when she dragged him up to the shelter and coolness of the timber. One thing that Walter Starring did was to keep his weight no lower or higher than a hundred and seventy and therefore he wondered how she a little girl, had managed to drag up and rob probably across a long bridge of the river even so much as that of dead weight. But she had. But surely it had taken a great deal of effort. He could see very distinctly seven different places in the sand, where she had stooped to earn. Being also a new member of the Gemini, Walter Starring had already earned a reputation as the expert analyst of the main Abbeismian anomalies. In the most delicate matters it was never that general Vivian did not take him into consultation. Also he possessed an almost uncanny grip on the working process of a spy mind, and the first rule he had set down for himself, was to regard the acts of a commission rather than the one outstanding act of such a thing as a commission. But when he proved himself moved to himself that the chief actor in this drama was a chessmate. For him it was a very thrilling game. And he was surely was frankly puzzled now—until one and a half after the other—he added up the sum total of what had been omitted in this instance of his own personal adventure. Hidden in her an ambush the girl and her companions one probably who had shot him, had been in both purpose and act, determined to destroy him. Thinking he and act, determined to destroy him. Thinking he was a glandolinian who she had trailed through the burning woods. She had even disregarded the white flag with which she had pleaded for mercy. Her marksmanship was even of fiendish cleverness. Up to her last shot she had been, to all intent and purpose the avenger of her loss previously two months ago.

The change had come and the realization of her mistake, when she looked down upon him bleeding and helpless, in the sand. Undoubtedly she had thought he was dying. But why, when she saw his eyes open a little later, had she cried out her gratitude to God? What had worked the sudden transformation in her? Why had she labored all alone to save the life she had so strongly desired to end a number of hours before.

If his assailants had been Glandolinians, Walter Starring would have found an answer. And the chances were he might have been shot by the probably and Gertrude and others may have come to his rescue. Or it might have been a case of mistaken identification, or an error in visual judgement. Any one can easily make a mistake. But the fact that his analysis or in it he was dealing with a beautiful christian girl made his answer only partly satisfied. He could not forget the expression of her eyes, the beauty their horror, the way they had looked at him. It was as if a sudden revelation, had suddenly come over her, as if either looking down upon her own bleeding handwork or that of a glandolinian foe, the righteous soul in her had revolted, and with that revelation had either come repentance, and pity or pity and horror.

Yet this left him but two conclusions or three conclusions to choose from. Either she had made a mistake, and the girl had shown both horror, and desire to end when she discovered it, or maybe some one else had betrayed him in the heart of the white strip of sand or he had been ambushed by glandolinians who had trailed him from the camps and she and her followers coming upon the scene went to his rescue.

The time for the sun to be another hour lower in the sky had come, when Walter Starring assured himself in a series of cautious experiments, that he was not in a condition to stand upon his feet. Across the river was his pack, and in his pack, were a number of things he strongly desired—his blankets for instance, a steel mirror, and the thermometer in his medical kit. Also he was beginning to feel quite anxious about himself. There were sharp throbbing and stabbing pains back of his eyes, especially where the bullet had hit him. Also his face was becoming very hot, and he was surely developing an unhealthy thirst for water. He felt sure he was having either a fever, or the heat of the forest fire was increasing his misery, and which ever it was, he knew what heat of forest fires, or fever meant in this sort of thing, especially when he is alone. He had also given up hope of the return of the girl and her companions. And it was not reasonable to expect her to come back, after her going for assistance when probably assistance could not be gotten.

Of course she had bandaged him, bolstered him up, placed water beside him and then had probably been compelled to leave him for work out the rest of his salvation alone or maybe she had gone to get a boat. But why the devil did she first bring him across the river, and then not think of bringing him his pack.

He began to work himself toward the long footbridge on his hands and knees, slowly for he desired to obtain his pack or at least reach it. Suddenly he found that his slightest movement caused him pain, and that with this pain, if he persisted in movement, there was a sudden synchronous rise of nausea. Anyway the two seemed to work in a sort of unity. But his medicine case was very important.

Now, and his blankets and his rifle if he hoped to signal for help, that might chance to pass on the river. And what he feared was that the forest fire might come up to the spot where he was, and what could he do in his condition? A foot at a time, a word at a time he edged his way down toward the bridge and then he felt sure he was three hundred years in crossing it. But he got across, but it was torture. Then he added his way down into the sand toward where his pack was. His fingers dug into the footprints of the mysterious gun girl. He approved of their childish size. They were small and narrow, scarcely longer than the shoe prints of a ten year old girl—and they were made of flat shoes than those with high heels. It seemed an interminable time to him after leaving the long bridge before he reached his pack. When he got there a heavy pendulum seemed swinging back and forth inside his head, beating against his skull. He lay down with his pack for a pillow, intending to rest for a time. But the very small minutes and even moments began to quickly add themselves one on top of the other and gradually passed into hours. Whether the sun slanted behind the smoke clouds or not he was not sure but nevertheless it was growing warmer, very warm, and close, while now within him he was becoming consumed by a burning thirst, and it seemed a drink of ice cold water alone would relieve him. Nevertheless despite the noise of other sounds far away he could distinctly hear the ripple of running water, seemingly the laughter of it among the shore pebbles a few yards away. Then the river water itself became even more desirable than even his medicine case, his blankets, his rifle or whatever else he would desire. The very song of it above other sounds, invited and tempted him, bloated out all thoughts and desires of other things far from his mind. Therefore with all his strength he continued his journey, even despite the apparent swing of the pendulum in his head becoming harder but the sound, sound of the river coming nearer, and nearer. At last he came to the wet sand, and fell on his face and took deep draughts of the water. Then after he drank his full share he felt no desire whatever to go back, at least he felt too weak to even try it. Therefore he slowly rolled himself over, so that his face was turned up to the sky. Under him the wet sand was soft, and despite the warmth of the atmosphere it was comfortably cool. After a time he felt more relief and ambition and the fire in his head died out. He could hear now sounds in the distant forest, not evening sounds but the noise of far distant crackling of fire. Then there was a crash not so far distant, and he felt sure it might be some animal fleeing to the edge of the wide river to escape the "Red Plague", or perhaps it was a deer or a bear fleeing before it. The sky along the whole horizon was becoming lighted up to a strange electric light glare apparently to his senses.

Nevertheless Walter Starring loved that sort of sound, or at least he felt that way, even when a pendulum was beating back and forth in his head, and the bright distant glow of forest fires was interesting and thrilling him greatly. It was like some healing and soothing medicine to him, and therefore he lay with wide open eyes, his ears pricking up once after the other of the strange sounds, that not only marked the change from day to night, but warned of the fury of the "Red Plague" devastating hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars worth of valuable forests because the enemy hated Christmas and its King.

Then he was astonished to hear the cry of a lion, its cry of alarm and knew of one bird fleeing before the fire. Then from across the river in panic and fear came a cry that was a terrific howl. Walter knew that it was a wolf or an escaped town dog also a fugitive of the fire hurricane.

If the fire was coming his way he wondered if it could leap the wide river. If so it would be a miracle. The glows gathered in, the glows grew brighter and more extensive, and then it did not appear to be darkness as the darkness of night is known otherwise. It was a reddish darkness brighter than the strange yellow glow of the time when the sun sets early in the summer evening, and still throws its ruddy light in the western sky at seven o'clock or later in the evening. The beauty of it and the thrill filled Walter's soul, even as he lay on his back in the damp sand. A strange seeping sound then told him he was only ten feet away from the bog. For a moment he was tempted to desire seeing his enemies who had shot him sinking in the yellow muck. Now far southeast of him came a sound of steam and boiling hot steel, and the whole world seemed to grow strangely red dark. Thrilling as it was he dreaded these forest fire horrors, Calverinia's Great Red Plague, days of what he called "Calverinia's Fire Purgatory" made by the enemy, the time when Calverinia's crowded civilization, had at last understood, how the enemy was killing them off by floods of fire and explosions and massacre and rendering all of them homeless.

To night the glow came much earlier because of the smoke clouds in the sky and he had begun to think maybe it was not time for real darkness yet but because of the forest fires. Realizing in August it gets dark about eight o'clock he looked again at his watch and received a surprise. Why it was ten o'clock. How long did he lay at his pack before he came to the river to drink. He was astonished.

It was very still, for even the breeze had seemed to come up the river though in the east there was a strange roaring and crackling sound. And as Walter listened, existing in the thought that the coolness of the wet sand was drawing the fever from him, he heard another sound. At first he thought it was the splashing of a large river salmon which abound plentifully in the Mc-Holleston Run. But he listened more intently and when it came again, and still again, he finally realized it was the steady dip of paddles. A sudden thrill came upon him, and with some effort he raised himself to his elbow. A reddish dusk covered the river, and he could not hardly see. But in a few moments more he heard voices as the paddles continued to dip. And after the passing of a few minutes when they came nearer he knew that one of these was the voice of a little girl. Then his heart gave a big jump.

"The girl is approaching. She is coming back," he whispered to himself. "Now again she'll be here."

The first illusion that came upon Walter staring, and which was as sudden as the thrill, that leaped through him, was to cry out to the occupants of the approaching unseen boat. The words came to his lips, but suddenly he forced them back. They could not reach him, surely could not get beyond the reach of his voice, and therefore he waited. After all there might be profit in a most reasonable degree of great caution. He therefore crept back toward where his rifle still lay, sensing the fact that a moment he no longer gave him any amount of distress. At the same time he lost no sound from the river. The voices were silent now, and only the dip, dip of paddles was as he approached slyly and with extreme caution. At last he could barely hear the trickle of them, yet he knew the canoe was now being steadily nearer. There was surely a very suspicious secretiveness in its approach. Perhaps the little girl was captured by Glandolinians, and they were returning to find and put an end to him.

The thought sharpened his vision. He saw a thing like long shadow, a little darker than the glow of the river, it room grew into shape, something glided lightly upon sand and paddles, and then he heard the guarded splash splash of feet in shallow water, and saw some one pulling the boat up much high. Four other figures joined the first, and one was a perfect giant. They advanced a few paces and then stopped. In a moment a voice called softly.

"Walter Starring. Walter Starring."

There was a very serious tone in her voice, but for that moment Walter Starring held his tongue. And then he heard the little girl say: "It was here Jack Evans. I am positively sure of it."

At this moment there was a great deal more than just anxious anxiety in her voice. Evidently her words trembled with dire distress and apprehension. "Evans if he is dead, he sure is still up there close to his house. We must get him before the forest fire comes tomorrow." "Near."

"But I am not dead yet," said Walter, raising himself a little. "He is here beside a stump of a tree."

Instantly she ran to where he was lying, his hand clutching the cold barrel of the rifle which he had found in the sand, and he was looking up at her with a face that was perfectly white. Once more to his surprise he suddenly found himself, staring into the glow of her pretty blue eyes, and in that glowing red light which precedes the coming of a gigantic forest fire, the fact struck him that she was lovelier than he had seen her before, unusually lovely for a child, coming to him a man. He fancied he heard a throbbing note in her throat. And in another moment she was suddenly kneeling beside him, and then leaning very close over him, her little hands groping at his shoulders, her quick breath betraying how swiftly her little heart was beating.

"I hope you are not hurt so badly as all that," she cried.

"I don't know," replied Starring. "You made a perfectly good shot at me. I believe you shot off a part of my head. At least you have shot off a part of my balance, because I have discovered that I'm not able to stand upon my feet."

"I shot you?" she exclaimed in surprise. "Why I---I" she said no more, her hand touched his face gently, remaining there for an instant, and the palm of it softly pressed his forehead. It was the touch of a little child indeed. Then she called to the men who he heard was Evans. He never saw this soldier before, and he made Walter think of a huge chimpanzee as he came near, because of the shortness of his body and the length of his arms. In the half red light made by the distant forest fires he appeared like some huge nightmare of an animal with a bulldog face, a great tall hulking creature in a purple uniform of some high officer, or of something not of this world walking upright. Walter's fingers closed more tightly on the butt of his automatic now. As Starring not being a real Abbinannian and hardly knowing the language well, as the Vivian girls used to speak to him in English he could not understand very well what she said when Gertrude began to talk swiftly in patois of Abbinannian and so on. Yet knowing it a little brokenly he caught the gist of it never theless. He observed she was telling Evans to carry him to the boat, and to be very careful, because Walter was badly hurt. It was his head she emphasized. Evans must be extremely careful of his head.

Therefore Walter slipped his pistol into its holster, as Evans bulldog face seemed to hunt over him. He tried to smile at the beautiful little girl to thank her for her solicitude after rescuing him probably from some one who had nearly killed him. There was an increasing glow and warmth in the night, and he began to see her more plainly. Far down out on the middle of the wide river was a large sheen of carmine light a light glowing brighter and brighter and advancing. The light seemed also to be coming up, but brighter and redder but apparently true triumphant in the fact that smoke clouds failed to blot it out. Between this sheen of light, and himself he saw the head of Evans. It that glow apparently it appeared to be a wild and savage looking head, wearing a large rounded hat covered with feathers. His long arms slipped under Walter. And then gently and without the slightest effort he raised him to his feet. And to his great surprise as easily as he might have lifted a small delicate child, he trundled him up in his arms, and walked off with him over the sand.

Indeed this was not at all expected and Walter was dumfounded, even a little shocked and also felt the most impropriety of the unusual thing.

It embarrassed Walter to be carried off like a little baby, especially in the presence of a little girl who might after all have saved him from the one who had deliberately put him in his present condition. And Jack Evans did the thing with such beastly ease. Indeed it was as if he had been nothing else but a small boy of no weight at all, and Evans was a giant giant. He would rather have staggered along on his own feet, or crept on his own hands and knees, and therefore he grunted much as Evans on the way to the boat. He felt at the same time that the situation owed him something more of discussion and explanation. Even now after having rescued him from the man who had half-killed him, the little girl was taking rather a high handed interest in him and he had never known her before. She had however assured him in broken English that she had not made mistake, that she did not shoot shooting, and was sorry that he made the mistake in thinking so, and that she was sorry she and her friends had not heard the shooting before. It was she and her companions who had been in the boat he saw while the ambush was before him. The shooting had attracted her and her companions and they had found the gun nest and drove the assailants off. He had remembered that there had been a succession of shots just after he was hit, and had at first believed they were directed to him. She said only one had fired at him. But after this explanation she did not speak to him again as she looking at the distant fires was in a hurry to start. She said nothing more to Evans, and when the Abbinannian placed him in the bottom of the boat in the midship part facing the bow, she and her small companions stood back in silence. Then Evans brought back his pack and rifle, and wedged the pack in behind him so that he could sit up upright. After that without even pausing to ask permission, he picked up the children one at a time, and carried them through the shallow water to the bow, saving them the wading of their feet.

As she and two others turned to find their paddles, Gertrude's face was toward Walter, and for a moment she was looking intently at him.

"Would it trouble you if I would ask who you are, and where we are going?" he asked.

"I am Angelina Aronburg, but every one calls me Gertrude Angelina," she said. "As to where we are going that is only mind work. We are going wherever chances takes us. We must go before the fire comes. I'll surely leap the river and we must hurry."

He was amazed at the promptness of her words, for as one of the working factors of the long arm of the Gemini spies, he accepted it as that. He had not even expected her to tell her name, even after she chanced off the party who in so cold blooded a way had attempted to kill him. And she had spoken calmly but anxiously of "being overtaken by the fire." This fire forest fire was associated with the cause of the disasters, as he felt sure he remembered. He was not sure just what course the red menace was taking, but he was positive it had not come so far up to his hiding place yet. Her name repeated itself over and over again in his mind. Evans shoved off the boat, and two of the children besides Gertrude dipped in their paddles in and out of the water, which was shimmering in the red forest firelight. But he could not for a time, get himself beyond the pounding of that name in his brain, or of her startling words. And he had heard the name before but forgotten it. There was something significant about the other names she said they called her. Something that made him grope back in his memory of things. Gertrude Angelina. He whispered it softly to himself, with the rest to the steady sweep of the paddle in her hands. Yet he could not really think of anything to the while. It was a puzzle to him. Therefore a strange feeling of irritation swept over him, disquiet at his own mental slowness. And to make it worse for him the strange dizzy sickness was coming into his wounded head again.

"I have surely heard that name---somewhere in the army before," he said. There was a space of six or seven feet between them, and he spoke with complete distinctness.

"Most every body has, Walter."

Her voice was exquisite, clear as the note of a bird, yet so soft, and low that she seemed scarcely to have spoken. And it was Walter thought something unusually evasive---under the circumstances. He turned her strongly to turn around and say something. He wanted first of all to ask her if she knew who it among his enemies who had tried to kill him in ambush. Indeed it was his right to demand a full explanation. And it was his right to have the chance to take that rascal back to the army, where the Court-mart Marshall would ask an accounting of him. She must know that surely. There was only one way in which she also could have learned his name, and that was by prying into the conversation of his enemies before she routed them. Therefore she not only knew his name, but also that he was Sagan Sergeant Colonel of the Gemini. In spite of all this she was very deeply concerned, frightened, and she appeared to be greatly excited at times, and even mortified. He leaned nearer to her, the movement sending suddenly a sharp terrible pain between his eyes. It always drew a cry from him, but he forced himself to speak without betraying it.

"You saved me from the mysterious enemy who tried to murder me--and succeeded. Have you not anything to say?"

"Not now Walter--except that it was a man who shadowed you, and I am sorry that I and my followers did not come along sooner. I pried into the identification papers which one of them dropped and which I still have in my possession, and he knows what your purpose was and was sent by the rebels to kill you before you succeed. The Vivian Girls intend to do the same next month. I will warn them to keep on the look out. But you must not talk so loud or we'll all be shadowed. You must remain quiet or talk in whispers as this woods may still be full of those scoundrels and they'll snip us all in the dark. And I'm afraid the bullet though striking a side blow has partly fractured your skull."

He was surprised to hear her say she was afraid his skull was fractured. And she expressed her fear in the casual way she might have spoken of having a head-splitting toothache. He leaned back again against his dunghill back or sackcloth, and closed his eyes. Probably he thought, she was right after all. Indeed these fits of dizziness, and nausea were very suspicious. Often they made him quite top heavy, and filled him with a desire to quickly crumple up somewhere. And he was clearly and consciously of this, and of his fight against the weakness. But nevertheless in those moments, when he felt better and his head was clear of his aching pain, he had not seriously thought of anything like having a fractured skull. And if she believed it, then that was why she had been treating him so considerately. She always sat facing him, and dwelt on matters more definitely than he had expected.

Because he was looking for information of the cause of the disasters he had been trailed by an enemy agent to prevent his purposes she had told him. And she really was sorry for him and feared all of them would be shadowed. She had made those statements in a way as if she was worried more than she cared to show, and not in a matter of fact way. And to his surprise though she was an Abbeismian she had spoken in more perfect English than even Violet, and her sisters could, but in her words were the inflection, and volubility softness of the Abbeismian blood which must be running red in her veins. And her name was Angelina Aronburg, the only one known to her as Gertrude Angeline.

With his eyes closed, Walter called himself an idiot for thinking of these things at the present time. Privately he was a hunting man out for the most important information in the world ever known of, out on the most important duty on record, and here also was duty right at hand, fifty or sixty miles north of Evangeline at Claire City, and still he was after the information of who brought on these disasters by the command or request of the army. And he would have sworn on his life, that some of the worse Glandelinian generals had never gone at a killing of innocent children in massacres more deliberately, than this she same Glandelinian skunk had gone after him behind the rock. And this mere stripping of a child's clothes had saved him. Now that it was all over and he was alive, she was taking him somewhere as coolly, and as hurriedly, as though they were pursued by something more menacingly than the forest fire or even the enemy. Walter shut his eyes tighter, and wondered if he was thinking straight. He believed her when she said he was badly hurt, but he was as strongly convinced that his mind was clear. And he lay quietly with his head against the rock, his eyes closed, waiting for the coolness of the river if it ever came to drive his nausea away again.

Then he sensed rather than felt the swift movement of the boat. Indeed there could not be thought to be any perceptible tremor to its progress. The current and a perfect craftsmanship with the paddles were carrying it along at sixteen or so many a mile an hour. At least that was what he fancied. Then he fancied he heard the rippling of water, that at times was almost like the tinkling of tiny bells, and more and more he became to him that sound, as he listened to it. It struck a certain note for him that was somewhat a surprise. And to that note another seemed to add itself, until in the purring rhythm of the river he apparently caught the murmuring monotone of a name, Gertrude Angeline, Gertrude Angeline, Gertrude Angeline. The name became to him an obsession. It meant something. And he surely knew what it meant, if he could only whip his wandering memory back into its proper shape again. But that was surely most impossible now. For when he tried to concentrate upon the name, his head ached and throbbed terribly. He finally dipped his head in the water, and held it over his eyes. Then for fully an hour he did not make any efforts to raise his head as he desired well from the pain. In that space of time not a word was spoken by Evans, Gertrude, or her other companions. For people in this region with probably any unseen perils lurking everywhere in the forest it was not an hour in which to talk. The distant clouds had increased swiftly and tranquilly. And there was not one star out, where there had been gloom, the world was now a flood of ruddy glows and golden fire light. At first Walter Starring allowed this to filter between his fingers, then he opened his eyes slowly. He felt more evenly balanced again, and the pain was partly gone.

Still as before straight in front of him was Angelina Aronburg. The curtain of reddish tinted dusk had risen from between them, and she was full in the radiance of the forest fire glow. To Walter Starring her figure was exquisitely girlish as she saw as he saw it now. She was now bareheaded as he had not yet seen her and her hair hung down her back like a shimmering mass of fire red gold in the fire glow which even now was getting brighter to an alarming degree.

Something just then told Walter she was going to turn her face in his direction, and therefore once as he dropped his hand over his eyes, leaving a space between his fingers. Indeed in another moment she surely was looking at him closely--very anxiously, he observed.... She then turned a little toward him that she might see more clearly. Then she resumed her nodding with the others.

Now Walter was somewhat elated. He felt sure that it was in all probabilities that she had looked at him a number of times like that during the past hour. And she was either disturbed or apprehensive. It was surely evident that she was greatly worried about him. He felt sure his condition was beginning to frighten her terribly. In spite of the beauty of her eyes, and the slim witchery of her little body, he at first had been suspicious of her. At first he had felt sure he would give his very soul to have her down at the camp as his prisoner that very minute. He could and would never forget that long period of sleep behind the rock, not if he lived forever on the earth. And he had decided that if he did live, she was going to pay, even if she was lovelier than the most beautiful creatures of Paradise paradise. At first also he had felt very irritated with himself that he had observed in such a silly way the beautiful glow of her hair in the daytime, and her eyes. He had said to himself what in the world does prattleness matter in such an awkward situation.

But now he had realized that it was not mistaken, that only Glandelinians had fired the shots, and that she and her followers were in that boat at the time he felt like making a trumpet of his horns and shouting for help. And without calling for aid she had come.

"A shame!" he said to himself "To suspect her when she is innocent. A shame indeed."

Walter drew himself up very slowly until he was sitting erect. He wondered what Gertrude Angeline would say if he told her about his strange vision. But there was a half mile between his vision and hers, as he had been warned not to mention it to any one. His hand in groping to his side fell upon the butt of his pistol. Neither Evans or the girl and her companions had thought of disarming him. If they were his enemies it would have been very careless of them. Then a new sort of thrill crept into Glandelinian blood. He began to see where he had made a huge error mistake in not laying his hand more carefully. He wondered his enemies had surprised him. It was this girl and her companions who had saved him after the assassin shot him. It was Gertrude who had stood over him in that last moment when he had made an effort to use his pistol thinking she was the up reach of his assassin enemy. It was she who had saved him from the sniper who had tried to murder him. But at the first he had not known this. Even now it might be impossible for him to retrieve for his blunder. He leaned slowly toward her again determined to make the effort.

"I have a desire to ask your pardon," he said. "May I not?"

His voice rose and startled her greatly. It might be as if some stinging whip lash had struck with its tip against her bare neck. He was smiling when she turned. In her face and eyes was a relief, which she made no effort to suppress.

"You believed I might be dead," he said softly. "I believe it was that a cursed fever--and I want to ask you your pardon. I think I--I know--that I accused you of shooting me either by design or mistake. I now cannot believe it, I do not comprehend it. It's impossible. I could not think of it in my clear mind. I'm quite sure that I knew it was some rascally Glandelinian who had been shadowing me who shot me like that. And it was not who do a in time and frightened him away and saved my life. Will you forgive me, and accept my profound gratitude?" There came into the glowing eyes of the girl a good reflection of his own smile. Then it seemed to him that he saw the corners of her not mouth tremble a little before she answered him.

"I am really glad to be feeling better Walter staring."

"And you surely will forgive me for saying such beastly things to you!"

"What beastly things?"

"About you shooting me."

"I shooting you? When did you say that?"

"I'm sure I accused you of that to day."

"You must have been saying that in your fever sir for I do not remember it."

"Don't remember it?"

"No." She was lovely now more than ever when she smiled, and she was smiling at him now. "If you want to be forgiven for saying things while in your ravings, why yes," she said, "I can forgive you that, because it is sometimes not wrong anyway to tell lies about me in delirium. But I'm not lying when I tell you it was not I who tried to kill you Walter. You do not know me but I do know you and have seen you with the Vivien Girls often. And therefore you are all right. It was I and my companions here who tried to save you before the glandelinians killed you. And I hope you'll know it by now."

"But—"

"You must not talk Walter, especially so loud. It is not good for you in your condition and besides you'll be overheard by hidden enemies in these burning woods. Evans will tell Walter not to talk until he is safe."

Walter heard a movement behind him.

"Mr Waltrise, you must stop so talk, or Glandelinian enemies shoot from once more and maybe be all in so boat." came the voice of Evans in broken English close to his shoulder. "Do I make so word plain so Mr Waltrise comprehend?"

"I understand you sir very good," grunted Starring. "I understand you both."

And once more he leaned back against his dunghack or sack, staring again at the witching forms of the lovely girl scout, as she calmly resumed her paddling in the bow of the boat.

In the many minutes following the efficient and unexpected warning of Jack Evans, an entirely new kind of interest entered into the situation for Walter Starring. He had more than once assured himself that he had made more than a great success of his spy and scout profession, and also of his process of profession of inquiring after military news and information, not because he was brighter than the Glandelinian generals, but largely because he possessed a sense of humor, and no venturies to prick. He was in the game too because he loved the adventure of it. He loved adventure, and was an adventurer. He was, loyal to his duty, and as an officer of the Thirty Fourth Infantry of Hansons command he felt the pulse and thrill of life as he loved to live it. And the greatest of all thrills came when he was after a glandelinian spy or agent as clever as himself or cleverer.

When time he was sniped by one of those very men he might be after for he felt sure that he was shot by a Glandelinian who may really know all about the record breaking explosion and flood disasters just passed and still going on. This time, the first time in his life too, it was a little girl who had come to his aid. Of what state she was from he had not yet made up his mind. Her voice low and sweet musical, her poise, and the tranquil and unexcitable lowliness of her continually smiling face, had at first made him believe she was a foreigner, for seldom was an Angelinian or an Abbeoninian observed with such hair for mostly you see nothing else but black haired people. But as he looked at the slim girlishness of her young figure in the bow of the boat, accounted by the soft sheen of her partly uncoiled hair, he wondered if she really was an Abbeoninian or of some other Nationality, whether she was one of the escaped child slaves. If so that will account for her hair which was not at all the black of the Abbeoninian. It however would take the clear light of day to tell him. But she alone could not hardly talk English, and if so very brokenly. She had spoken to him in her own tongue. But whether an Abbeoninian or of some other nationality, she had handled him so cleverly that the unpleasantness of his earlier experience began to give way at last to an admiration for her capability. Maybe she was or could do the same thing a nurse could.

He wondered what other general Vivien or his brother Hanson, or even Violet, and her sisters or the Head Supreme Person of the Glandelin would say if they could see The Looker for the more important information dropped up here in the center of the boat, saved by a golden haired but to the enemy a dangerously efficient bit of feminine lowliness—and a big bull necked, bulldogged faced chimpanzee or an Abbeoninian officer.

Evans had confirmed the suspicion, that he was still in grave danger, even though this mysterious girl was bent on saving his life on all costs and even some distant beyond the forest fires on all costs and even him at all risks and to save his life in him, at their own expense and also come to his rescue when only a few hours ago one or all of them had had a share in the battle with those who tried to kill him in a bush was a question which only the future could answer. It did not bother him if with that problem now. The present was altogether more interesting, and also there was but little doubt that other developments more important were close at hand. The sound of Gertrude Angelina and Jack Evans was sufficient evidence of that. Evans had warned him that even the sound of his voice even subtly in a whisper was dangerous at the moment when hidden enemies might lurk, and he could have sworn that the girl, and even her companions, had aided her full and strongest cooperation of the solemn warning. She seemed to fear of the hidden enemies than of the approaching forest fire, which even now was seen at that distance looking it almost as light as day. Yet he held no grudge against the case or the adventure though he felt he'd like to wring the neck of the rascally misadventurer who shot him like an assassin. And an odd sort of liking for the officer with her began to possess Walter Starring just as he found himself powerless to resist an improving admiration for Gertrude Angelina, and even her girl and boy followers who over they were. The existence of the information he was looking for as a success so far became with him a sort of indefinite reality. But the point he was heading for was a terribly long way off. The forest fires and other perils was very near. He began thinking of Angelina Aronson as Gertrude Angelina. He liked the line better.

And for the first time since the boat journey had begun he looked beyond the brightly glowing head and the slender little figure in the bow. It was however a terrible sight. Ahead of him the river reflecting the forest fire glow was like a river or a shining sheet of molten gold. On both sides more than two miles apart rose the dark walls of the forests like low hung oriental tapestries. The sky seemed rolled and balled a canopy of bulging mountains and cumulous clouds of smoke of black pink and yellow colored smoke sacks, loaded at times far off along the zenith and horizon with blizzards of flying smoke and embers, and at intervals he could see flames rising upward and piercing the thicker clouds along the horizon like lightning spreading with almost perceptible movement along the horizon.

Walter was thrilled by this sight. And yet to night it was unusually still. It was so quiet that the briceline of the saddles was like subdued music. He did not like this. His soul always rose to the glory of the Glandelinian nights, when the moon shone and the sky was studded with bright stars. And he appreciated them most when there was stillness. But now the scene was like as if he and his rescuers were running away from Purgatory with no one apparently in pursuit. From the smoke checked forest there came no sound. Yet he knew there was no life there now as every creature had fled before the Red Flame.

To have shouted out something in this hour would have taken a great effort, for our blessed Lord Himself seemed to have commanded stillness upon the earth.

And then suddenly to his surprise there came drowning upon his ears, a strange break in the stillness, and as he listened the shores grew further away, and then far to his rear he saw giant masses of golden something reeling replacing the thick verdure of balsam, spruce and cedar. The hissing and roaring grew louder, and apparently an enormous clouds of flame soared hundreds of feet skyward, until they made the sky turn into flame itself. There could be no meaning of this sudden change. They had passed a point where a head of the enormous fire was moving speedily, and it had come up at once catching as it seemed miles of trees in a stretch at once.

Walter Starring was astonished. That day at noon he had believed the head of the fire to be one hundred miles off. Now they had come to the rivers edge, and what astonished him more he saw that Gertrude Angelina and Evans were quietly and unexcitedly preparing to run past that vicious stretch of forest fire heat that was felt terrifically at that distance.

Unconsciously he gripped the gunwhales of the boat with both hands, as the sounds of the conflagration grew into low and mullen thunder. Then came a terrific hot wind across tearing a sea of blazing limbs and fairly flinging them forward and about entirely across the river. In the bright light ahead, he could see the forest walls not yet burned writhing in the gale, until it seemed as if the forest channel was crushed between two terrific elements, fire storm and hurricane, and the flaming embers like glowing streamers lighted up a frothing path of water a mile and a half wide that made Walter hold his breath.

He would have avoided this place even in broad day. It was the St Ann rapids and dangerous almost suicide to dare run that vicious stretch of water.

He protested wildly but she said—

"Good heavens Walter that fire will get us if we don't. Wide as this stream is it'll cross. The wind will carry embers. See trees are ablaze already on the other side. We'll have to run the fire gauntlet or perish. Better the danger of the rapids than the fire."

He looked at the girl in the bow as she spoke. The slender figure after throwing water all over herself and her companions from a bucket was now a little more erect, a thin glowing golden head a little higher. Indeed in those moments of awful peril he would have liked to see her face, which could have been reflected in the glow now to good advantage, the wonderful something that must be in her eyes, as she rode fearlessly into the teeth of the fire menace and rapids ahead. Swept by a crazy wildgale of wind the flames were leaping across the river in perfect singing roof, but nevertheless he could see that she was not afraid, that she was facing this peril of both fire and rapids with a sort of thrill and exultation, that there was something about it which thrilled her until every drop of blood in her body was racing with the grand impetus of the stream itself. The rapids she knew would carry her swiftly past the roaring wall of fire roofing the sky overhead. Strong hot eddies of wind blowing like a hurricane puffing out from the forest fire tossed her loose hair about her back in a glistering veil. He saw a long strand of it trailing over the edge of the boat into the water, and then four brands of flaming fire fell in the boat, one striking her in the back. There was an insane roar of falling trees now, the terrific crackling of the flames, and up rose a sudden long flame on the opposite shore. As the boat sped on he watched it spread to thousands of trees within sight like the swift sudden move out of a storm, and it made him shiver, and he wanted to cry out to Evans, that he was a fool for risking her life like this in this seething hell. And for the moment in his excitement he forgot that he alone was the one helpless man in the boat, and that in the rapids an upset would mean the end for him, while Evans and his five little companions might still fight on. His thought and his vision were focused on the girl, the walls of fire, searing the shore and sky--and of what lay ahead.

Then he saw a number of burning trees fall toward the river shore side. Then he was surprised by a mass of froth like a long high windrow of snow, which rose up before them, and then the boat suddenly plunged into it, with the swift news of a shot. It splattered in his face, and blinded him for an instant. Then they were out of it, and he fancied he heard a note of laughter from the girl in the bow. In the next breath he called himself a big fool for believing that.

For the run was dead ahead, and the girl became vibrant with life, her paddle flashing in and out, while from her lips came clear sharp cries, which brought from Evans frog-like bellows of response. The seething walls of fire searing a thousand feet shot past, strange red inundations rose and plunged under them, black mountainous rolls of smoke, topped with wreaths and canopies of many colors and shooting shoots of flame seemed to race upstream along the shore with the speed of living things, the roar he became a drowning voice--and then as if outreached by the wings of a swifter thing--dropped suddenly behind them.

Smother water lay ahead, and all was darker only lighted by the reflection of the fire left behind. But they could not be too sure. It was also moving along the banks of the river. Yet the channel broadened and the water became smoother and smoother though the fire forest fire light filled it with a clearer ruddy radiance, and Walter saw the little girls golden hair and clothing glistering wet and her ears dripping.

For the first time he turned about and faced Evans. This man was grinning like a bulldog.

"You all are a confoundingly queer pair," grunted Walter Starring, and he turned about again, to find Gertrude Angeline as unconcerned as though running a rapids in the face of two towering walls of fire was nothing more than a matter of lay play. Therefore it was impossible for him to keep his heart from beating a little faster as he now watched her, even though he was trying to regard her in a most professional sort of way. He reminded himself that she was an iniquitous little Jezebel who had saved him when his enemies had almost almost murdered him. Violet and her sisters too had been like her, but his business was not sympathy in such matters as these. At the same time he could not resist the lure of both her audacity and courage, and he therefore found himself all at once asking himself the amazing question, as to whether Evans was one of her retainers or guardians. It occurred to him rather unpleasantly that a while there had been something distinctly proprietary in the way this man had picked her up on the sand, and that Evans had shown no hesitation a little later in warning him of his peril of drawing hidden enemies to the shore if he did not keep still and not talk. He wondered if Evans was an Abbotnion.

The five or six minutes of excitement in racing between the forest fire and of the excitement of the boiling waters of the rapids had acted like a tonic on Walter Starring. It was apparent to him that something that should not be there had given way in his head, and he was feeling him of an over action that had been like an iron hoop drawn tightly about his skull. Of course he did not want to have rack Evans or the others knew a snap out of this strange in him, and he therefore stooped lower against the dunnage pack with his eyes still on the little girl. And he was now finding it increasingly difficult and trouble some to keep from looking at her even though she was a child. She had resumed her paddling, and even Evans himself was putting tightly strokes now using great energy. He saw that the boat shot like a swift arrow with the down sweeping current of the mighty river. Six hundred yards below a long and wide bend in the river, and as the boat gradually rounded this, taking the shoreward curve with dizzying swiftness, a wider and still straighter water lay ahead, and far down this Walter Starring saw the far distant glow of new fires. The forest here had drawn back from the river, leaving in its place a large stretch of broken tundra of rock and shale more than ten miles long and further on a wide strip of black sand along the edge of the stream itself.

Walter Starring knew what it was, a large upheaval of the tar bogs caused by some natural distasteful disturbance. Beyond by a strange blackness where there was an immense clearing in the forest too wide a rent for the worst fire to leap across there was a strange deeper blackness than the shadow of night and he knew there were tar and oil bogs. If the forest fire ever leaped there surely would be an inferno. The distant fires were drawing nearer, and suddenly the still night was broken by the wild hubbub of many fugitives no doubt fleeing from a burning town. Walter heard behind him a shocking note in the throat of Evans. A soft word came from the lips of the girl, and it seemed that her head was held higher than before. The noise of screams and words and shouts increased in volume. It thrilled Walter as they apparently bore down upon it. Though it was the cries of fugitives it was somewhat rhythmic, throbbing savage music, that for all forest fire horrors had come from the throats of such fugitives since the war began. It was not the cries of those who were fleeing before the enemy. It was like an exclamation, a roar and scream of human voices unchained exultant with the desire of escape from the Red Magpie, savage in its horror.

In that sound men and women and even children were straining their vocal muscles, apparently shouting to beat out their nearest neighbor, bellowing like bulls in a frenzy of sudden terror. And then as suddenly as it had risen in the night the clear voices died out in the distance. Then a single shout came up the river. Walter thought he heard a low rumble of something thundering. A war wolf howled diabolically, and the night was still again.

And that was the sign the fugitives had gone off in the far distance. Walter stared ahead. He felt sure that shortly his adventure would take a new turn. Something was bound to happen if they went ashore. But it was evident she did not intend to go ashore. The peculiar glow of the distant fires in this new direction had puzzled him. Now he began to understand. The forest fire on the east bank of the stream was trying to run a race with the boat while traveling along the shore. Many times he had seen forest fires like these burning up and down the forest stretches of the Val Calverinian rivers. He had helped to fight fires with his own men, but he had never seen anything quite like this that was unfolding itself before his eyes now.

There were eight of the distant fire glows over an area of many miles to the east, and closer he imagined he saw sheets of yellow flame going apparently fifteen feet in the air. And nearest one of them he very soon made out great bustle and unusual activity. Many figures in a long line were moving about and doing queer actions. They looked like strange dwarfs at first, or gnomes at play.

In a large fire world made out of strange witchcraft. But Evans was sending the canoe or boat nearer with powerful strokes, and though still distant the figures grew taller, and the distant sheets of flame higher. Then he knew what was happening. On this portion many rangers and men of some neighboring towns were out attacking the fire and trying to subside it or head off its course. He could also still burning tar somewhere, and could see some large boat tied up in the strange yellowish light. There were large stretches of trees and men dressed in abattoirs, but far off were using picks and shovels, or cutting down trees, and beating at the flaming ground for long stretches with wet sacks, or men with spades lustily throwing dirt on the ground fire. In another direction another bunch of men were seen on horses racing back and forth to the river with pails to fill barrels on wagons within easy sight. Still nearer other men were working nimbly with long axes to cut down trees, or even setting dynamite to blast down trees, and others fighting the ground fires that were rapidly approaching the black tar that oozed up from the bowels of the earth, forming along many points immense jet black pools that Walter could see glistering in the flame of the distant fires. He figured there were hundreds of men at work. Close inshore just outside the stretch of light was a large single scow. Toward this scow Evans sent the boat. Then as they drew nearer until the laboring forest fire fighters ashore were scarcely six hundred yards away, the wildness of the scene impressed itself upon Walter more strongly.

Never had he seen such a force of fire fighters as this, pick moving, and their abattoirs covering gleaming in the ghostly illumination, they apparently were fighting against time. They were too far off to see the approach of the boat, and Evans did not draw their attention to it. Quickly he drove the long and wide craft under the shadow of the big Calverinian tundra. Yet hands were waiting to seize and steady it. Walter hardly was able to catch a single glimpse of the faces. In another instant the children were aboard the scow, and Evans was bending over his. A second time he was picked up like a small light bundle in the powerful choppy-like arms of the officer. The distant glow showed him a scow bigger than he had ever seen anywhere before, and three quarters of it seemed to be cabin.

And into this large and handsome thing of it a cabin Jack Evans carried him, and after a muttered prayer, and without lighting a fire to break the darkness laid him upon what Walter thought must be some sort of a cot built or placed against the wall. He made no sound, but let his self fall limply upon it. He then listened to Evans as he moved about muttering a long prayer to himself, and closed his eyes with the faint struck a match. A moment later he heard the door of the cabin close behind the officer. Not until then did he open his eyes and slowly sit up. After looking around carefully he found himself to be alone, and after a few moments he observed something that drew him. It was an examination of himself. He had been on many a river boat, and never saw a cabin like this. It was thirty five or four / forty foot long, and at least ten feet wide, and twelve high, and inside had the appearance of the exact rooms of a house belong to the wall to do. The walls and ceiling were of tricolor paint, the floor was of cedar varnished thickly and shining like a mirror in the glow of the lamp that Evans had lit. And it was the work and exquisite workmanship and also craftsmanship of the wood work and designs that caught his eyes first. Then he observed other things that astonished him still more. Looking down he observed that under his feet was a thick soft rug of soft green velvet. And two magnificent white bear skin lay between him, and the end of the room. The walls were hung with pictures, mostly of scenery, and one of a famous Italian Saint, and at the seven big windows were curtains of ivory lace draped with damask. The large lamp which Evans had lighted was fastened to the wall close to him. It was of polished silver ripped on the top with pure gold, and threw a brilliant light. Looking carefully he saw it was a large candle lamp. There were eight other lamps like these and they were not lighted, but though they had the same color of the lamp and their greasy appearance, but Walter made out the very first thing he was staring at—a beautiful organ. He slowly rose to his feet, for he could not believe his eyes, and then he made his way toward it. He passed between chairs. Near the organ was another door, and a wide divan of the same soft green velvet upholstery. Looking back he observed that what he had been just then lying upon was another divan of the same kind. And close to this were book shelves, and a table on which were magazines, and papers and a woman's workbasket, and a waist basket also, and in the big waste basket sound asleep—was a large cat.

And then over the table, and the sleeping cat, his eyes rested upon a large picture fastened to the wall. In a background was a mighty army holding at bay an immense herd of fiends. It was a battle of Christians against demons.

He took a quick step toward the table—then suddenly caught at the back of a chair. "Gounfound my head!" he exclaimed. Or was it the big boat starting to move, and rocking suddenly under his feet. Then suddenly to him it seemed as if the cat was beginning to turn round in its basket and the basket seemed to be turning different shapes. There were half a dozen battle pictures instead of one, the lamp was shaking in its bracket, the floor was tilting, the boat was sinking and filling with water and burning at the same time, over the water was burning, the air was becoming smoke, the ceiling was coming down to him and the floor was rising up to crush him, great ghosts of horrible objects appeared out of the darkness, everything was becoming hideously contorted and out of place. To him the river itself suddenly rose from the ground and its full length stood up, the forest fires began to burn the stars, and the moon began to make faces, then a strange shroud of darkness gathered about him, and through the darkness Walter staggered blindly toward the divan. He reached it just in time to fall upon it like a dead man.

After this final breakdown there seemed to have been a most interminable time, especially since the breakdown of his physical strength, and then it seemed forever and ever that Walter Starring lived in a strangely black and dreadfully dark world, where apparently a horde of unusually frightful creatures appearing and disappearing were shooting every now and then, sometimes red hot arrows and brimstone and fire into his brain. And it apparently seemed that he was a lost soul. Whether they were there or not, he did not and could not hardly sense the presence of human beings, nor that the divan had been changed into a bed, and the eight lamps lighted, and that wrinkled brown hands of an old surgeon were performing a miracle of wilderness surgery over him. He did not see the aged old face of the doctor, an army and ranger surgeon, as the poor bent and tottering doctor called upon all a his ninety eight years of experience and upon Our Blessed Lord also to bring him back to life. And knees hour after hour, nor the dead white face and wide open staring eyes of Gertrude Angeline as her silver white fingers worked with the old doctor's doctors. Apparently he felt sure he was in a gulf of utter blackness, thick with the spirits of torment and fury. He fought them desperately and crowded against them and he fighting and his loud cries brought the look of death into the very eyes of the little girl whose face continually banded over him. Neither was he able to hear the slightest sound of her voice, nor feel the soothing of her hands nor the powerful grip of Evans, as he held him down with the critical moments came.

And the good old doctor like a machine that had looked upon death a thousand times gave no rest to his claw like fingers until the work was quietly done, and after that it came to be that something appeared to drive the arrow shooting fiends out of the darkness, that was trying to smother Walter Starring. After that Walter lived through an eternity of unrest, a life in which he seemed absolutely powerless and yet tried always to desperately struggle and contend for a overpowering over things that were trying equally as desperately to forcibly hold him down. There were long lapses of it without break, like the long hours of awful stormy weather or of dreadful oblivion that comes with coma, and also there were often times, when he seemed keenly alive and alert, yet unable to move or act. Then gradually the darkness gave way to sudden flashes of light, and then these flashes helped him to see things, but not a potentially they were curiously twisted, then floating, and then began to fight themselves insistently upon his senses. Then apparently it seemed he was back in the hot sand again, and then he heard the voices of Gertrude Angeline and of some one else seemingly shouting to others to pick him up and hurry out of the path of a fire. Then it was always these children came to him when the fierce devils returned to attack him with flaming pitchforks and darts. From somewhere else, and the other would come out of the darkness from some unknown place and with the beautiful sign of the Cross frighten them away.

Once in a while he fancied he could hear their voice like a soft whisper in his ears, and then he felt occasionally one or the other touch him with cool soothing hands, and comfort him and quiet his pain. After a time he grew to be greatly afraid, when the darkness would swallow them up, and in that dark, near he would call desperately for them, and always he heard their voice in answer, and sometimes that of Evans.

Then came the longest of all the oblivions. He then imagined that he was floating delightfully through a large cool space, far away from the fiends and other creatures of horror and torment, then it seemed that his bed became don't other clouds, and on these clouds he suddenly began to drift far off, with a great golden sea of a smokeless fire below and above him, and at last the cloud he was on slowly began to shape itself into a forest of beautiful galaxy like beams, and these forests changed to immense ferns, and then gradually shaped themselves into strangely formed walls, and on these walls were pictures all of burning forests, and of himself burning with them, and then there was a large window through which a big fire was entering—and then he heard a soft voice, was followed by the most wonderful music that seemed to come to him from another world.

Later on it seemed that there were many other creatures beginning to work in his brain, apparently building up and sending together the loose ends of things that the parent demons had ruined or broke apart. Then apparently Walter became one of them, working so hard that frequently a pair of blue eyes and others came out of the dawning of the night to stop him, and then other quieting hands and a voice or two soothed him to rest. The hands and the voice became very intimate. He missed them often when they were not near, especially the hands, and he therefore was always cropping for them, to make sure they had not gone away. Only twice after the floating clouds transformed itself into the walls of the boat cabin did the dreadful and chaotic darkness of the apparent internal regions fully possess him again. In that darkness he heard a stranger voice. It was not the voice of any of his childhood rescuers, or of Evans or of any fire fighting rangers. It apparently was close to his ears. And in that awful darkness that was apparently smothering him, there was something terrible about it as it droned slowly the words "Thou enemy had killed my little girl." He tried to answer, to call back to it, and the voice came suddenly again repeating the words, emotionless hollow as if echoing out of a grave. And still harder he struggled to reply to it, to say that he was Walter Starring, and that he was out to look for information and find out why the enemy made all those dreadful flood and other disasters. And suddenly it seemed to him that the voice changed into the flesh and blood of Gertrude Angeline herself, though he could not see in the darkness—and he reached out suddenly, gripping fiercely at the warm substance of flesh, until he heard another voice, the voice of Gertrude Angeline entreating him to allow his enemy to go. It was this time that his eyes shot open, wide and seeing, and straight over him was the face of Gertrude Angeline nearer to him than it had been even in the visionings of his dreadfully feverish mind. His fingers were clutching her shoulders, gripping like steel hooks.

"Walter, Walter" she was crying. For a full minute or longer he stared in surprise, then slowly his hands and fingers relaxed relaxed, and his arms dropped limp. "I beg your pardon—I—I was dreaming" he stammered weakly. "I—I thought I was—""!!!!!!"

He had seen the pain of worry in her face. Now changing swiftly however, it lighted up with relief and gladness. And now his vision cleared by long darkness and the change came in an instant like a flash of sunshine. And then so near that he could have touched her—she was smiling down into his eyes. He smiled back. It however took a great effort for his face felt stiff and very much unnatural as if it had been made of plaster.

"I believe I was dreaming of—going out to hunt for the reason of flood and explosion disaster," he continued to apologize. "I hope I did not hurt you!" The two girls had one from her lips as swiftly as it had come. "A little Walter. I am glad you are better and have recovered your mind. You have been very ill since you were wounded by the sniper."

He raised his hand suddenly to his face. The bandage was there, and now a long scuffle of beard on his cheek. He was puzzled, for why this morning he had fastened his arm in a mirror to the side of a tree and shaved.

"It was six days ago you were hurt by the sniper," she said quietly. "This is the late morning of the seventh day. You have been in a struggle and great fever. My friendly doctor Ja na Ja has saved your life and an after a week's hard effort. You must lie quiet now. You have been talking a great deal."

"About—about the clues as to who caused the dreadful disaster— and also why?" he said.

"She nodded.

"And of you and your friends?"

"All of them, even yours."

"And of others too."

"It may be so Walter."

"And of a many fierce devils with fiery darts and arrows, and of great forest fires, and of enemies trying to pull me down into a dark, dark pit?"

"All of those too."

"Then I haven't anything more to tell you," grunted Walter. "I guess I have told you all I know. You saved me from the man who shot me back there. And here I am, what are you going to do next?"

"I'm going to call you to have him take care of you," she answered promptly, and she rose swiftly from beside him, and moved quickly to the door. Though he desired to be made no effort to call her back. Nevertheless his wife was working slowly, refusing themselves after an awful carnival in chaos, and he scarcely noticed that she was gone, until the cabin door closed behind her. Then again he raised his hand to his face and felt his beard, six days. He turned his head so that he could take in the length of the cabin. It was filled with subdued sunlight now, a western sun that glowed softly, giving depth and richness to the colors on the floor and walls, lighting up the things on the shelves, and the pictures with a warm this of life. Then his eyes traveled slowly to his own feet. The divan had been opened and transformed into a bed. Then he discovered that he was undressed. He had on a simple beautiful night gown. And there was a big bunch of wild flowers of many varieties on the table. His head cleared swiftly, and he then saw himself a little on one elbow with extreme caution and listened. The big boat was not moving. It was he believed still tied up at the same place, but he could hear no voices out where he had last seen armies of men fighting the forest fires in the distance. Had they succeeded in checking their course?

He then dropped back on his pillow, and his eyes rested on the flag. When his blood stirred again as he looked at a map which indicated where the great Abbeinn disaster had so lately occurred. Wherever people went and came that disaster was well known of and spoken of with horror and excitement. Yet it was not common. Hardly was it seen, and never had it come so far south as other floods joining it. Many things came to Walter now, things that he had heard in general Vivians lines, and up and down the rivers, through country side, in cities, and towns, in rural districts and everywhere he had traveled. Once he had read the full end of a report the Emperor of Abbeinn and her state had sent in to every Christian general.

"We do not know why the enemy did those things, but Concoctinn Aronburg has sent any agents to find out. Few men have been able to recover from the horror of it, and other great disasters, which spread to the far handwaters of the Mis-Holocaust Run. Concoctinn Aronburg stated that there had never been flood or disaster explosions in this region or where he advanced, though forest fires have surprised him, and it is fact that neither Pickle all or Vivians in these disasters which have undermined the apprehension of the whole world. The Concoctinn made a no success in their own investigations."

At least that was the unusual gist of what Walter had so intensely read with great interest of Emperor Vivians report. But he had never associated it with the reports on other great war disasters past or present. It was of the horrors heard and read awful stories, the total destruction of Bengal County that he had and so many other towns and villages by the biggest flood that ever occurred in fiction or reality. And so it was Abbeinn and her destruction. "Mainly he no great find out why she was destroyed."

He closed his eyes and thought of the long winter weeks he had passed near Northern Angelina, watching for some sign of evidence of anything those who knew about the cause of the first great flood horror of November.

It was there also far later he had heard and read most about this great Abbeinn flood and explosion horror, and yet no one he had talked with, had ever seen it. No one knew whether it was a true report or whether the nations only dreamed of it, and if real whether it was caused by explosions of unusual force or of natural results like earthquake or distant volcanic eruptions which had thrown down the mountain dikes and let the torrent loose. Some stories said that the disaster was along but gradual, that even now though it was early in August and so late since that time, Abbeinn or what was left of her was still under a vast expanse of water, other said that the flood still existed in some parts of the territory so that some of the towns thus inundated would be recovered or restored for many years. It was after these horrors he had learned of pergar, and about this great Concoctinn leader, and yet no one had talked with or had even seen him, no one knew whether he was young or old, a piggy or giant. Many declared that he was strong, that he could twist a gun barrel dials in his hands some others said that he was old, so old that he never appeared young.

And never did any of the Angelinian soldiers, or any one upon his mouth about the Supreme Person Hendro Darger, the master of all the Concoctinn and its branches. Everywhere he remained a secret. No matter what he did he did not disclose his identity, so that if one saw a fleet of soldiers on horseback, with the Concoctinn standard one had to make his own guess, whether Darger was among them or not.

But these things were known—that the keenest, quickest, and strongest man of the army, and of his mothers brought to the generals of various or less the richest and most important information, and that they carried to all Christian armies the greatest numbers of race of child slaves that any one could have ever thought of procuring. So much the name Darger dragged out of Walter's memory.

It came to him now when why the Concoctinn were so occupied in trying to find out the cause of so many disasters. But his memory had lost its grip on that awful incident while retaining vividly its hold on the stories, and rumors of the mystery Concoctinn man Darger.

Walter pulled himself a little higher on his pillow and with a new interest scanned the cabin. He had never heard of such a disaster before. Yet here he had received the proof of its existence, and of the greatness of its extent. This now easily made history of the great northern of Calverlinian war floods, and always been of absorbing interest to him. He sometimes wondered why it was that for so long a time the outside world had known so little about it, and believed so little of what it heard. A long time ago he had named an article telling briefly the story of this half of a Calverlinian continent, for which a country for two years nearly, war and tragedy of unusual fury, had come on to be added by the most gigantic floods of record, and come in down on in a way to horrify and thrill the hearts of men women and children.

He had told of huge forts with thirty foot stone bastions, that had been swept away by the torrent, or great river marshes which had fired their horridness in battle being stranded on ground far from rivers. He had described the coming into this northern section of the Calverlinian state, of thousands and hundreds of thousands of the bravest and best blooded men of Calverlinia, Angelina and Abbeinnia, and how these many thousands had continued to come with relief and provisions for the many millions of survivors and refugees refugees, bringing with them prisoners of war forced to work to rebuild the damage done, until out of the wreckage of the great northern disaster rose many camps for refugees. And these rescuers he had called lords of northern Calverlinian men who he held power of life and death in the hollow of their hands, until the great flood yielded its last victim, on who showed flood disasters they were overpowered, then the enemy of mankind.

And Walter after writing these things had stuffed his manuscript away in the bottom of his trunk at army barracks at Angelina Agathia, for he believed it was not in his power to do justice to the people surviving of this horrible disaster.

The powerful and beautiful Northern Calverlinian cities and towns were either gone or still under flood waters. Like dethroned Christian Monarchs, stripped to the level of the most humble men, they lived in the memory of what had been. That was not under water still lay scattered in wreckage over hundreds of miles of land. The wreckage hill at Mildred greenburg still remained, and the mighty hand of the Concoctinn ruled the destinies of the Calverlinian people, and were bent on looking for the results of the disaster, cause and the reason why, and who was really responsible.

It was this thought, the thought that the whole nation, the Concoctinn, the law, and the interest of the world in general and one of the powerful forces of the wilderness had set in this cabin of the big boat that came to Walter, as he drew himself still higher against his pillow. A greater thrill possessed him than the thrill of his hunt for the men who know anything about the making of such awful disasters. The men among the glendolinnians who ordered these big explosion and flood disasters to be created, were the worst of all murderers, whole and murderers of whole nations of people, and the worst of all, a dreadful holocaust for whom there could be no pity. Of all things the whole nation wanted those men who caused the disasters most, and he Walter Starring was the first chosen one to consummate its desire, while violent and her sisters were going to try their own luck at it in the next month, fearing he and others might not succeed. Yet in spite of that he felt upon himself the strangest unrest of a greater adventure, than the quest for the ones who may know of the cause of such disaster horrors. It also was an amazing thing, that could not be seen, urging him, rousing him from the slough into which they had fallen because of his wound and sickness. It was surely after all the most vital of things, a matter also of Angelina's own existence. It also consisted of his own life. Gertrude Angelina had absolutely lost all chances in her successful effort to save him from a hidden assassin who had tried to kill him deliberately, not only with a blade and intent but because he was out for that information. That she had saved him afterwards only added to the grave necessity of an explanation, and settle the present matter before he allowed another thought of the Abbeismian flood and other horrors to enter his head. This strong resolution reiterated itself in his mind as the machine-like voice of duty. He was not thinking of the Gemini law, and yet the consciousness of his accountability to that great law kept repeating itself. In the very face of it Walter Starring knew also that something besides the obligation of the thing was urging him, something that was becoming deeply and dangerously personal. At least he was trying to think of it as quite dangerous. And that interest was his unbecoming interest in the fact that the girl knew all about his adventure. It was an interest distinctly removed from any unusual code that might have governed him in his many experiences of adventures with Violet and her sisters themselves. Comparatively or surely if they and Gertrude were in the room now

The Vivian girls would have been a hundred times the lovelier. He conceded the point smiling a bit grimly as he continued to study that part of the big cabin which he could see from his pillow. He lost interest, temporarily at least, in the Abbeismian flood. Not long ago the one question to which, above all others he had desired an answer was, why had Angelina Aronburg rescued him from the accursed who worked so desperately to kill him in ambush and so hard to save him afterwards. What interest had the beautiful little girl in him. He had heard lots about her, but this was his first meeting with her. Now as he looked about him, the question which repeated itself insistently was, what relationship also did she bear to general Concentinian Aronburg.

Undoubtedly she was his niece. For her course caused a fierce blooded offspring he thought, one like Cleopatra herself, not afraid of an adventure of her own not afraid of the worse enemies, not afraid to destroy when necessary, and equally quick to rescue any one from peril, and to make amends if she did make a mistake.

There suddenly came the quiet opening of the cabin door to break in upon his thought. He hoped it was Angelina Aronburg returning to him. It was the good old doctor however. The old surgeon stood over him for a moment, and then put his hand to his forehead. He said something and nodded his head, his sunken eyes gleaming with ardent satisfaction. Then he put his hands under Walter's arms, and lifted him until he was sitting upright, with four pillows at his back.

"Much obliged," said Walter. "That is making me feel better. Yet if you don't mind doctor -- I have not had anything to eat for six days, and --"

"I myself have brought you something to eat," Walter broke in a very soft voice behind him. The doctor had slipped away, and Gertrude Angelina stood in his place. Walter of course stared up at her speechless. He heard the door close behind the old doctor. Then slowly Angelina Aronburg drew up a chair, so that the first time he could see her clear eyes with the light of day full upon her face. He forgot that six days ago, she had rescued him from his deadliest enemy. He for that moment forgot the existence of the tremendous Abbeismian flood. Her slimness was as it had pictured itself to him in the hot sands near the verge of the forest fire. Her hair was as he had seen it there but it was more a better formed now and she had a big red ribbon on her head rounding him off the wings of some butterfly. But it was her eyes that he stared at, and so fixed was his look that the red lips trembled a bit on the verge of a smile. She was not embarrassed. There was no color in the clear witness of her skin, except that redness of her lips.

"I thought you had dark blue eyes," he said bluntly. "I --"

"Please Walter," she interrupted him, sitting down close beside him. "Will you please eat something now?"

A spoon was at his mouth, and he was forced to take it in or have its contents spilled over him. The spoon continued to move quickly between the bowl and his mouth. He was therefore robbed of speech. And the girl's eyes as sure as as he were alive were beginning to laugh at him. They were a wonderful blue, with little golden specks in them like the freckles he had seen in wood violets. Her lips parted. Between their bewitching redness he saw the pines of her white teeth. In a big crowd of beautiful children, with her glorious golden hair uncovered, and her eyes looking straight at him, one would have picked her out. But close like this, with her eyes smiling at him she was indeed a adorable little girl. Something of Walter's thoughts must have shown in his face, for suddenly the little girl's lips parted a little, and the warmth went out of her eyes, leaving them cold and distant. He finished the soup, and she rose again to her feet.

"Please don't go yet," he said pleadingly. "If you do I will get up and follow. I am quite sure I deserve a little something more than just soup."

"Not now," she said. "It's the doctor's orders. But he says that you may have plenty of boiled fish and muffins for supper." she assured him.

"You know surely I do not mean that. I want to know why you rescued me from the man who shot me, and what you who is a little girl think you are going to do with me."

"I answered you because you are of our side -- and I do not know what to do with you except keep you on the boat," she said looking at him most tranquilly, but with what he thought was a growing shadow of perplexity in her eyes. "Evans said if he caught the man who shot you he will fasten a big stone to his back and throw him in the river with his hands tied behind his back. Evans means what he says. He thinks the man is a blood thirsty --"

"As the glandelinian officers who tried to murder a whole nation by flood and explosion," Walter interjected.

"Exactly," Walter said. "I don't think he would allow any one to hurt you now if he can help it, and he won't let you go on in your journey unless I told him to. And I don't believe I'm going to allow you to do that for quite a spell." she added, the soft glow flashing back into her eyes for an instant. Not while these woods are so full of perils and such big forest fires are sweeping them. And you must not forget the splendid work the doctor has done on your head. My Uncle general Concentinian Aronburg must see that. And that if the general wishes to let you continue on your odd adventure, why --" she shrugged her slim shoulders, and made a little gesture with her hands.

In that same moment there suddenly came over her a change, nay about nearly as sudden as the passing of lightning itself. Or we may say it might be as if she was hiding or trying to hide something she did not want to let out, and yet which had suddenly broken beyond her control, for an instant and had betrayed something important she wished to say. The beautiful glow went out of her eyes, and in its place came a sort of light, that was almost fear or pain, or contrition or whatever else one emotion may be there. She came nearer to Walter again, and somehow, looking up at her, he thought of the little fawn singing at the end of its birch twig to give him courage. It must have been because of her throat, so white and soft, which he saw pulsing like a beating heart, before she again spoke to him.

"I have a terrible confession to make Walter Starring," she said, her voice barely rising above a whisper. "I'm sorry I found you going out on such a mission. It is too dangerous. I have tried to persuade Violet and her sisters from going but they won't give up. I'm sorry the sneaky hurt you, but I can thank God and His Blessed Mother that I saw that man behind the rock from my boat when I heard the shots. But I cannot tell you more than that because it would be to your peril and cure. And I know it is impossible for you to proceed onward to your mission because I won't let you." she paused one of her hands creeping to her bare throat as if to cover the throbbing that he saw there.

"Why is it impossible?" he demanded. "I'm leaning away from my pillow so that he might bring himself nearer to her."

"Because you are of the Gemini, and I found out a personal friend of danger."

"The Gemini yes," he said his heart thrumming inside the breast of his. "I am one of the members. Violet and her sisters coaxed me to join. I am out to get the information that even the whole world is seeking, and to capture those who might have had a hand in it as they are the greatest of murderers. But my commission has nothing to do with the shooting at me behind the bush. Please explain to me what that has got to do with it. Am I your prisoner and you may mistake for me for a hidden enemy?"

"No that is not it. But your mission is too dangerous. I don't want you to go. And it's too difficult."

At that moment Walter Starring placed another thing higher than duty, and in his eyes was the full confession of it, like the glow of a subdued fire. The little girl's fingers drew more closely at her throat.

"Then let us be friends," he said. "Friends for we are of one side."

"We are friends," she said, her eyes widening slowly as if she saw that now born thing riding over all other things in his awfully beating heart. And she drew a step nearer to him.

"I'm not so sure what your mission is," she said, forcing the words out one by one. "I am going to investigate it however before you can proceed. I have discovered you, and know who you are and therefore I'm not going to allow you to run into too much peril. The army cannot spare you."

After this, Walter Starring was wondering exceedingly, to what great depths he had fallen in the first moments of his strange disillusionment. something like an electric shock, perhaps even more than that, must have betrayed itself in his face. But now for a moment or so he did not speak. Later he called himself a great fool for allowing such an adventure to happen to him, for it was as if he had measured his preferred work by what its future might hold for him. In a low quiet voice Gertrude Angelina was saying again that for reasons she stated before she objected strongly to his proceeding further, even if she had to make him a prisoner to keep him with her. She was not excited, yet he understood now why it was he had thought her eyes were very dark blue. They had changed very swiftly. The Violet freckles in them were now like likelittle flocks of gold. They were almost watery in their glow, neither blue or gray now, and with that threat of gathering lightning in them. For the first time he saw the slightest flush of color in her cheeks. It deepened even as he hid out his hands. He knew that it was not anything like embracement. It was the heat of the fire back of her eyes.

"It's funny, and strange," he said making an effort in speaking like a man who had committed a rash sin and wished to reconcile himself before God. "You see I have been told that Conventinian Aronburg wishes every secret service man of the army to go and also I have been told that Abbiann was flooded by Manley's order, as he wished to prostrate Calvernia so she cannot stand on her feet to resist him, and if it is the truth general Vivian wishes greatly for the information, and therefore it is hard for me to give up the undertaking when I have even promised Violet and her sisters that I was going to make a try. But that is not a reason you should wish to prevent me, even though we be friends is it. Or do you fear I am doing something which the Vivian Girls desire to do themselves."

"He felt that he was humbling himself again, except for the six days growth on his face. He tried to laugh, but it was a rather a very poor attempt. At Gertrude Angeline did not seem to hear him. Nevertheless she was looking at him, apparently looking into, and through him, with those wide open glowing eyes. Then she sat down."

"You as I have discovered are one of the best well known members of the great Gemini." she said the softness gone suddenly out of her voice. "Therefore you are one of the most honorable men I have ever met Walter. Your cause is against all wrong. You seek the information regarding the cause of the great flood disasters as well as the explosions. Is it not so?"

To him it appeared to be the voice of an inquisitor. she was demanding an answer from him. He nodded.

"Yes it is so."

The fire in her eyes deepened. "And yet you say you want to take such an awful chance, in spite of the fact that a hidden Glandelinian sniper has tried to kill you. And you were pursued for nearly fifty miles by forest fires and had a terrible time to escape and got almost overtaken once. Why do you wish to risk all this Walter when others cannot succeed either. Why commit suicide. I would not do this either on the case under no circumstances unless I had a fair play. And surely you haven't no show at all. Why take such chances Walter?"

"He was cornered. He sensed the awful humiliation of it, the impossibility of confessing to her the wild impulse to her the wild impulse that had moved him before he knew she was the famous girl say Angeline Aronburg which all of the worse Glandelinian generals fear. And she did not wait for him to answer."

"And if you secure this information, and even catch some of those responsible--what will you do with them?" she asked.

"They will be burned at the stake," said Walter. "They are the worst murderers the world has ever seen since it came into being. Look at the horrors they were responsible for. Great explosions, fires and enormous floods wiping out countless numbers of lives. Some one has got to find them."

"And one of the Glandelinians wishes to kill you because he knows what your purpose is--who almost succeeds--what is the penalty for that?" she leaned toward him waiting impatiently. Her hands were clasped tightly in her lap, the spots were brighter in her cheeks.

"From fifty years to life," he acknowledged. "But of course there may be circumstances,--"

"If so you do not know them," she interrupted him. "You say that those who were responsible for the big explosions and forest fires, and such awful floods are murderers. No they are assassins. You know I saved you from the scoundrel that tried to kill you. Then why is it you would disregard my advice and desire to continue on your dangerous mission, and risk such perils from the enemy when it will avail you nothing. Why Walter. That may be ingratitude."

Walter shrugged his shoulders hopelessly. "I shouldn't it is true," he confessed. "I guess you are proving I was wrong in my intentions. I ought to reward you, and allow you and your followers to take me back to the Christian lines as soon as you can. But you see it strikes me there is a big personal element in this. I was a man almost killed. There is no chance of our returning that way unless the majority of the forest fire passes. And I thank you for aiding me when that scoundrel tried to assassinate me. You have nursed me back to life, and therefore I must--"

"But that does not change the situation or alter it in a bit," insisted Gertrude Angeline. "If I had not come in time you would have been murdered. Do you understand Walter. If it had not been for my arrival I am quite certain he would have followed on that shot that dropped you by filling you full of bullet holes. I at least would have called it assassination not murder. You may call it murder but assassination in my view point is worse. If that Glandelinian sniper is still in the woods, then I also am in peril for rescuing you. And an honorable man, would not therefore disregard my advice but I'm only a little girl. I am a mere child and know a lot about when it is safe to make an expedition, and when it is not."

"But Gertrude, these men who created those flood, explosion and forest fire disasters are worse fiends than the devils of the infernal regions. They deserve no mercy at all. I think someone ought to capture them if able to find them out. Think of the Vivian Girls. Don't they go out on adventures that no general approves of, when women should do it in their stead. They are too good for such things. And--"

"Perhaps Walter you are right. But they adore you and don't like it. They are worried about you. They sent me to trail you, to shadow you until I was able to save you."

She was on her feet her eyes flaming down upon him. In that moment her childish beauty was like the beauty of one of the Vivian Girls almost. The poise of her slender body, her glowing cheeks, her golden hair, her gold flickers with the light of diamonds in them, held him speechless.

"I was sorry and went back to save you," she said. "I wanted you to live for them, after I saw you like that on the sand with a big forest fire coming head-on. Evans said you are indiscreet, and that I should have killed your one y who shot at you without mercy but I didn't. Perhaps he was right. And yet even my followers have that pity for you. I'm firm in my own decisions. You are under my care, and you must obey even though I'm a little girl. You shan't go until I know all is well. If you refuse to listen to me you're my prisoner until all is safe."

She turned quickly, and he heard her moving away from him. Then from the door she said more firmly holding her head high:

"General Jack Evans will take you comfortably Walter. No more my words."

Then the door opened and closed. She was gone. And he was alone in the cabin again. The swiftness of the change in her surely filled him with great amazement. It was as if he had suddenly touched fire to an explosive. But there had been the flame but no violent destruction. She had not raised her voice, yet he heard in it the tremble of an emotion that was consuming her like fire. He had seen the flame of it in her face and eyes. His purpose and the nature of his mission which was really exceedingly dangerous almost to suicide, had surely tremendously upset her, changing in an attitude or in an instant her attitude toward him. The thought that came to him made his face burn under its scrub of beard. Did she think he was intending to commit suicide. The shock that must have betrayed itself in his face, when she said she was in knowledge of his mission--had those things warned her of unseen perils moving against him? The heat went slowly out of his face. It was impossible. She could not think of such things facing him. How could she a little girl know it must have been a sudden giving way under terrific strain. She had warned him, she had told him of the worry the Vivian Girls had about him, and she was beginning to realize more and more his peril--that even Evans was right--that she should have even destroyed that one sniper, and not allowed to him the chance to escape with only a wound.

The thought pressed itself heavily upon Walter Starring. It soon brought him back to a realization of how small a part he had played in this whole hour in the cabin. He had felt sure offered to go on a mission which danger he had no right to face, even though he was a member of the Gemini. Her quick girlish instinct had told her there could be no distinction between him and her own peril, unless there was a reason and a show for him at least. And now reason had suddenly come to him with the first glimpse of her as he lay in the hot sand. He had fought against it in the boat, it had mastered him in those thrilling moments when he had beheld this slim beautiful little human creature riding fearlessly into the boiling waters of the rapids while she utterance rushing past the gauntlet of forest fires. Her eyes her hair, the sweet low voice, that had been with him in his fever, had become a sure and definite and unalterable part of him. And this must have shown in his eyes and face when she chided him for his "foolish Adventure"--when she told him the dangers of it. And now she was afraid she would not listen to her advice and she would feel keep him as a prisoner before she'd let him go. She was regretting that she had not told him sooner. She had not understood, what she had seen betraying itself during those few seconds of his proffered friendship with her. She also saw a man whom a sneaking on a enemy had nearly killed, a man who represented a Gai Gemini, a man whose power held Glandelinian spies in the hollow of his hand. But the Glandelinians were watching for these kinds of Christian agents more than any one else. And she had looked startled when she told him what she knew of the dangers he was facing.

In the science of the Gai Gemini analysis Walter Starring always placed himself in the position of the one he might be hunting. And now he was beginning to see the present situation from the view point of Gertrude Angeline. He was satisfied that she had made a desperate struggle to save him, and that until the last moment she had tried to down the man who betrayed him. She had shown all inclinations to explain the situation to him. She had made all the explanation she could. And it was simply a matter of common sense to concede that there must be a powerful motive for her warning. There was but one conclusion for him to arrive at--the danger he was facing in his adventure, was more important to her, than in keeping the secret of why Violet and her sisters were worried about him.

Walter was not unconscious of the breach in his own armor. He had once weakened just as general Vivian had awakened that day three weeks or so ago, when the Vivian Girls wanted to go out to Vivian Wicky to learn something there.

"I'll swear that they are not going," the general had said. "I'll gamble my life on that. It's too dangerous."

And because the chief Christian general, with many years of experience behind him had believed that, the Vivian Girls had been able to go to that dreadful place, but had gone on other scouting work. But once a prisoner had been brought before the general when they were in his presence one who it was claimed he knew all about the flood horrors. Walter that is himself had caught this man. He would never forget the last time he had seen the eyes of these Vivian Girls, great blue glorious pools of gratitude as they looked at him, blazing fires of venomous righteous hatred when they turned on the prisoner. And Walter had said to the general "Abbasniam is justice is blind if something is not done to force a confession out of the prisoner." But the general not being a stickler on regulations when it came to Walter, had made no answer. The incident came back to Walter as he waited for the promised coming of Jack Evans. He began to appreciate general Vivian's point of view, and it was comforting, because he realized his own logic was assailable. If general Vivian would have been question that prisoner now still, he knew what the argument would be. There was absolute proof of such a crime against this Glandelinian prisoner, but nevertheless he had fought long and desperately to hide his guilt. In the case of Gertrude Angeline there was proof of his own dangers now. She had tried to kill the sneak who had shot him from ambush. She was justified before Heaven to do so for the Holy Christian cause. Therefore she had properly warned him not to proceed until she saw an opening for him.

In spite of the legal force of the argument, which he was bringing against himself, Walter felt greatly unconvinced. Violet, and her sisters had they been in the place of Angeline Aronburg, would have finished his assailant then and there if they had to pursue him through the woods to do so. She would have realized the nonsense of letting him escape, and probably would have commanded their followers to capture him also if possible. But Gertrude Angeline had forgotten and therefore had gone to the other extreme. She was repentant of course of having allowed the scoundrel to escape, but was making restitution for her mistake, and in making that restitution had crossed far beyond the dead line of caution herself. She had frankly told him who she was, the danger of his adventure, she had brought him into the cabin of this boat in her desire to save him, and therefore in so doing had apparently hopelessly ensnared herself in the new net of that same peril—if that hidden enemy or enemies saw fit to act. She had done these things with courage and conviction. And of such a girl scout probably less than eleven years of age, Walter thought, general Vivian and all his officers and even the Vivian Girls must be very proud.

He looked slowly about the boat cabin again, and apparently each thing that he seemed to observe was a living voice braving up a dream for him. These voices seemed to tell him that he was in a refuge under the care of a little child angel. Through the two western windows, came the last glow of the western horizon of forest fire far off hiding behind smoke clouds it being now night, but it was like a golden benediction finding its way into a sacred refuge. Here in the forest there had once been happiness but now it was threatening desolation.

How she could have found this refuge he could not tell. In a dark corner but on one of the big white bear rugs lay the snore sleeping cat. And then at the far end of the boat cabin a large Crucifix of Our blessed Lord glowed for a few moments in a last hope of the gradually disappearing fire glow.

Unconscious stole upon him now. He believed her now. And again there rose up in him that new born thing which had set strange and new fires in his heart, and which from this hour he knew he must fight until dead. For an hour after the last of the glow was obliterated by heavier smoke he lay in the gloom of darkness. Only the lapping of the water under the boat, broke the strange stillness of the evening. He heard no sound of life, no voice, no tread of feet, and he wondered where the girl scout and her followers had gone and if the big boat was still tied up near the big bar bays and whether the fire had struck there or not. And for the first time he asked himself another question.

"Where was Conventinian Aronburg and his great army?"

It was utterly dark in the cabin at this time, when suddenly the stillness was broken by low voices on the outside. A few minutes later the door opened, and some one came in. A moment later some one lit a match, and in the strange shifting glow if it Walter saw the strange face of Evans the Guardian of the Vivian Girls. One after the other he lighted the lamps but only four of them, and he did not turn toward the bed until he had finished. Then at this moment Walter had his first good impression of the man. He was tall and built with the strength of a giant. His arms were very long, and he was as straight as a stick. In the darkness and glow of the lamp light his head appeared strangely like the head of some gargoyles coming to take him. He was wide eyed, somewhat heavy lipped, and if in that strange garb he now wore he looked more like a fierce pirate and cutthroat of Walter. Such a man he thought if he happened to be a Glandelinian. Instead of an Abbasniam could easily make play out of the business of murder. And yet in spite of his ugliness, Walter again felt a strange inclination to like the man more than ever.

Evans grinned. Walter observed that it was quite a huge grin for his mouth was quite big. He said,

"W. say you ver lucky feller!" he announced this in broken English. "You sleep lak that in vines so bad and not back on that sand bar lak so dead feash in se forest so lak I bring you Walt. But what Gertrude done see one gran beg mistake. I say to she, Capture se sniper and tie se rock round heem neck and make heem wait heem see. Flunge heem once in se gran beg reavor, Gert. And se say, she too late, she no catch heem in se time even though she shh shoot heem a liddle. she say to me, she says make heem weel, and feed heem se gran feash in se dish. So I bran you heem se gran beg feash which she promise for youse, and when you have se eat, I tell you somet'ing."

He slowly returned to the door, and brought back with him a large wicker basket. Then he slowly and carefully carried the big round table and placed it up beside Walter, and then carefully laid out before him the boiled fish which Gertrude had sent to him. With it was bread and butter, and some cheese, and a large earthen pot of hot tea.

"She say to me says she, that eem all you have because of se favor. I say to her said I I do not stuff heem with much so that he die."

"You too don't want to see me die. Is that it Evans?"

"No, no, but se Glandelinian sniper I kill him when I see. You make wan ver good an for se grand Gemini, Walter, and se Vivian Girls, for whom I'm se guardian, they say to me says they, Walter heem verry foine man." Evans was no longer grinning. He stood back and pointed at the food. "You eat quick, for sure se am se hung'y. And when you have made se gran beg feash, I tell you somet'ing quick."

Now that he saw the luscious bit of finnan and Haddy before him, Walter felt more hungry than before, probably possessing the hungering emptiness of those six days and six nights. And as he ate he observed that Evans was performing curious duties. He straightened a couple of rugs, took out one big twelve foot one and shook it like a handkerchief making clouds of dust out side and then brought it back in, then ran fresh water into the flower basket or vase, picked up half a dozen scattered socks that he accidentally knocked down from the case, and then to Walter's increasing interest, produced a dust cloth from somewhere and began to dust. Walter finished his fish, the two slices of bread, the thick slices of cheese, and his tea. He then felt tremendously good. The hot tea was like a trickle of new life through every vein in his body, and he had the desire to get up and try out his legs.

After a few moments when he was through eating, as briefly as possible Walter told Evans in English also, of his adventure, why he set out, why he thought he had been shot, and then of other things.

"What's your purpose?" Evans demanded, coming up ferociously with the cloth in his great hands. "You no see sir, that your situation is ver foine! It's dangerous. You like eat a suicide!"

"No I do not think it is anything funny Evans," grinned Walter. "I was just thinking of finding out the cause of floods and explosion disasters. You know that of Abbasniam, and other places."

"Abbasniam," exploded Evans, dumping his dust cloth and bring his huge hands down upon the table with a smash, that almost wrecked the dishes and made the table jump like a frightened thing. "You have eat, and now you no you lissen. You have never hear properly or see before of se flood at se Abbasniam. Do you know who seon most of heem. Well an eat see se. See I see heem beg flood. See eat nap on se wall of se cabin. Well eat shows se beg flood, and what course se take. See. On se map here, is what was se levee of se beg rivers. Abbasniam city se biggest and strongest place and best place in se north countrie. Flood se go four hunder miles in se day covering all se countrie drowning many peoples. Gertrude Angeline, she escape narrowly with she life with se friends who with her in se city when se explosion crash took it place. Explosion se crack se ground for hunder miles round like se shivered glass in se window pane if I crash se feast through heem like die. And he she. And he shattered a glass frame of a broken window in the cabin with only a blow of the palm of his hand. See what I mean. I run sixteen or hunder miles without stop for rest to try give alarm to some places, no catching se horse on se way as no horse be there. Flood pull down se forest of se trees quicker than se tornado. I was not afraid of nothing when se disaster co'ed. You lissen. You hear what I say."

"I hear you."

"Que liddle, Bein. Then I tell you w'at Evans that I see see se going do with you, you of se Gemini. Gertrude she say she no let you proceed on your journey until you get well. she say you make van gran beg mistake to go out on your trip. she say she too much little bird heart, to take that chance herself, and too much pity for you to die. I say to her, says I, keep heem here, so what happen se eedz eyes behind se rock won't happen again. I tell you, Walter woods, she full of hidden enemies, we have to hide ourselves often. But se Gertrude, she say to me, do I not let heem go away until he get better or he may not live. I'm telling you. You hunderstand heem. And she tell me to come and bring you nice beg feash, and tell you what is going happen if you try go away from these batu bateau and go after adventure for se information. There is no one can gain se inform. Enemy too wise, too many spies could. You compran! If you try go away, and we know not what to do, and enemy was going kill you and not our fault. Woods are full of danger. If not so enemy, then so forest fire. Gertrude say you must not go away, and she tell other boys and so girl about--to keep eye on you so you won't go far away. She tell a bring sat word with so forest. Everywhere set I see dangerous. Forest fire she burn hundreds of miles of so country already it. You know what I mean, enemy. Hear don't act. You listen hard what I say."

If ever a worker of great iniquity lived on earth, Walter might have judged Glandelinia as the greater of it all. In this part of the war up to now at least, the Glandelinian nation had worked herself up to a most ferocious pitch, and carried on her war against the Abbeonians states now with flood, fire and explosion horror more than fighting. And if there was ever anyone who hated the Glandelinians Walter also might have judged Evans as that in a man in these moments. His eyes rolled when he spoke. His wide mouth snarled in the virulence of its speech. His thick neck grew corded, and his huge hands grew or clinched menacingly upon the table. Walter remembered that Evans himself crouched around against Glandelinia was a fierce as a pirate, yet in other ways was a gentle as a child. This man could shock a cow with his monstrous hands, and yet a minute or so before he had settled the cut, cleaned the rug, watered the flowers and dusted. He was dangerous to the Glandelinians. Walter could see that in his face. And in the same breath Walter sensed the fact that if he himself was a Glandelinian and tried to harm Gertrude or even the Vivian girls, that would be sufficient to fire his awful strength and fury into a blazing volcano of action. Getting a good view of him in the lamp light Walter saw that despite his bulldog expression of face he was quite handsome nevertheless. Since a guardian of the "Princesses" and others was priceless under all conditions right. And he had warned him of danger the same as Gertrude had.

"I think I understand what you mean sir," he said. "She warned me too, saying I must not go out or make any effort to understand condition or otherwise she would make me a prisoner until I will. She says Glandelinians hide everywhere, and that I will be killed if I try to go away alone. Are you sure what she says is true?"

"What you think I lie wait. Jack Evans, who guard so Vivian Girl Princesses with so life, who go through so dangers everywhere, who fight so battles, who destroy so enemies to save them, who save you from so snipers. I lie. If so think so go ahead leave. You will be one great big fool. Glandelinia. She like kill you for she know your mission. You go, you sorry."

"No, no, I do not believe you are telling me an untruth. But I know now why she told me, that when she was near. How does she know that I'm in my such peril?"

"Because she, through so Vivian girls see need of so plan and she come after you, sort of shadow you lak, set eyes why. She then say to me save she, Evans, you tell him he must wait for general Conventin. Arronburg. And you tell him you and mainly, so he make no mistake and go away. And she tell me set before all so followers of her--all so boy and girl scouts, gathered round so bang camp fire--and they all shout up like like so trumpet--that any watch and warn you, if you try go away. Go if you like, no one stop, you so own boss, but if so do, and if anything happen to you, set eyes not our fault."

Walter reached out his hand. "Let's shake Evans. I'll give you my word, that I won't try to go away, until I see all right, or until it is in my power to do so, and we've had a good stand up fight with the wicked Glandelinians u with the earth under our feet, and we have whipped Manley like the dog he and his army in and are. Is it a go?"

Evans stared for a moment, and then his face broke into a wide grin. "You like like so bang battles with so enemy Walter?"

"Yes. I love a scrap with such a wicked man as he is. And I love to keep company with a good man and soldier of Christlike you."

"One of Evans huge hands moved quickly over the table and embraced Walters. Joy shone on his face."

"And you promise to come with us, when you are strong and well. And to stick with Gertrude through so adventure?"

"If I don't Evans, I'll let you take the rock around my neck and drop me into the river."

"You are brave comrades," cried the delighted human element. "In and down so rivers can no man of so Glandelinian or y, no Glandelinian general, shut out while Conventin Arronburg. You will like him when you see him. He ever read you hear see. "Sold only his face grow clouded. "But so head wait!" he added anxiously.

"It will soon be well Evans, especially if you will help me Evans. Right now I would like to get up if I'm allowed to do so. At least I want to stretch my legs. Was my head bad?"

"Ever bad yes. So bullet, head scrape so scalp off--no no, and break about so temple skull, and turn so brain so sick. Doc say so bullet make so rock head you, not so bullet set. I think you be good fighting men in we. Manley has no like me, no like you, no like so Vivian Girls, no like so Gertrude. We too dangerous we fool harm plenty much."

"And will you help me?"

Evans was a changed man. And again suddenly, Walter felt that night his gentle strength of his arm as he held him to his feet. For a few moments he was a trifle unsteady, but nevertheless but Jack Evans close to his side ready to catch him if he fell. So way, he walked slowly to one of the windows, and looked out. Across the river fully a mile and a half away, he saw the glow of fires.

"How came?" he asked.

"No wait. I KRT see so forest fires. She come up after us. She no go out. Bang blaze. Burn all country. Woods of so Mic-Hollister Run so no so in so smoke. So much smoke have make so bang fire, so hi bang water flow, so bang explosion to destroy so people of so a fair Calvernia. I no like sat. He no like so Glandelinian. From home Violet, and her sisters, say suffer from too much. He no like."

"Have so moved from the tar horn?"

"Yes three four days down so river. Fire she come up. Fighters say no could stop. Say burn so up to so tar horns. Out, all out, out what bang fire. Black loss zaburn like miles of bang gasoline tanks. Sky drakened like so arches by so black smoke all over miles of so country. Times she shoot so ten thousand feet. He no make mistake. He exaggerate. I tell so set eyes true. If you no believe, why ask so Gertrude Arronburg. She tell you set too."

"Why could they not stop it, and if they were beaten why are they not camping over here with us? They could add to our protection."

Evans gave a disgusted grunt. "Fire too bang, had to run lak us. And she also say you must not have noise or so heat of so bang fire near. She say to me save she, set disturb, and set make so worse with so fever. For so joke I say to her, say I, she see make you her husband so ten day. But she only laugh at set, and snap her little white finger. So fighters, they no can stay. They must make so try for so fight elsewhere or fire she go too bang. Wait general Arronburg come. He break Manley's head with hands two fists for making so bang fires in home beat country. I hope we have so fight with so Manley before then wait."

"We'll have it anyway some day Evans. We have armies of our own. Where is Conventin Arronburg, and when shall we see him?"

Evans shrugged his shoulders. "Nabby work, nabby more. He and home away, haem so long, long way off."

"Does he know anything about the destruction of Abbeonin?"

Slowly Evans turned Walter staring about, until he was facing him. "You ask what he know about so Abbeonin? Out. Out. Foolish question, wait. You need not ask nothing about what Conventin Arronburg knows about Abbeonin. The maid. No man in so world, no keep in so world, no so man in so world does not live who does not know about so horror at so Abbeonin. Gertrude she see so disaster. She look so part in so wrecking of so city. She seen so earthquake caused by so grand bang explosion. She see so grand bang flood. You ask her and she tell you she no make so bang lie. When you don't believe she prove to you, what she see. She got so picture of what she was."

"Everyone must know about it as I understand it," granted Walter, while talking back to his head. "But no one seems to know who was responsible. Will you bring me my pack and clothes in the morning. I want to shave and dress. I look like a pig in these whiskers."

"Whatever you desire, she will come in to borrow," Evans answered.

Evans was ahead of him, stretching the pillows, and stretched out the rumpled bed clothes. His huge hands were quick and capable as a woman, and Walter could not help admiring this ingenueness of the powerful officer. Once in the crust of those gorilla like arms that were working over his head, and it would be all over with the strongest man in even his own Division. He himself was on.

"Scant the report about set once more see, set--what?" he demanded.

"I was thinking, Evans--what will happen to me if I go out on the mission when I am well, but it isn't going to happen. Manley is not going to do anything to us, and I'm going to help general Vivian batter Manley away so badly, that no one will recognize the army for a long time."

"You wait," exploded Evans making a horrible grimace. "As for so Glandelinian who make so bang floods, and so bang fires, and so bang explosions, I choke him. I'll pound in his back to think of something else to say."

"Isn't he done now?" admitted Walter. "They are hard to find. Maybe we'll never know. He pointed down at the bed. "I'm driving her from that I'll bet," he said.

"I don't like it. Is she sleeping over there in the camp?"

"No I know not, but she see not here in so room. There room have belong to you," declared Evans. "You ask bad guess eh? You not drive her out. She got so room of her own. You no need to have so worry."

He then began to cut out the light a lights, and left only the moon nearest the door burning. He turned toward Evans, said good night, and then went out. Nevertheless Evans had not exaggerated. There was danger in his going out, for he heard a click of the lock in the door. It was the intention of Gertrude to look him in, so that any one prowling about finding a locked door would not think any one was inside the cabin, or which boat was anchored near the middle of the river. Walter had no desire to be down again, for there was an feeling of uneasiness in his legs but outside of that the evil effects of his bullet wound made sickness no longer oppress him.

The army doctor in his camp would surely have called him something like a fool, for not allowing himself to get well in the usually prescribed way, but Walter was somehow or other already beginning to feel the demand for action. In spite of all the physical effort he had made, he found that his head did not hurt him any more, and also his mind was keenly alive. He returned to the window, through which he could see the extensive fires on the western shores, and found no difficulty in opening. As he did so he discovered that a strong window screen kept from him his eyes thrusting out his hand and should-ers. Through it came a warm, an unusually warm breeze, from a westerly wind, and he wondered if the warmth was not from the distant fires. Nevertheless it was fresh air and he did him good to fill his lungs with it again, and smell the fresh aroma of the forest. But occasionally there was the smell of burning wood and leaves in the air. It was awfully dark, and the enormous fires far across the river were brighter because of the deep darkness.

There was a no sign of the moon in the sky now, and strain his eyes as he could he could not see a single star. From far in the west he caught the low series of intonations of strange thunder, and knew from the sound fire fighters were blasting trees. Walter turned once more from the window, and went slowly to the end of the cabin in which the big organ stood. From here he observed with more ease the second divan, and after some examination he also observed the meaning now of two closed tied curtains, one at each side of the big cabin. They were drawn tightly together on a stout wire stretched two inches under the ceiling, and they shut off this end of the big boat, and turned at least a third of the unusually large cabin into the privacy of another persons bedroom. With growing uneasiness Walter felt sure he saw the evidence, that this had been the sleeping quarters of one of the chief heads of the forest rangers. At each side of the organ was a very small door, and he opened one of these just far enough to discover that it was a wardrobe closet for some girl. A third door opened on the shore side of the boat, but this was locked. Shut out from the view of the lower end of the cabin by a Japanese screen was a small dresser and a mirror. In the bright illumination that came from the nearest lamps, Walter bent over the open sheet of music on the organ. It was a hymn heard frequently in all Catholic Churches a Christmas Song.

His blood seemed to tingle, and suddenly he felt as if his brain was stirred by a strange and new emotion, a growing sensation that made his feet very uneasy, and also filled him with a strange and strong restlessness. At least he felt as though he had come suddenly to the edge of some great danger, some where within him a strange feeling and knowledge seized upon it, and understood.

Yet he knew it was not physical for him to fight. It was a strange peril which crept up and about him, something which he could not see or touch, and yet made his heart beat faster, and the blood came into his face. It seemed to draw upon him to be victorious over him, dragged his hand forth until his fingers closed upon a lacy crumpled bit of a handkerchief that lay on the edge of the keys of the organ.

It was that belonging to Gertrude Angelina, and like a thief he raised it very slowly and carefully. It smelled faintly of crushed roses, it was as if she were bending over him in his sickness again, and it was her breath that came to him. It was not thinking of her or of Angelina's famous girl scout. And then sharply he caught himself himself and placed the handkerchief back upon the organ of the keys. He tried to touch at himself but there was something where he went before there had been that thrill of which now he felt greatly ashamed.

He turned back to the window. The light had grown brighter and the blunder of explosions which showed many were blasting trees was coming nearer. He believed that believed that this branch of the forest fire, was coming up fast out of the west, and with it a dark darkness that was like the blackness of a pit. A strange dead stillness was creeping in now, and in that stillness it seemed to Walter that he could hear the creaking, all the creaking and hissing sound, also a crackling noise of the rushing flames, that flowed over the advance of the fire storm. New fires further off were glowing out, and as he looked at it, and as he stared into the darkness as if trying to pierce distance and place to see what sort of a shelter it was that Gertrude and her companions may have out there, there came over him these moments a desire that was almost mad. It was the desire to get out to escape, to leave behind him the memory of the cabin, and of Gertrude Angelina, and to persuade more on his own great adventure, the quest for the information concerning those who knew something about the making of the flood and explosion disasters. It was.

He heard the flames coming. Then he felt the motion of the boat. It was moving, and it was evident the girl decided to get to the middle of the river for safe keeping. At first the sound of the flames was like the crackling of hundreds of millions of popping popcorn, then suddenly it was like the roar of a winnowing windstorm. It was like an inundation of fire, and with it came drum after crash of timber from any falling trees, and now the black smoke was billowing by a perfect roof of flames, and all along the shore as far as he could see the whole stretch of trees simultaneously burst into a sudden wall of flame with a hissing roar. It had been a long time since Walter had observed such a fire hurricane. He closed the window to keep the heat and smoke out, and after that stood with his face flattened against the glass, staring over the river watching the trees burn like hellish fury. The nearest trees were all burned through now, and fell, and he shuddered. No amount of fire fighting ever done would keep that fire deluge back. He wondered if his big boat was safe, and whether the fire would leap across the river river. And now there was growing up a terrific wind with it. The trees on the fire side were torn down like paper made trees, flaming branches ripped off, torn to pieces or carried to the other side of flung with a hissing roar into the water. He imagined Gertrude Angelina in that awful tumult, and distress, the branch blown out of her, being forced to throw herself into the river, to swim with the logs and to reach it half drowned, blinded by the fire of fire, broken and beaten because of that even the thought of her companions did not seem, his mind. Thousands upon thousands of fire fighters were entirely inadequate to cope successfully with a fire storm like this that was burning the very forests on both sides of the river now, and roofing the whole stream for a great distance into a sea of fire. Suddenly he went to the door, determined to try and help her and if there was outside, to have his help. He beat desperately against it, first with one fist and then with both and felt it was unusually warm. He shouted. There was no response but the boat was moving faster and he could hear the noise and feel the trouble of engines. Then he exerted his strength, and forced his weight, against the door. It was solid.

He soon turned around, and then his eyes suddenly discovered in a corner with the light of the furthest lamp struck dimly his back and clothes. In ten seconds he was in possession of his pipe and tobacco. After that for nearly an hour he paced up and down the cabin, while the forest fire burned with or fell into the river with loud hisses, while the forest fire consumed the woods as it went upon destroying all life off the face of the earth. Comforted by the motion of the boat, and the company of his pipe, Walter did not feel it wise to beat at the door again. He waited and at the end of another hour and a half, the forest fire hurricane had stood down to a clear, and the trees and all brush were blazing straight upward. Looking out the window again he saw the water of the river covered with smoke, the cabin felt quite warm, and looking in the glare of the fire light, he observed to his surprise multitudes of dead flames floating on the surface of the river.

By god" said Walter to himself "the fire had made the water hot enough to cook the fish. It was a surprise the boat is not afire. The walls of the cabin are good and hot though too hot for to be touched with the hand. The thunder of falling trees continued, but the main forest fire had traveled east, and a again. The air that came in was like that from a blast furnace, and it probably did not take him his even an instance to close it again. Nevertheless he puffed out a cloud of smoke, and looked somewhat worried. Yet through peril in the worse place. If his miseries were true then Gertrude Angelina had certainly gone through a trying experience to night. And in a way the whole thing was a bit tragic. He was having visions now of a golden haired girl soaked to flames. He found a more he told himself that it was a good thing to think of her as he glanced out of the window again. He believed she was somewhere in another cabin wringing out her clothes now, and the scouts were working hard to boat out for the terrific ground fire to die down. They failed to escape. Probably he was hating the glandulins more for bringing all this discomfort, and humiliation upon her. It was not honorable that to narrow him any net even to make general, her uncle think and do if he knew that his niece had probably given up her own cabin to this streamer. What complications might arise if something like that came about a dozen times or more before he was roused enough to realize

It was past midnight, very past midnight, very late too, when Walter shivering looked himself to bed. Even then he was not able to sleep any length of time. The noise of the moving boat, and the sound of burning flames and hissing grow less and less as the boat got further and further from it, and the sound dropped itself off into nothingness slumber came at last. Nevertheless, that conflagration seemed entirely. Then he slept. Well at least, but not that, he might have been something like very close to sleep, or again had been asleep and was rousing for a moment close to consciousness, when he realized he heard a voice. It came about a dozen times or more before he was roused enough to realize it was a voice. And then suddenly, perceiving his slowly waking brain almost with the shock of an explosion it came so distinctly to him that in a moment he found himself sitting up straight, his hands clenched, eyes staring in the deep darkness, waiting for it to come again.

Somewhere very close to him, evidently in his room, a parrot within the very reach of his hands, a strange and indescribable voice had cried out in the darkness the voice which twice before had lost the slaves mysteriously in the waters below. The enemy has by flood killed a little girl. The enemy by flood has killed my little girl. The enemy by flood has killed my little girl. The enemy by flood has killed my little girl.

And Walter, staring holding his breath listened for the sound of another breath, which he felt sure would be the cry of the cry was in that room. For perhaps three minutes Walter made no sound whatever, at least that could be heard a few feet off from him. But just as yet was not fear that held him so quiet. It was something that he could not explain afterwards even to save his own life, even though he might have fancied it to be the sensation perhaps of one who for himself confronted for a moment by a presence more potent than that of flesh and blood. The enemy by flood has killed my little girl. Three times, once in his sickness or twice in his sickness, someone had cried out those words in his ears since the hour when Gertrude had rescued him from the accidental who had brushed him on the white carpet of sand. And it seemed as if now the voice was right in his very room.

Was it Jack Evans the first by some sort of unformed hunches, Walter listened carefully. Another minute passed. Then he slowly reached out a hand and groped about him, but very careful not to make a sound, urged by the feeling that someone was almost within reach of him. He then flung back his blanket, and stood out in the middle of the floor.

Yet he heard no kind of movement, not even a soft footfall of retreat or advance. He then lighted a match, and held it very high above his head. In its yellow glow he could see nothing alive. He lighted a lamp. The cabin was empty. He therefore drew a deep breath and went to the window. It was closed a/c closed. Nevertheless he believed the voice without the slightest doubt, had come to him through that window, and he fancied he could see where the screen netting was crushed a bit inward, as though a face had pressed heavily against it. Outside the night far and near like looked like the glowing of the river strike in hell. The sky heavy with clouds yet was bright with glaring glows. But outside there was not a ripple of movement that he could hear, except except that he felt the heat in steady and swift movement, which gave him some evidence that the forest fires were moving after them. After that he looked at his watch. He must have been sleeping for a very short time, with the voice round him, for it was nearly one o'clock. In spite of the great glows, dawn was far off. When he looked out of the window again, they were at times paler and more distant glows but then the sky was darker. Sometimes it was light as if at night the world suddenly became a blaze of sunlit glory. He never went back to bed, and did not awaken again until after seven o'clock. Then he was restless, and felt himself surrendering more and more to the pain of his presentment.

It was at this moment that Evans came in with his breakfast. He was surprised as he had heard no movement or sounds of voices to give evidence of life anywhere near the boat. Instantly he made up his mind it was not Evans who had uttered the mysterious words of a few hours ago, for the general had evidently experienced a most uncomfortable night. Though he was like a rat recently pulled out of water his clothing was burned into rags. His burned clothing hung upon him sudden and heavy, and his hair was wet. He at the breakfast things down on the table nodded to his guest, said "good morning" and went out again. For several moments again he felt a great sense of discomfort, added by shame that swept over Walter staring, as he sat down and started to slowly eat his breakfast. Here he knew he was comfortably and luxuriously housed, while out there he felt sure in the river Gertrude Angelina was still remaining to escape the awful heat of the forest fire, and that when she would come back she would surely be drenched, and even more miserable than Jack Evans himself. He had often thought of the perils also that Violet, and her sisters had also gone through. What amazed him however was the breakfast. It was not so much the chicken, rich in its own flavor, or the sweet pot also, or the pot of coffee that was filling the cabin with its de la laurens, that roused his wonder, but the hot brown flapjacks that accompanied the other things. Hot flapjacks. And after a deluge of fire and horror that had seemed before his very eyes to burn every square inch of the earth, now had Jack Evans turned the trick.

Jack Evans did not immediately come back for the dishes, and for over an hour after he had finished breakfast, Walter a kind smoked his pipe, and watched the blue haze of tremendous fires in another directions on the far northern side of the river. Still it made the very world in spite of heavily smoke clouded sides appear a blaze of sunlight glory. His imagination carried him across the river. Somewhere over there in an open spot where the fire had not blazed yet, was he knew an immense stretch of forests with trees nearly only a foot apart. If the fire should reach that--- but there was little doubt in his mind, that it would and he heaped the in imminence of the blame upon the glandulins. That was his opinion of it. And suddenly a knock at his door drew his attention. But it was a light, as well as a quick, tap, tap, tap, not like the fist of any man or even woman. He called "Come in", and in another moment the door swung slowly open, and in the flood of light from the forest fires, poured into the cabin, with a rush of very sultry and smoky air stood Gertrude Angelina.

It was not her presence or even the beauty of her, that held him so suddenly spell bound. It was a sort of shock after the vivid beginnings of his mind and sensations of his heart in which he had seen her in the river a fugitive of the forest fire. Her hair glowing in the sun bright clare of distant flames, was not wet, and she was not the forest fire terrified little girl, that had passed in tragic horror through his mind and heart. The water of the river, nor the heat of the flames had not touched it. But she did show that she had not sleep all the night, and that it was at her orders that the boat went on its way when the fire again caught up. When she came in her lips greeting him with a little smile, all that he had fancied with regret in the earlier hours of that dreadful night crumpled away in dust. Indeed he felt a great sense of immense relief. Again for a moment he forgot that she was a mere little girl. She was one of the best christian girl scouts, and as he looked upon her now, one of the most girl scouts of the Abolitionist armies.

"You are looking much better and stronger this beautiful hot morning," she said, with real pleasure shining in her eyes. She had left the door open, so that the glare partly filled the room. "I think the forest fire excitement and other things may have helped you. Wasn't it awful. We were caught up twice since I rescued you?"

Walter swallowed hard. "Quite unusual," he managed to say. "Have you seen Jack Evans this morning?"

A little note of laughter came into her throat. "Yes. I don't believe he liked it so much. He doesn't understand why or how forest fires can move so fast. Did you sleep well Walter?"

"An hour or maybe two I think. When the forest fire came up again I felt greatly worried about you. I did not think the thought that you had been a surprise by the sudden advance of the fire storm. But it does doesn't seem to have even surprised you."

"No. I was over there, and quite comfortable, though I had to shut the windows to keep the heat out," she nodded to the forward bulkhead of the cabin, beyond the wardrobes and the organ. "There's two more cabins ahead," she explained. Did not Evans tell you that?"

"No he didn't. I did not ask him where he was."

"In many ways Evans is very odd," said Gertrude. "He is exceedingly careful of me and greatly worried about the Vivian Girls. Even when I was on adventures with him he was just that way."

She now started moving about, apparently as if in no way at all was his presence disturbing her, and started her usual duties of the day, rearranging the curtains which he had crumpled with his hands, placed three or four chairs back in their proper places, and moved from this to that with the air of a housekeeper who always starts brushing and cleaning up in the early morning. She was not at all embarrassed because he was her guest or prisoner which ever way you may call it, and neither did she show any signs of being uncomfortable, or restrained because of the startling message she had sent to him by Evans. She was a glorious and active girl scout, and in her apparent unconcern about his presence he found himself sweating inwardly. A bit nervously he struck his match to light his cigar then extinguished it. She noticed what she had done. He had done.

"You may smoke your cigar if you like," she said in his sweetest tone. "General Concentration Arronburg smokes a great deal, and I like it." Then she went to a dresser or drawer in the dressing table, opened the drawer, and came to him with a box half filled with cigars.

"Jack Evans prefers these on all occasions and nothing else," she said. "Do you want?"

His fingers seemed to be all thumbs as he took a cigar from the readily proffered box. He almost swore at himself because his tongue felt thick, and he could not find speech. And also it might have been his silence, and that betrayed something in his mental clumsiness, that brought a faint flush of color into her cheeks. He noted that, and also that the top of her shining head came just about to his chin, and that her mouth and throat, looking down on them, were bewitchingly soft and sweetly sweet.

And also what she said, when her little eyes opened wide and beautiful on him again was like a knife cutting suddenly into the heart of his thoughts. "Used to live here to sit at my uncle's feet, and watch him smoke and so did my sister." She said.

"Well," she said, "I'm sure I'm glad it does not annoy you, because---I like to smoke." He replied somewhat lamely.

He placed the box on the little reading table, and looked at his breakfast dishes especially how he had cleared every plate.

"You like flapjacks very much, don't you? I was up early this morning, making them for you...."

"You made them, you a little girl?" "I did," he demanded, her words almost a most amazing revelation, and looking at her as if he did not believe he was speaking right.

"Surely Walt," I used to make them for myself every morning, until I got sort of tired of them. Even my uncle is tired of them though he used to be fond of them too. He said to me the nicest thing about me was my pancakes and flapjacks and also muffins."

To mother his fingers seemed to be all thumbs and nothing else when he took a cigar second time from the box.

"How about the other two things the he that is especially fond of?" asked Walter.

"Ah, general Concentinian Arrenburg's little secrets Walt," she laughed softly, the color deepening in her cheeks. "It wouldn't be right and fair to tell you now would it."

"Perhaps it wouldn't," he said slowly. "But there are one or two other things very important, Gertrude."

"It will be quite all right for you to ask," she said, as she started to pick up the breakfast dishes, not at all perturbed by the fact that she was offering him a great privilege which had the effect of quickening his pulse for a moment or two.

"Thank you fairly," he said. "But I don't mind telling you it is going to be difficult for me to do that--because--well this is a most unusual situation, isn't it? In spite of all your kindness, including in what was your good intentioned endeavor to save me from the scoundrel who tried to put an end to my earthly miseries behind that rock, I believe it is necessary for you to give me some kind of explanation of some thing I'd like to know. Don't you?"

"Did't Jack Evans explain to you last night?" she asked facing him.

"He brought a stern message from you to the effect, that I was in grave peril should I leave here without your permission, that I must make no attempt to leave here under any conditions, and that if I did do so, I would face death and unseemly perils in these woods. You had given your boy and girl scouts instructions to watch me as if I was about a prisoner."

Sir now nodded quite seriously. "That is right Walt."

His face flushed. "Then I am in mysterious danger because of my mission? These very woods threaten a with death?"

"You are perfectly safe if you make no attempt to leave," Walt. "The woods are fire swept there is no escape except by this boat. And where fires do not rage hidden enemies are looking for you, and trying to shadow you. I know because I learned everything. Would it not be fair, if I made you a prisoner if you would refuse to listen to reason, rather than let you run into such danger?"

"Fair," he cried, choking back an exclamation that would have vented itself on a man. Don't you realize what has happened? Don't you know that according to statements of my, and the proofs of investigators, and every other news known that Galverinus has been because of the enemy visited by flood after flood, and explosion after explosion causing terrible loss of life, and that according to every law of God and man I should find and arrest, the glandelinians who either had anything to do with some of these disasters, or who know of the secret reasons for it? Is it possible that you don't comprehend my duty. Did not Violet, and her sisters give me plans as to what I was to work out? If you still disagree, what shall I do?"

If he had noticed he would have seen there was no longer the flush of color in her cheeks. But her eyes, looked straight at him, and they were tranquil and not at all excited. She nodded.

"That is why you must do as I ask even if you have to be a prisoner if you refuse to listen to reason Walt. It is because I do realize I like you, and so does Violet and her sisters, and they too would never forgive themselves if anything happened to you. If they had at first realized the danger they would have not allowed you to go. I shall tell you why that happened behind the rock, and if you do not believe me I shall refuse to even talk to you until you come to your senses. If I let you go now, you would probably get trapped even by the awful forest fire and perish and then because I let you go it would be my own fault, I would be responsible. So you must, stay until general Arrenburg works with his army which is advancing from behind where I'm heading the boat. I don't know what to do except ask you, and not let you come for your own good until then. If I was in your place you would do the same. And what would you do?"

The question was so honest, so like a question that night had been asked by a puzzled child, that his argument for the situation of Galverinus horror and the law concerning it was struck dead. He stared into the pale face, the beautiful waiting eyes, saw the pathetic intertwining of her slim fingers, and suddenly he was priming in that his honest way, which made the whole army love

Walt. Star log. "You are doing perfectly right as far as I am concerned," he said. At this a swift change came into her face. Her cheeks flushed, and her eyes were filled with a sudden glow that made the little violet freckles in their dance like tiny flocks of gold. "From your point of view surely you are right," she repeated. "And I shall also be a tempt to leave, until I have talked with a general Arrenburg over the situation. But I can't quite say--that now--that he is going to help in the situation."

"He surely will and can," she assured him confidently.

"To see, to have an unshaken faith in general Arrenburg," he replied a little surprised.

"Yes Walt," he is the most wonderful Christian general in the world. All our generals, even our superior generals, and the Emperor adore him. And he will know what to do."

Walter shrugged his shoulders. "Perhaps in some nice quiet place, he too will be surprised by the end of it."

"Perhaps. But I do not think he will allow that to happen. I should have no doubt to it."

"Oh you would."

"Yes, Concentinian Arrenburg's army is big and strong, and he is afraid of nothing in the world, and he will do anything for me. I don't think he would fail you in anything if I asked him to help you."

She turned to resume her task of clearing up the breakfast table. With a sudden movement Walter snatched the chair close to her. "Please sit down," he commanded. "I can talk to you better that way. As an officer and as her of the Glandelinian it is my duty for you and my own good to ask you a few good questions. It is not in your power to answer them, all of the, or not answer any. I have given you my word not to act until I have seen general Concentinian Arrenburg, and I shall keep that word. But when we do meet, I shall not largely on the strength of what you tell me during the next fifteen or twenty minutes. Please sit down."

She sat in a big deer chair, which must have belonged to some big stout man, and then she faced Walter. Indeed between its great arms her slim little childish figure seemed lost and fairly out of place. Her blue eyes were level, and clear, and waiting. They did not look wary or even nervous, but so coolly and calmly beautiful that they surely disturbed Walter. She raised her hands, her slim fingers crumpling for a moment in the soft thick coils of her hair. That little movement, the unconsciousness of it, and the way she folded her hands in her lap afterwards disturbed Walter even a little more. What a glow on earth it would have been for some one to possess a child like that. The thought made him uneasy, the same feeling he had when first in the presence of the Vivian Girls. And she sat waiting, a vivid a vivid softly breathing question mark against the warm coloring of the plant upholstered chair.

"Then you rescued me from the dirty sneak who shot me," he began. "I saw you first, standing over me. Before I saw you, I thought your approach was that of the Glandelinian sniper coming to finish me, and then you had tried to get my gun ready to surprise him. When I saw you I did not shoot. It was then that I saw something in your face, horror, amazement, as though you felt sure the glandelinian had done something, you did not like to see any one do. You said I want to be free of this anxiety. I want to understand. I want to find out everything if I can. What you tell me who it was that shot me, why he did it, and why that change came over you when you saw me lying there?"

"Yes Walt. I am able to tell. I told you because. He is one of those snipers who trailed you because he knew the purpose of your mission. There are more than he. That is why I will not let you get foolish and leave." She was not antagonistic or defiant. Her voice was not even raised, nor did it betray any unusual emotion. It was simply decisive, and the unflinching steadiness of her eyes, and the way in which she sat with her hands folded, gave to it an unqualified definiteness.

"You mean that he was not the only hidden enemy, and that it was only a mistaken guess on my own part if I thought it so?"

"She nodded."

"Could General Arrenburg get me some of the information?"

"If general Arrenburg thinks it wise to do so, yes."

"Will he?" Walter little turned her and looked her general in the eye. "After that you dropped me up into the shade, dressed my wounds, held a prayer for me, and made me as comfortable as possible. In a few hours sort of my life I saw I knew what was going on. And to tell you the truth a most curious thing happened. A vision--the loomed still a little nearer to me--at times there was a light as if five of you girls."

He was looking at her hands, expecting to see her fingers tighten about in her lap but she did not while she said in answer:

"Of course you were badly hurt, and it is not strange for any one in such a condition to begin things like that Walt, but I can say you were right."

"And I seemed to hear two or three voices," he went on.

She made no answer for the moment, but continued to look at him steadily about smiling at him. "And the two others had hair that was like burnished gold, but in the glow of forest fire lights looked like copper and gold. I could at times get a glimpse of your face, and then more, and then again and again--then--I have thought I was a very heavy load for your hands alone to drag up through that sand to the shade above."

She held up her two hands to hug at the walls. "They are strong little hands," she said.

"You are small, only a little child," he insisted, "and I doubt if you could drag me across this floor."

For the first time the quiet of her eyes gave way to a warm fire. "It was indeed very hard work," she said, and the note in her voice gave him a warning that his questions were about to draw laughter from her. "You wait are over presumptuous to think if I dragged you alone. I didn't drag you to the tree at all. What I dragged was a small log to use as a pillow for your head, upon which I piled a lot of grass. Evans carried you to the tree and laid you down. Evans said I was a fool for letting your one who shot at you escape. And if you saw two of me, or three or four it can't be I. I'm only one. It was none of my girl scouts and nothing mysterious. Are you going through the confusion that news of the Vivian Girl Princesses were with me Walt. If you do, then you surely must have imagined something unusual. It was Jennie Turner, Mildred Maxwell, and Angelina Fisher. They saw you shot down before I did. Anyway through now with your desire to go off."

He made a gesture of despair. "No I cannot break the desire. But what if you won't allow me to if there is so much evil as you say. Don't you let me go on my journey to sorrow. I must obtain that information."

"I surely can not. You must wait."

"For your Uncle?"

"Yes for General Concentration Arrowburg Arrowburg."

He was silent for a moment, then said "I raved about a number of things when I sick, didn't I?"

"You did, and especially about what you thought happened in the sand. You called the other girls the 'Darlings of the Nation'. You were so near to the top of course it wasn't amusing. Otherwise it would surely have been you. You saw a hair in gold, almost. And she shook her hair loose so she could see its color."

"Who do you say about?" he asked.

"Because General Arrowburg has often told me that when I was in the sand there are beautiful shining golden clouds in it. And the glow of the fire was very bright that late evening in the sky Walt."

"I think I now understand," he nodded. "And I'm rather blind too and thank God and His Blessed Mother. I like to know that it was you and your companions who saved me from the man who tried to kill me. It proves you are just the same like the--"

"Vivian Girl Princesses," she interrupted him softly. "You also talked about them in your sickness Walt. It made me terribly afraid of your condition--so much that at times I almost wondered if the goodness had not succeeded after all. This experience makes me understand well what is going to happen to you if I should let you go too soon. I'm not hindering you, but just waiting for a safer opening for if you go now you won't succeed anyhow. And what terrible thing Glendelina did in the lower Abbeonian states she will again do in spite of all the information you may succeed in obtaining. What could she have done more terrible, than I have seen, especially at Abbeion and any other places. I tried to find out why, and good as I am in seeking clues and information and so on, I know not the reason yet. Glendelina is shrewder than we are. I think. The one who obtains that secret is a miracle."

"And is that why you have given all of your followers to hold me as prisoner or watch me as one if I try to escape?" he asked. "Because I am putting myself in such unusual peril?"

"Yes it is for that reason that I am keeping you for General Arrowburg," she acknowledged. "If the Glendelinians have no mercy for us girl and boy scouts, you also could expect none from them. Therefore I do not wish you to be rash. If I own moment even you, then I'd be determined to go with you even if it is to destruction. And surely you would object to that too wouldn't you?"

"Why yes. But what terrible thing did happen at Abbeion. Gertrude. You say you was a witness of it."

"Nothing much as a witness, except of the ruin and flood. We were almost a part of it," she said. "The Glendelinians. The Glendelinians are the worst made that disaster by explosion and flood surely were criminals of the worst sort on record and not soldiers at all. And I was convinced then, and am convinced now, though there is no proof of it, that 'Dionys' was a partner in this crime as he made the order I'm sure. He was very dangerous at all times as you know of yourself. And that I think is what made the disaster of such magnitude. What terrible thing did you hear that flood do Walt?"

"Quite a good deal--but very unusual to me," he said feeling that Glendelina herself was putting him where the earth was unsteady under his feet again. "But I will tell you. Gert I don't believe it unless I see with my own eyes. For Abbeion was a city of the largest sort, say making five cities in one--concerning the size of cities of America say like New York Chicago and so on put together. The one section. And I will not be convinced, and am not convinced now, that that sister city of Vivian which was double was not destroyed, or was a partner partner of all the other horrors. She might have been buried under the sea of flood waters but maybe now she still exists if only showing certain height above the water. That city was strong and very beautiful. And her strength I think in what might have saved her. He was fingering his unlighted cigar as he spoke. When he looked up he was surprised at the swift change that had come into the face of Angelina Arrowburg. Her cheeks were flaming, and there were burning fires screened behind her the long lashes of her eyes. But her voice was unchanged. It was with a quiver that betrayed the emotion which sent the hot flush into her face.

"Then you judge the situation without absolute knowledge of fact. You claimed as you hinted into your fever that it was all a joke, because you never saw the disaster, even though millions of people surviving elsewhere fought so desperately and crazily to save remaining lives."

"I do believe she was inundated terribly, I believe she was affected had. But wiped out as she they say,--no--no. That seems a fable,--impossible."

The long lashes fell over or lower like fringes of golden velvet closing over the fires in her eyes. "But you do not know, you did not see yourself."

"No absolutely," he conceded. "But maybe better investigations than those before--"

"I might even now show, that one of the most wonderful and beautiful of Abbeionian cities that ever was erected is--no--no--no--no Walt. It is not hard for my one to furnish you all the proof you need. I'll take you to see myself, so will General Arrowburg my uncle. So will Penrod, Jennie Turner and my other friends. If at us it may take an angel to do it."

He started, thoughts traveling themselves in his hand. How she had crept over him. She had almost convinced him. He had almost convinced him of uniformity to the one creature on earth his strength and his weakness were bound to protect as if he almost was calling her a liar, when she is so unimpaired righteous. And yet in his hand a voice seemed to cry out. "What doubts have you about the total destruction of Abbeion. What tell her she lies to you, a girl honest girl?"

He rose suddenly to his feet, and stood at the back of his chair, his hands gripping the top of it.

"Maybe you are right," he said. "Maybe I was wrong. I remember now that when I got a news paper, I saw reading of the horrors of that disaster. All night. Then I went out to find out more details. I went into a small house all tired out but with no intention to sleep. But I was tired--and did. I must have slept for an hour, and when I awoke I was sitting down beside me and reading my paper. It was Jennie Turner. She had the good opportunity then to have a good argument with me about the disaster."

Thus he went over the face that was looking up so steadily at him. "Yes she could have started a more successful argument with you--while you were there. But she didn't. Why?"

"I don't know. Perhaps she had the idea I would not have believed anyhow. Two or three days later I was convinced she would not have hesitated, and would have made me believe her. I guess if she had to take me to prove it. I caught her twice planning to go to the scene of Abbeion and how we came with her. And a third time late at night when we were within a day or two of General St. Clara creek, she almost got me to make such a trip, but so for Violet and her sisters just then objected. So I conceded she never did succeed in convincing me in anything at that time. But I'm sure that she tried, especially toward the last."

"And because she failed, she said you was a 'Doubting Thomas'. Yet something is wrapped inside you, and you have made up your mind Glendelina will be a shall be punished for such a crime whether you believe in its intensity or not. You can't expect me to believe her, or her own. We were witnesses to it and there the result was that you still believed Abbeion was the big city swept away by a 'severe flood'. But it was not an inundation. I think it was a great city swept by hundreds of miles wide and went to a long way. Was not that enough to convince you. If it is or almost to disbelieve me, simply because you did not see it yourself, that you don't believe Abbeion might be a partner in the destruction of her sister cities and towns."

"It is rather very strange indeed," he said, "a sort of great indecision in his voice. 'Doubting Thomas' and others asked me that very question. I thought he was surprised by the unusual news of such a great time. I'm sorry, very sorry. That I talked about the disaster. I told him when I was sick. But I don't want you to think I am a bad sort--that say, I'm sorry to think about it. I'm going to ponder over the whole thing again, from the time I first read the news of the disaster, till the reality of all horrors I had afterwards, and if I find that I was wrong, I shall ask your pardon for de basing your words Gertrude."

As he said this he could not help seeing that--a flashing instant in which the final confession of truth in her face, as though his words had

WALTER SEEMS TO SHOW CONFIDENCE IN GERTRUDE ANGELINE AND SHE SHOWS CONFIDENCE IN HIM.
THE ARRIVAL OF GENERAL ARRONBURG AND HIS...

As he looked at her of old, he observed a quick sharp gaze and so in her white throat, and then with a sudden involuntary exclamation that was always hers, she held out her hand to him. For a full minute he held it close, while her little fingers tightened about his own, and the mere thrill of them set his blood leaping with the thing he was almost desperately fighting down. She was even so near to him that he could feel the throbbing of her body. For an instant she bowed her head, and the sweet perfume of her hair came into his nose. Nostrils, the lustrous beauty of it much closer to his lips. Then gently she withdrew her hand, and stood back from him. To Walter she looked more like a still younger girl, yet it was the almost lovelessness of childhood of saintly parents that he observed in the flush of her face, and in the eagerness that was flashing unashamed in her eyes.

"I'm not frightened about your condition and will care more than," she exclaimed her voice trembling a bit. "When general Concentration Arronburg comes with his vast army, I shall tell him everything, and I know he will give you all the help you need. And then you may ask him all the questions you may desire, and he will answer you as properly as he will not cheat. He always plays square and he knows a whole lot. You will love general Arronburg and he will try to give you clues to the one who shot at you when you were refused behind the rock."

She made toward him a little gesture as if to invite him to the door. "Everything is safe for you out there now," she added. "I shall tell general Evans and the others. When we are tied up further on you may go ashore. And let us forget for a time all that which has happened. Wait. Let us not even think of the information you are after until general Arronburg comes."

"General Arronburg," he exclaimed. "If general Arronburg did not come?"

"I should be lost, and so would my followers," she broke in quickly. "I should want to die for fear."

Suddenly through the open window came the sound of a voice. It was again the weird monotone of the old lady, the broken backed woman. Gertrude Angelina went to the window. And Walter followed her, looking over her head, a quiver near that his face almost touched her hair. The poor old lady had come back. If she was watching a boat that was heading for the boat house boat.

"You heard him or her asking for her little girl," she said. "It is strange. I know how it must have shocked you, when she stood like that in the door. Her mind like her body is a wreck. Walter, and whether she really is your aunt I cannot tell, as I never saw her. We have brought her all the way up here to find general Arronburg's army who it is said has her little girl,-- a maybe. Early this year during the Algonquin horror, one of the soldiers found her in a forest on a slope, she having fled from a forest fire and being almost caught. She was one of the flood refugees and fleeing the waters ran direct directly into the path of one of the 'Red Pigeons'. The soldier carried her on her shoulders. The doctors managed to save her life but could not restore her reason, and she has always been like that. General Arronburg it is said knows her, and loves her, and the poor old lady worships him and did follow him about like a dog. Her brain is gone or her mind rather which way you put it. She does not know what her name is but general Arronburg knows her, but we call her 'Win'. And since day and night, she is asking that same question. 'Has any one found my little girl?' Sometimes if you will wait--I should like to have you tell me if you can see as much as I can what was so terrible about that big disaster, and if you feel the same as I do."

The boat was by this time half way across the river, and from them came a sudden burst of wild shouts, probably like that of warning. It was a boat load of fire fighters. Walter could make out eight men in the boat, their oars flashing in the morning sun that was trying to pierce the smoke clouds in the sky. Gertrude looked up at him suddenly, and then he saw that even now she was not excited. He did not think of her as a mere child just then. He did not think of her even as Gertrude Angelina or a girl scout or of her as Concentration Arronburg's army. Indeed in that upward glance of her eyes was something that thrilled him greatly, to the very depth of his soul. She seemed for a moment to reach him of his own emotion. It was a glimpse of the life that was in her, but she was dead at him, and then she faced the river again, and then he turned utterly forward, so that a warm breath of wind floated a shimmering tress of her hair against his cheek. He then turned still nearer to her, he being a man of child worship, holding his breath, until his lips softly touched the back of her head. And then he stopped back, while a strange related feeling came over him. At least his heart rose, and apparently choked him, and his fists were clenched at his side. However she apparently had not noticed what he had done, and now she seemed to him like a bird yearning to fly out through the window, throbbing with the ardent desire to answer him in his questioning look and then she was smiling up again into his face, hardened with the same rate a people which he was just then. Then, going with his self. "There are no rangers and they are earning a living going on for a season," she said. "They are great men for while fighting the worst of fires and seeking all wells, they laugh and sing. They have any kind of a game, which are in these wildernesses, all their own wives and families and with their are sometimes in formal houses, and they are happy to know they are doing in saving their own places from destruction. They are like children, and if you see like glorious children of God."

She ran to the wall, and took down the Algonquin banner. "General Concentration Arronburg is somewhere in front of us with his army," she exclaimed. "He is coming down with an enormous army, such as we never had seen in our country yet, and we are waiting for him. But each day as the fire continues after us we must float down with the stream. The rangers are coming now for the heat as it is theirs. We shall travel slowly now, and it will be wonderful if the flood of fire do not overtake us again. It will do you good to see of side as we are a sight of the fire left to follow. Wait--come out with me. Would you care for that, or are you fearful. Or would you rather be alone?"

In her face however there was no longer the old restraint. On her lips was the gleam of a half a life, the smile she usually always has, in her eyes a glow that the blood in his veins. It was not a flash of conquest. It was something deeper, and warmer than that, something real-- that in Angelina Arronburg telling him plainly that she wanted him to come. He did not know that his hands were still clenched at his side. Perhaps she knew. But her eyes did not leave his face, eyes that were reaching the invitation of her lips, openly asking him not to refuse.

"I shall enjoy it immensely to come," he said. "You resemble a guardian angel to me, when I should be yours, as a man should protect a child, and how come you protect me?"

The words came from him not merrily. He of course scarcely heard them or knew what he was saying, yet he was conscious of the strange and unusual sound of his voice. He did not know whether he was betraying himself beyond that, did not see the deepening of the wild rose flush in the cheeks of general Arronburg's army. He picked up his pipe from the table and moved to accompany her.

"I believe it would be better for you to wait a little while," she said, and her hand, resting for an instant upon his arm. Its touch seemed to be as light as the touch of his lips had been upon the tip of her head, but he felt it in every nerve of his body. "Your doctor is seeking a special lotion for your hurt. I will send him in and then you may come."

The huts about the approaching forest fighting fire rangers, was near as she turned toward the door. From him she looked back at him swiftly. "They are coming to warn us about something. Wait," she recently said. "And I too am suspicious. But I am no longer afraid now. And if it was not for the fact that the world would be very beautiful again. Can you guess why I did not want to be afraid again? It is because you have given me your dear little Wait, and therefore I believe you will be wise and be safer."

And then she was gone. And for many minutes, probably a full hour he did not move. The shouts of the fighters, was followed by the grating of something along side the boat, which gave to him like the sounds from another world. It seemed also that within him there was a crash that was much greater than that of any physical thing. It might have been the truth that truth breaking in upon him, surging over him like the waves of a stormy sea, breaking down the breakwater upon which he was seeking refuge. Inundating him with a force, that was mightier than his own will. A voice in his soul was crying out the truth,--that above all else in the world he wanted to reach out his arms to this glorious creature, who was his friend, and the voice of general Concentration Arronburg, this young Algonquin girl scout of general Algonquin command who had rescued him from the Algonquin snare who had tried to kill him, because he was known and his father, and her sisters were far, far, far more beautiful than she was. It was her smiling ways. It was the worship which general Arronburg himself had have for his young girl scout who was his niece, and the shock of it was like a great hit standing in the wake of the fire he had been fleeing from. A breath that was sweet as any came from him, and his fists clenched until they were purple. The general Concentration Arronburg's army. And he Walter Starnes, proud of his honor, proud of the strength that had made his men, had at first dared to think that she by mistake had shot him. He stared at the closed door, he coming to another thing--the place of his weakness, the homeliness of the thing that for a time had eaten into him and consumed him. And as he stared the door opened, and the doctor came in.

During the next half hour of an hour or more, Walter was as silent as the doctor who was attending to him. And he was surprised to find no pain, when the doctor quickly removed the bandage, and bathed his head in the lotion he had brought. Before a fresh bandage was put on, he looked at himself for a moment in the throw. Indeed for the first time since he was shot he had the chance to see his wound, and he had expected himself to be struck with a large and disfiguring scar, but to his surprise there was no sign of his hurt, except a small inflamed spot above his temple. He stared at the doctor, and there was no need of the question that was in his mind, for the doctor readily understood, and his face became wrinkled into a smile.

"As the doctor could not speak English like Evans he spoke to Walter in Abbinemian and said: 'When you were being fired at by the enemy, the bullet hit a rock or a piece of rock or a part of which you hid behind, and the rock hit your hit, and not the bullet. The rock almost broke your skull, bending in a bone, but I operated and straightened it again.' And by motion he showed how the operation had been done. Walter did not make off to Evans yet that he could attend the Abbinemian language. However he shook hands with the doctor in silence, then the latter put on the fresh bandages, and after that went out, saying good bye, and closing the door softly after him.

For some time there had been subdued activity outside. The shouting of the forest rangers had ceased suddenly, a low voice was giving some commands, and looking through the window Walter saw that the boat was slowly swinging toward the wider portions of the river and still further off from the shore. He turned therefore from the window to the table, and lighted the cigar that Gertrude had given him.

In spite of the mental struggle he had made during the presence of the doctor, he had failed to get a grip on himself. He still desired to obtain that information, and his blood still ran to that sense of thrill of the great crime of one against a thousand, the pain in which the Christian may act on one side of the board, and the enemy on the other, with the cards between. It was the great war gambles. The cards meant life or death, failure, or success, there was never a chance in this game, one or the other had to lose. Had anyone told him that soon he would meet the crippled woman who he suspected to be his aunt every nerve in him would have thrilled in anticipation of that hour. He realized this as he paced back and forth over the thick mats of the cabin floor. And he knew that he alone was not on the quest, and that Violet, and her sister were planning to do the same thing, for the next month. It was impossible to lie to herself. The cause and of those who knew the origin of those disasters, was of more importance to him than anything else. And Gertrude Angeline—General Arronburg's niece, only a little girl about—His eyes fell on the crumpled handkerchief, on the keys of the great old organ. And in silence unconsciously he was crushing it in the palm of his hand, and yet once more he felt the flood of humiliation and shame and other feelings sweep over him. Gradually he dropped the handkerchief, and the great inspiration of his own life seemed to rise up into his very face, and encourage him. He always was a good scout himself, clean and sure in his work, and all this had been his greatest pride. He hated the men who was a coward, and it was almost his instinct to destroy the man, who demonstrated another scout's place by being a coward. And here in the sacredness of a Calvinist country he found himself at last free to face with that greatest fight of all the ages.

Finally he closed the door, and as he threw back his shoulders, until he almost snatched them, he smiled, as if a sudden thought that it was a secret to him had suddenly come to him. And after all he thought it did not matter to him had he can go through a small bit of fire and heat—If he came out of it without being burned, and deep in his heart he knew that Gertrude was acting as his guardian when he felt sure he himself should be her own protector as surely she herself a little girl. What he had done when Gertrude stood at the window he of course could not now undo. He went to the door, slowly opened it, and stood outside looking for a glimpse of the sunshine, which now fell down however to pierce the thick smoke clouds that hung over the sky like a storm cloud. Nevertheless it felt good to him to feel the warmth of the distant fire heat, even though the air just now was not sweet enough for his lungs, and was somewhat tainted by the fumes of smoke from burning pine and leaves. The boat was far off from the shore drifting swiftly and sure steadily down in midstream.

Jack Evans was at this moment sitting near the south end of the cabin, and to Walter's surprise, he nodded in a friendly way, and his wide mouth drew or broke into a grin. In real daylight to Walter Evans did not look as ugly as he thought. "Ah it was coming soon the fulfillment of satanism of our age, my friend," he chuckled. "And so when will be in his ink that wait, you so little have rooster capture a so glandolinian my who are so scarce, and common, I want give you so help, common!!!!!!"

The reflection in Jack Evans' eyes reflected itself for a instant in Walter's. He turned back into the cabin, bent over his neck, and so found among his clothes a small writing book the size of a school composition. He looked it over, and found the contents interesting. He then making a sign. His next action above all others was accomplishing placing a sign for the cause, and wherever he went, either on pleasure or adventure, a composition book went with him, and now here was Jack Evans inviting him on, writing for him to get well. He went out and placed the book under Evans' nose. He looked at it curiously, seeing that the writing was in English and fortunately English Evans could read better than he could speak it. "The Compos' book" he nodded. "Does no matter, does no Christian any know here hasty in an empty book it. It is strange Walt, but you sure can make as good writing in an English. I can make good what is plain. Perhaps you are not meant to be in what is write."

Turning over the pages one by one, Walter stopped at a certain spot. "Do you see that general?" he asked. "Well I will tell you this, that this is not a history. It is the plans of securing the information that I have been looking for, when the proper time comes. When I follow out these plans, I will enable general Vivian to obtain all he desires concerning the great disasters of the past or past. Why? Because I am determined to obtain that information or die. I do not want to be a failure, which I would surely do if I did not carry out these plans. Then when I have succeeded in my mission—"

The bull like neck of Jack Evans seemed about to burst, and his eyes appeared ready to pop out of their sockets, as he said in surprise:

"What you make those plans yourself. Why so are as good boy. You take as chance in carrying them round, and if so get in as hands of so greatest fighting men of so glandolinian army so plans will be so caught. You, you—The word flood of his great surprise sprang to his lips. emotion choked him, and then looking suddenly over Walter's shoulder—He stopped, something that was in his look made him turn. Four paces behind him stood Gertrude Angeline, and he knew that from the corner of the cabin, she had heard what had passed between them—she was biting her lips, and behind the flash of her eyes he saw worry.

"You are planning something?" she asked. "Evans you are looking badly." she reached out her hand, and without a word Walter gave her the composition book. she glanced over it carefully, yet Walter saw little lines of doubt come into her white forehead.

"They are good plans you have written here, Walt. Surely they cannot mean much though I'm afraid. Some day when general Conventinian Arronburg comes with his army, will you teach me and Violet, and her sisters how to make them?"

"Always it is when general Arronburg and his army comes," he replied a little impatiently. "shall be waiting a whole year!"

"Two or three days perhaps, a little longer. Are you coming with me a little ahead Walter?"

However she did not wait for his answer, but went ahead of him looking looking at the writing book. Walter caught a last glimpse of general Evans' face as he followed Gertrude around the end of the cabin. Evans was smiling at him confidently. They reached the bow of the boat, a deck fully twelve feet in length by nine in width sheltered above by a sort of awning, and comfortably arranged with chairs, several good rugs, a table of considerable size, and to Walter's amazement a hammock. He had never seen anything like this belonging to a forest ranger before, nor had he ever heard of a river scout so large and so beautifully made or luxuriously appointed. Over his head at the tip of a flagstaff attached to the forward end of the big cabin, floated the grand National Flag of Abbinemian. And under this staff was a large screened door, which undoubtedly opened into the kitchenette which Gertrude had told him about. He could not make any effort to hide his surprise and confusion. But Gertrude Angeline did not seem to notice it at all. Put the pucky little lines were still in her forehead and he wondered what he was going to say.

"Is it true that you have given your word to go on this adventure later, and have Evans as your companion?" she asked.

"It is true, Gertrude. And I feel that general Jack Evans is looking ahead very joyously to the occasion."

"She is! He is!" she affirmed. "Last night he spread the news among all my followers. Those who left to join general Arronburg this morning have also taken the news with them, and there is a great deal of excitement and much betting. I am afraid you have made a very bad, bad promise. No man has offered to seek any such information of the flood horrors from the enemy since they occurred—not even my great Uncle general Arronburg, nor others, who says that in planning and other things that Evans is more than a match for him."

"And yet they must have little doubt, as there is betting, and it takes two to make a bet." chuckled Walter.

The lines went out of Gertrude's forehead, and a half smile trembled on her red lips. "Yes there is much betting. But those who are for you are offering most years military pay against uniforms that are used. The odds are about fifty to one against you Walter."

"The look of pity which was clearly in her eyes, brought a rush of blood to Walter's face. "If only I had something to wager," he groaned.

"You must not make the attempt and draw Evans into it. I shall forbid it." "Then I and Evans will steal off into the forest, and have the adventure out by ourselves."

"You both will run into grave peril. He is terrible like a great beast when he fights, but he knows too when he is facing grave danger. I think he would desert even me or the Vivian girls for a good thrilling adventure. But you Walter—"

"I also love a good stirring adventure or two," he admitted, unshamed.

Gertrude Angeline studied him thoughtfully for a full minute....

"And by following out these plans?" she asked then handing him the composition book.

"Yes follow out those plans. Evans may use his head, but I shall use those," plane, so that I shall not fail in my own quest at least. I promised Violet and her sisters I would do so."

For another flash her lips trembled on the edge of a smile. Then she gave him the book entirely a bit troubled, and nodded to a chair with a deep cushioned seat and with arms. Please make yourself comfortable Walt. I have something to do in the cabin, and will return in a little while."

He then wondered if she had gone back to settle the matter with Evans at once if possible, for it was clear she did not regard with favor, the promised adventures be with himself and Evans. It might have been of course on the spur of a careless moment that he had promised to go on this kind of an adventure with General Evans, and with little thought if anything that it was likely to be carried out, or that it would become a matter of great importance with the few followers of Evans and Gertrude Angeline. He was evidently in for it, he told himself, and so was Evans strong as he is, and even though as a fighting man Evans could probably be as fierce as a thousand tigers to the enemy. He was glad of that for he knew Evans could do lots with his strength, sword and pistol having heard much about the general. He grinned as he watched the bending back of Gertrude's boy and girl scouts, and of Evans two hundred men followers. So they were betting one hundred to one against him. Even General Arronburg might be induced to bet with him. And if he did-- the blood leaped for a moment in Walter's veins, even the thrill went to the very tips of his fingers. He stared out over the fogged smoke of the river horizon almost unseeing, as the possibilities of the thing that had already come into his mind made him for a minute or two oblivious of the world. He possessed one thing, against which General Concentinian Arronburg and even a Gertrude Angeline would wager a half of all they owned in the world in military property. And if he should try and gamble that one thing, which had come to him like a strong inspiration, and should accomplish the dangerous mission--

He strode back and forth over the deck, no longer watching the rowers or the smoke shrouded shore. The thought grew stronger and stronger, and it seemed as if his mind was being fiercely consumed by it. Thus far from the moment the first shot was fired at him by the glandolinians from the ambush, he had been playing with an astonishing adventure in the dark, and amidst great and terrible forest fires. But fate had at last dealt him a trump card. That something which he possessed was more precious than any money or gold to General Arronburg, and the great general therefore would not refuse the wager when it was offered. He would not, could not dare refuse. More than that, Walter was sure he would accept very eagerly, strong in the faith that the mission would not be so successful. And when Gertrude Angeline knew what the wager was to be she too would pray to God and His Blessed Mother to guide Walter. He did not hear the light footsteps behind him, and when he turned suddenly in his pacing, he found himself facing Gertrude Angeline, who carried in her hands a little note book. She sat down in the hammock, and wrote something on the book with her fountain pen. For a moment he watched her while she wrote. It was probably evident that his thoughts went to her, for he was almost frightened as he saw her cheeks coloring under the long golden lashes. The second time she wrote again, and while he gripped at his own weakness, he tried to count the number of trees which was closest to him. And behind him the beautiful eyes of General Arronburg's niece were now looking at him with a strange glow in their depths.

"Do you know," he said, speaking slowly, and still looking toward the shore. "Something tells me very unexpected things are going to happen when General Arronburg arrives with his army. I'm going to make a bet with him that I and Evans will not fail in our mission, unless of course the Vivian Girls make the same attempt and win ahead of us. I am sure he will not refuse. He will accept. He must. And General Arronburg will lose because I shall win my purpose. It is then that I'm sure unexpected things are going to happen, especially when we sent in the information to our generals. And I am wondering--when they do happen--if you will be very close, related over it."

There was a full moment of silence. And then:

"I don't want you and Evans to take such chances," she said.

She was writing very swiftly when he turned toward her again, and a second time the long lashes shadowed what a moment before he might have seen in her eyes.

TTTT The morning was passing like a dream to Walter staring?..... He was permitting himself to take in all the view that he could observe. And he was sitting so near to Angelinian Arronburg that now and then he felt uneasy, and he fancied her his guardian angel in disguise for from her came a faint scent like the delicate scent of a rose. It was like a breath of crushed roses, gathered in the deep cool of the unburned forest, a whisper of strange and unusual sweetness about her. Yet only when he was close did he observe this, and yet he did not know where she had obtained the flowers if she did get them. He fancied she might have gathered roses from some near by swamp where sometimes he had seen the grow. Evidently she did not know he was thinking these things. There was nothing in his voice or mind he felt sure to betray his thoughts, unless she was a mind reader. He also was sure she was unconscious of the fight he was making.

Nevertheless it seemed that her eyes were laughing and even smiling with him, she continued her writing, and then she talked to him as she might have talked to a superior general of Concentinian Arronburg. She told him how Evans had put the rangers to test when the barrage, the largest river forest ranger boat that had ever been on any river, and that it had been built of dry cedar and other lumber so that it floated like a feather wherever there was water enough to run such a big boat. She told him how Jack Evans, had brought the smaller cabin down from some other partly wrecked boat, and how he had saved it from being pitched into the river by carrying the full weight of it on his shoulders when they met with some accident in running from a forest fire through a swift and dangerous rapids bringing it down. Jack Evans was a very strong man, she said, with a note of pride in her voice. And she added, "Sometimes when he picks me up in his arms, I feel that he is liable to squeeze the life out of me."

Without answering he turned his face toward the far shore, where the wilderness seemed to reach off into a smoky eternity. What a glory it would be without the horrors of war and forest fires--the beautiful green seas of spruce, cedar, and de cedar and all other kinds of trees, the ridges of poplar and birch rising before them like silvery spurs above the darker billows, and afar off mellowed in the sunshine, and sun mists, the distant guardian forests of the flanking Vivian Hills sentineling the country beyond. Into that beautiful mysterious land on the further side of the Mio-Hollister Run Walter would have loved to set his foot ten days ago. It was the duty after that information he was still desiring to seek after, and now what could he do. What a fool he would be if he went off now. Everywhere was fire. Whole ridges of forests many miles, nay leagues in extent, monstrous mountain tops, and sides, forested valleys and plains and so on he knew were seas, but not green seas. They were flaming seas, the terrible "Red Plagues" of the forest, and through vast distances the forests he always loved all his life seemed to whisper the awful perils to him, and ahead of him the river seemed to look back, nodding over its "shoulder", warning him menacingly, telling him the awful warnings of the forests was true. It streamed on swiftly, more than three miles wide at this point, and in its indolence it seemed to sing the very song of dreaded warnings. In that song Walter seemed to hear the same whisper, that he would be a fool to go away even when he would be allowed to, even with -- Evans. If the enemy was not there, then it was the fire. Yet the lure of the wilderness shores crept in on him and gripped him as of old.

The realization of this was like a sharp thrust into his heart.

For an instant they painted a vision for him, a picture of a world of forests, a world of country covered with forests, seeming to burn all alone like a purgatory of trees, while he seemed to sense the vision of Gertrude Angeline crushed under the weight of a fallen tree, so tightly that she could not breathe.

In that mad moment of his visioning it was almost a living breathing reality for him there on the golden fore-deck of the boat. He looked at the rowers of a number of boat loads of men in six boats, and then his eyes came back to the end of the barge, and to Gertrude Angeline. (())

Her little toes were now tapping the floor of the deck, and she too was looking out over the wilderness, and it seemed to him that she appeared like a bird that wanted to fly away.

"I should like to go into those hills myself, but I'm afraid of the fire!" she said without looking at him. "Away off yonder."

"And I should like to go with you so you will be safe!"

"You love to run before a forest fire Walt?" she said.

She rose out of the hammock suddenly, and placed her little book into her pocket.

"I have almost forgotten something. It is for you to eat for it is near dinner time, Walt. So I must turn in for a little while. For you personally I am going to bake a pie. Then we'll eat together."

The dark screened door of the kitchenette closed behind her, and Walter walked out from under the awning, so that he could be out more. There was a no longer a doubt in his mind. He was more than fool for even starting out. My Heavens. The whole country of Galverinia must be on fire, Galverinia becoming a seething Hell. He envied other nations, not torn by such wars, and yet he felt sure before he would desert his own cause now he knew he would rather put a pistol to his head and blow his life out. He was confident of himself there. Yet he had started out on a rash adventure, and out of the frying pan into which he had fallen, he knew also that he must drag himself, and quickly or be everlastingly lowered into a fire sea in his own esteem. He stripped himself naked, and did not lie to that other and greater thing of life that was in him. He felt also that he was really no fool, but also that he must not be any such thing as a coward. Only a coward would postpone such an adventure because there was grave peril, only a coward would let live the thoughts that burned in his brain, and he was more than anxious for the quick a touch of general Concentinian Arronburg and his great army. After that everything he felt sure would happen quickly. He thanked God, and praised the Blessed Virgin and the saints, that the inspiration of the great wager had come to him. After the adventure was he had won, then once more would he be the great famous scout holding the military military tramp hand in the thrilling game. Loud voices from the boats ahead and answering cries, from Evans in the stern, drew him to the open deck. The boat was close to shore to his surprise, and general Evans was working the long stern sweep, as if the power of a railroad steam engine or locomotive was in his mighty arms. The boats had shortened their tow lines, and were nouppling at right angles within a few yards of a gravelly beach. Then there was a few strokes more, and the men who were bare to the knees, jumped out into shallow water, and began tugging at the tow rope with their hands. Walter looked at his watch. It was eleven o'clock. Never he thought had he passed so quickly as that morning on the fow forward deck of the big barge. And now for some reason or other the rangers were tying up, after a drop of twenty or so miles down the river before advancing fires, and he wondered how swiftly general Arronburge's army was coming down from the opposite direction.

He was suddenly filled with the overpowering desire to feel the soft crush of earth under his feet again, and not waiting for the long plank that Jack Evans was already swinging from the scow to the shore, he made a long leap that put him on the sandy beach like a kangaroo. Gertrude Angeline he knew had given him this permission, and he looked to see what the effect his act had on Jack Evans.

The face of the general was like sullen stone. Not a sound came from his thick lips, but in his eyes was a deep and foreboding warning, as he looked at Walter, and shook his head dolefully as he pointed toward the fire. In them were suspicious suspicion of enormous peril for Walter, warning of the deadly danger of what would happen in the woods if he went too far, or did not come back when the time came to return. Walter nodded. He understood. "I won't go too far," he said. Even though Gertrude had faith that he would return safely Evans had not. He looked doleful and frowning. Four times glanced swiftly toward where the terrible Red Plague was burning. Walter passed between the men and the boy and girl scouts, and to a man and child their faces turned on him, and in their quiet and watchful eyes, he saw again that strange warning and suspicion the unspoken fear of what would happen if he forgot his promise to Gertrude.

Never in a single outfit had he seen such splendid men and children. Slim tall, clean cut, sinewy, they were stock of the best christian soldiers of all and all of them were young. The older men had gone out to fight the fires advance. The reason for this dawned upon Walter and he said to one of them:

"Why worry if I do not return? Not one of you could beat me in a race through the forest, there is not one that can outrun me or cut me off before I had hours the start, and so you easily could trail me if I am in danger."

"Yes," said one almost sullenly. "But we cannot outrun forest fires. Better be careful. If anything happens we are not responsible and you."

Passing beyond them, he passed to look back at the big boat. On the forward deck stood Gertrude, and she too was looking at him now. Even at that distance he saw that her face was quiet, and troubled with great anxiety. She did not smile, when he lifted his hat to her, but gave only a little nod. Then he turned and slowly crept himself in the green balsams that grew within fifty paces of the river. Then the old joy of life leaped into him, as his feet crushed in the soft moss of the shaded places where on a real clear day the sun could not break through.

He went on, passing through a vast and silent cathedral of spruce and cedar so dense that the gray smoke covered sky was hidden, and came then to higher ground, where the evergreen was thick also with birch and poplar. About him however was profound silence. There was no song of the hidden warblers, the scolding of distant jays, no birds or life of any kind. Soon he came to a beaten path and other paths worn in the earth by the hoofs of moun and caribou which no doubt had fled before the fires. Half a mile from the bateau he suddenly sat down on a long log, and filled his pipe with fresh tobacco, while he listened carefully hoping to catch the subdued voice of life in this land that he loved so well. But there was not a sound, and suddenly the curious feeling came over him that he was not alone, then those of birds and beasts he had been hoping for. He seemed to sense that they were staring at him, seeking him out from in the darkest covert waiting for him to shove on, dogging him like a ghost. Where did they Evans men or enemies? Within him the howl like instincts of the man hunter rose to the suspicion of invisible presence, and he quickly threw himself behind a tree, drew his revolver and waited.

He hoped again to hear the chirps of birds but all was silent not even the sound of the peewee, or any warbler and he then thumbed down the tobacco into his pipe feeling apprehensive. Gertrude might believe he would be safe, but Evans and his wary followers had ways of their own of strengthening their faith. Maybe they were shadowing him for his own safety. They were soldiers and rangers and they knew how to save any one caught in a fire trap. Deliberately he struck out a hundred yards of a new path turning back for he did not return by the usual path. About twenty times he found the prints of men. Testing the form of the feet he gave a gasp. Why had they not shot at him? They were the imprint of the shoes of Glandolinian soldiers or spies. They had shadowed him and yet done him no harm. Why? Maybe the men of Evans' gang too close by, and the Glandolinians must have known these men are dangerous and had fled. Evans with his slaves up, was scrubbing the deck of the ship, when Walter came over the gang plank.

"There are hidden enemies in them, but I fear they were disturbed by some one," said Walter pointing at Evans. "Those Glandolinians may have been too clumsy to hunt well. I am afraid it is dangerous for even your men to go too far ashore."

Jack Evans stared as if Walter had stunned him with a telling blow, and he spoke no word as Walter went on to the forward deck. In the meantime Gertrude Angeline had come out under the awning. She gave a little cry of relief and pleasure.

"I am glad you have come back safe, and not injured, Walter. I was afraid those woods are dangerous if not from fires, then from hidden enemies."

"I am glad I came back to see Gertrude," he replied. "I think the woods are unhealthy for even your men and boy and other scouts to travel in too. I was shadowed by enemies I assure but they did not do anything to me."

Walter had now felt that a part of the old time strength had come back to him since his adventure with the hidden sniper. Alone they sat at dinner, and to his surprise Gertrude Angeline waited on him, and he now found it easier to look into her eyes without betraying himself. A part of the afternoon he spent in her company, and it was not difficult for him to tell her some of his adventures during the past months, how he himself had the strange luck to witness every flood and fire disaster of the war, except that of Abbieann, and how body and soul the cause of Our Pleased Lord, and the holy country of Abbieann had claimed him though a foreign englishman, and that he hoped to live all his life or die in Abbieann when his time comes. Her eyes glowed at that. She told him of two months she had spent in Abbieann, of her experience when the disaster came there, and her joy when she managed after terrible sights to return to general Vivian's army. It seemed for a time they had forgotten general Arronburge. They did not even speak of him or his army. Twice they saw the poor insane woman, but this time she did not call out for her lost child. And a little at a time she told him of general Arronburge's army, and of his approach sooner or later, what time he would come depended the speed of which the great army was advancing.

A part of the afternoon he spent on shore. He filled a potato sack full of sand and after placing a face on it with a large unusually shaped nose and sewed a hat to it suspended it from the limb of a tree, and after saying to the men around that it was general Manley pummeled it with his fists for an hour much to the curiosity of the men and boys and also the girl scouts, who really in their hearts wished it was the actual face of general Manley. Nevertheless these exercises assured Walter that he had not lost any of his strength, and that he would be in form to go out on the adventure with Evans when the proper time came.

Toward evening Gertrude Angeline joined him and they walked for two hours and a half up and down the beach looking at the great mountains of smoke clouds far off, the sheets of flames shooting through them, and watching the thunder clouds of clouded shapes of the higher smoke clouds as they spread out in long forms like roul rolls, like snails and sometimes like arches and fans with millions of boils and cauliflower forms on them. It was Jack Evans who got supper. And during the supper, Evans ate with them and spoke a lot to the guardian of the Vivian girls and their friends, what adventures he had in the past, and how he being a child slave when a boy escaped, and how he obtained his immense strength. And after that Walter sat with Gertrude Angeline with Evans close by. The camp of the men and rangers was one hundred yards below the boat screened between by a stretch of hardwood, so that except when they broke into a chorus of laughter, there was no sound of their voices. Soon Evans went to the stern, and as night came on the old lady howled near. At last he sat down in the edge of the white sand of the beach, and there she remained a silent and lonely figure as the twilight deepened. Ever the world hovered a real quiet sleepy night and distant glows of the forest fires grew brighter and brighter. Not a sound could be heard, not even the droning of the red crickets, nor the twittering of the night birds or any other night sounds. A great shadow floated out over the river close to the boat, the first of the questioning clouds of smoke crossing a patch of red glow nearest to the boat in the sky. One after another after the darkness of night thickened, the different distant glows of the forest fires appeared here and there, near and far, making the thick mountains of rolling smoke assume strange forms and colors. As they but seemingly over the far distant forest tops rose a new glow appearing slowly, and the glows grew brighter and larger and more extensive and the smoke clouds thicker and more rolling. A mile or so down the river there suddenly came the loud and panicky cry of a loon probably one of the lone birds on flight, and in the river the night feeding trout, splashed like the tails of leeches, and then over the roof of the smoke covered wilderness came the coughing and sneezing cry of some mouse also in flight, and that cry seemed to sound a sound of warning. Through the stretch of hardwood and pine glowed the camp fire of the waiting rangers---while close beside him, and very silent, in these hours of unusual silence, Walter felt growing nearer, and nearer and still nearer to him, the unseen peril of some kind for them all, and he looked closely at Gertrude who also was very close and going without moving at the great sights made by the distant forest fires, which she knew was still heading their way and they had not long to remain on shore. On the strip of sand, the broken and crippled lady rose, and stood like the stub of some misshapen tree. And then she moved slowly on, and was swallowed up in the yellow glow of the night.

"It is at night that she seeks for her lost child," said Gertrude with a sound of pity in her voice, for it seemed as if Walter had spoken the thought that was in his mind. For nearly six minutes Walter remained silent looking at the glow himself with excitement, tense excitement and awe. And then encouraged by the excitement he said:

"He ask you asked me to tell you about the reason I'm looking for the information concerning the Abbiann and other disasters. I will if you care to have me. Do you?"

"Yes. What do the powerful Geminian members and general panger, or his Chief Assistant William Schloeder, say about the awful disaster?"

He then told her making the story as short as heon possible was. And not once in the telling of the story did she speak or move. He told how he had read of the disaster, how refugees had spoken to him, how violet and her sisters showed the letters Gertrude and her friends had written to the, and how he himself had observed pictures of it in papers and photographs. It was a terrible story at best he thought, but he did not weaken it by smoothing over details. This was his opportunity. He wanted her to know why he must possess the information, and capture the ones responsible if possible dead or alive, and he wanted her to understand how important it was that he also learn about the insane woman for he felt sure she was his aunt missing since the Lake Sollicita disaster. He told how he tried with violet and her sisters to make a special trip to the scene of the enormous disaster, and how when they were only a quarter of a mile on the way when they were barred by terrific forest fires, and had to go back.

"We saw one whole mountain side and summit all afire," he said. "It sure was like the violent eruption of some mighty volcano, nay looked like the eruption of Mt. Pelvian as we have seen, and we at first thought it was a volcanic eruption. But who ever made this big flood that you said wiped out Abbiann, was a fiend, a devil in human shape, and there'll be no mercy for any of his men either if he and they are caught."

Then he went on. He described Heidi's post, where the big explosion that started the floods and leveled Abbiann to the ground by the concussion, and where the main tragedy had happened, then told of the scenes that many of his own friends had witnessed, and of the forest fires in the bargain. It was an unusual disaster he conceded that, triple disasters in one, a cowardly act indeed on the part of Glendolinia and her officials to command this to be done. And it could not excuse even what happened. Abbiann as newspapers said, big a city as it was, was a thing of the past, as well as hundreds of other cities and towns, and the immense floods increased so as to if it happened there spread over all of the United States and engulf cities like Chicago, and all others. One witness who escaped crept off into the slumpy forest half dead. Then he came back three days later with three friends and all they saw where the city of Abbiann once stood was a vast sea of water as far as the eye could see. Who the friends were investigators never knew but suspected were of the Gemini. There was an investigation by these, but all through the investigation nothing could be learned as the flood erased all clues of the cause of the disaster. In spite of that all efforts were made to trace the source of the explosion. Then the terrible thing happened. The fugitive and the three friends were suddenly surprised by strange men, and were bound hand and foot, and fastened in an old shanty. Then one of the captors set fire to the "cant" and stood outside near the edge of the flood, and laughed like a man madman at the dying shrieks of their victims. It was the season when the rains up north were the heaviest, and there were but few people at the post. Two strangers attempted to interfere, and the secondaries killed them too. Four deaths that awful day no six--two of the horrible beyond description showing the Glendolinians knowing the flood was known tried to cover up the crime. Resting for a moment, Walter went on to tell of the many days of unavailing search made by members of all government and police and Geminian officials and Christian spies and scouts, after that, how no trace of the cause of the disaster was found, and though one Glendolinian who might have known something about it was caught, he killed his captors and got away. Then came the rumor that Menley was wholly responsible, and the rumor grew into official belief, and now was sent by general Vivian and the Vivian girls to try and gain the information while the following month they too might try if he failed. For a time there was silence after he had finished. Then Gertrude rose to her feet.

"I wonder," she said in a low voice "what Jennie's Turners own story might be if she were here to tell it. She also was with me when I was in Abbiann." She stepped out from under the awning, and in the full radiance of the glow of the distant forest fires he saw the pale beauty of her face, and the crowning luster of her hair.

"Good night," she whispered.

"Good night," said Walter.

He listened until her retreating footsteps died away, and for hours after that he had no thought of sleep. He had insisted that she take possession of her own part of the cabin again, and Evans had brought out a bundle of black blankets. These he spread under the awning, and when he drowned off it was to dream of the lovely saintly face of the beautiful Angolinian child about he had last seen in the glow of distant conflagrations.

It was late in the morning of the next day that two unusual things suddenly or gradually happened---one that he had prepared himself for, and another so unexpected, that for a space it could have sent his world of worlds crashing out of their orbits. With Gertrude Angeline he had gone to a ridge line for particular flows she had desired, which he found two miles back from the big river. Returning a new way, they came to a shallow stream, and therefore Gertrude Angeline stood at the edge of it, and there was laughter in her shining eyes, as she looked to the other side of it. She had twined flowers into her hair. Her cheeks were even richer in color than usual, and her slim figure was very exquisite in its wild impulse of life. Suddenly she turned on him, her red red lips ailing in his face.

"Will you carry me across?" she asked.

He did not answer, for for he was a tremble as he drew near her. She raised her arms a little while she waited. And then he picked up up, she being against his breast. Her two hands went to his shoulders as he waded into the stream, he slipped, and they clung a little tighter. The soft note of laughter was in her throat when the current came to his knees out in the middle of the stream. He held her much tighter, and then as stupidly he slipped again, and the movement brought her much lower in his arms so for a space her head was against his breast, and his face was crushed in the soft masses of her golden hair. He came with her the rest of the way to the opposite shore, and then stood her on her feet again, standing back quickly so that he she would not hear the pounding of his heart. Her face was radiantly beautiful, and she did not look at Walter but away away from him as she said,

"Thank you."

Then suddenly they heard swiftly running feet behind them, and in another moment one of the brigade men or rangers or whatever they are called came dashing through the stream as fast as he could. At the same time there came from the river a quarter of a mile or so away a loud thunderous burst of voice. It was not the voice of a dozen men or a hundred, but probably half a hundred thousand, and Gertrude Angeline grew tense, listening, her eyes on fire even before the messenger could get the words out of his mouth.

"It is general Concentinien Arronburg," he cried then. "He has come with the great army, and you must hurry if you wish to reach the big boat before he lands, as he alone with his staff is coming down the river on a huge raft."

In that moment it seemed to Walter that Gertrude forget the world was alive. A little cry came to her lips, and then she big hid him, adieu and left him running swiftly saying no further words to him flying with the speed of a fawn to the big boat. And when Walter turned to the man who had come up behind then there was a strange smile on the lips of the lithe forest running runner as his eyes followed the hurrying figure of Gertrude Angeline. Until she was out of sight he stood in silence and then he said:

"Go. Come Walter. We also must meet general Arronburg."

Walter moved slowly behind the man, having no desire to hurry whatever as he felt tired. Yet he wished to see what happened when Gertrude Angeline met her uncle, and he wished to see what this great general was like. Only a moment ago she had been carried in his arms, her hair had weathered his face, her hands had clung to his shoulders, her flushed cheeks and long lashes, had for an instant or so lain close against his breast. And now swiftly with a word of hearty apology and inviting him to follow swiftly she ran or had run off to meet her uncle. He almost spoke that word aloud as he saw the last of her slim figure among the trees. She was going to her uncle from whom she had been separated a long time, and there was no hesitation in her manner of going or in her invitation for him to follow. And why confound it was he so slow after all in following.

He quickened his steps narrowing the distance between him and the hurrying ranger. Only the thoughts in his brain had made the happening in the creek anything but an accident he told himself. Gertrude had asked him to carry her across just as if she would have asked her uncle only. It was surprising to him that he had slipped in midstream and that his arms had closed tighter about her, and that her hair had so strangely brushed his face. She remembered smothered laughter when it seemed for a moment that they were going to fall into the stream together. Probably it would have happened if he had not watched his step. Surely she would never guess it had been near accident then comedy for him.

Once more he was convinced, that he would prove himself a workling and a fool if he backed out now. His business now was with general Arronburg, and the hour was at hand when he could start the game. He was looking still for this hour, he having prepared himself for it and had prepared himself action that would be both quick and decisive for he MUST obtain that information, and help bring full evidence against Glendolinia for the great disasters of the war... and yet as he went on his heart was still thumping unsteadily, and in his arms and against his face remained still the sweet warm thrill of his contact with the unusual child. He felt as if he had carried one of the Vivian Girls instead. He could not drive that from him. It would never go. As long as he lived, what happened in the creek would continue to be a reminder. He did not deny that crying voice inside of him. It was easy indeed for his own mouth to make the words. Who could therefore call himself a fool and a weakling if he backed out now from his plans, and these words were absolutely full of strong meaning. The truth remained. For the cause of such child heroines like he would see the end of Glendolinia or die. The truth came to him. Why children beautiful as she had perished by the thousands in the floods. This brought a blazing fire in his breast, a conflagration that easily got the best of him, a thing which he fought not, and when he thought of the forest fires ravaging the beautiful country in which such children loved to live in, a forest fire raged within his breast. He clenched his fists and his eyes blazed with devilish anger. He did not think of danger for Gertrude Angeline as she was careful and alert making the chance for such a thought inconceivable. The tragedy of the war was one-sided. It was Glendolinia's own folly, her own danger, and his own folly and danger if he did not find out the evidence for which Violet, and her sisters had sent him out to obtain at any cost. For just as he loved and adored all children like them and Gertrude, so did he love the country that sheltered him, its generals and law, and His God and the Blessed Mother most of all. His love of God was as strong as a lover's love for a beautiful woman.

He came to the low ridge close to the river, and climbed up through the thick birches and poplars. At the top was a large stretch of bare ground over which the soldier and ranger had already passed. Walter paused there, and looked down on the broad sweep of the Mc-Holleston Run.

What he saw was like a great picture spread out on the great bosom of the river and the yellow and white strip of shoreline. Still a quarter of a mile upstream, drifting down slowly with the current, was a mighty raft, something which he had not expected to see, and for a space his eyes took in nothing else. On many a river he had seen thousands of rafts used by the military but never a raft like this. It was two hundred feet in width, and three or four times as long, and it looked to him like a little city swept up from out of some mysterious land to be transported to the river. It was dotted with tents and canvas shelters. Some of these were purple, green, blue and yellow, and some were white, and six or seven were striped like the Angeline flag. Behind all these was an absolute wooden house, and over this there arose a long tender staff from which floated the National Abbeemian flag. The raft was alive. Men in splendid uniforms were running between the tents. The long rudder sweeps however looked dull in the evening darkness gathering, and once again the glow of the forest fires appeared and now the raft looked like a little city swept out or up from some arctic and savage desert land in the glare of the fires. Rowers with naked arms and shoulders were straining their muscles in fifteen big boats that were pulling like ants at the giant mass of timber. And in the woods on two sides everything seemed to be alive, and glancing closely that way he saw the woods alive with soldiers thicker than an earthfull of ants of purple color it seemed. Arronburg's army had arrived. And to Walter's ears came a deep monotone of thousands of human voices, the chanting of soldiers as they marched.

Nearer to him a louder response suddenly made answer to it, and then the rolling fire of salutes. A dozen or more steps carried him round a projecting stretch of brush, and he could see the open shore where the big boat was tied. Gertrude Angeline had crossed the strip of sand, and Evans was helping her into a waiting boat. Then Evans shoved it off, and the four men in it began to row. Two boats were already close to the immense raft, and Walter recognized the occupant of one of them as the old lady. Then he saw Gertrude Angeline rise in the boat and wave something white in her hand.

He looked again toward the raft. The current and the sweeps and the tugging boats were drawing it steadily nearer, and a thrill of excitement came over Walter. Standing at the very edge of the raft he saw now a solitary figure, and in the glow the man stood out clean cut as a carved statue. He was a giant in size. He was uniformed beautifully and wore a large rounded hat, and he was looking steadily toward the bigger boat, and the approaching rower boat. He raised an arm and a moment later the movement was followed by a hoarse voice that rose above all other voices. It boomed over the river like the sound of a thunderbolt. In response to it Gertrude waved the white thing in her hand, and Walter thought he heard her voice in an answering cry. He stared again at the solitary figure of the general, seeing nothing else, hearing no other sound but the thunderous sound of the deep cry that came again over the river. His heart was thumping. In his eyes was a gathering fire. His body grew tense. For he knew that at least he was looking at General Concontinian Arronburg, one of the best Christian generals known, and uncle of one of the noblest girl heroines he had known next to Violet and her sisters themselves.

As the unusual sign of the situation grew more and more upon Walter staring, a flash of his old humor and humorous anger returned. It was the same grim angry humor that had possessed him when he was forced to shelter himself from the sniper behind the rock, and where he thought for a while his enemy would really have a chance to kill him right off. Fate had played him a most dishonest turn then, and he believed it was doing the same thing to all the southern Abbeemian States now. Unless he deliberately kept on his purpose Abbeemian would continue to look upon his states still torn and raked with disasters. Only yesterday he had strapped his binoculars to his belt. To day Gertrude had looked through them perhaps a score of times, for they had been a source of pleasure and thrill to her being much better than those she usually has. Now, Walter, thought they would be good medicine or otherwise to him. He would see the whole thing through, and at a very close range. He would not even leave himself any room for the slightest doubt. He had laughed scornfully behind the rock, even when bullets were sipping close to his head, and the same grim smile came to his lips now as he focused his glasses on the solitary figure at the head of the raft. The smile increased when he saw General Concontinian Arronburg. It was as if he could easily reach out and touch him with his hand. Ad never in the world, he thought had he seen such a soldier. A moment before a flashing vision came to him out of a rural country, the multitude colored tents, the half naked men the great raft floating about without perceptible motion on the placid bosom of the great river had stirred his imagination until he saw a strange picture. But there was something about a few feet of his eyes. He was more like a heavy set movie picture actor, who acts the dangerous hero roles always seen on the screen. One great arm was raised as Walter looked, and his tremendous voice was rolling over the river again. His hair was combed well and black in color and he wore a mustache in Irish style, and he was laughing as he waved and shouted to Gertrude Angeline—a joyous splendid giant of a man whose head almost on the point of lopping in to the water in his eagerness to clasp in his arms the little girl who was coming to him.

Walter drew a deep breath, and there came an unconscious tightening at his heart as he turned his glasses upon Gertrude Angeline. She was still standing in the bow of the boat, and her back was toward him but she too had seen him and waved several times to him to come. He could see the glint of the fire light in her hair. She was waving her hands cheerfully to him now, and the poise of her slim body told him that in her eagerness she would have darted from the bow of the boat had she possessed wings. Again he looked at General Concontinian Arronburg. And this was the man, of whom a Glendolinian general it was said could match with the biggest army. It was inconceivable. Yet he had heard Gertrude say that often and now he heard her voice apparently repeating those very words in his ear. But she had surely been joking with him. She had been staring up this little surprise for him. She had probably wanted him to discover with his own eyes what a splendid man this chief of one of the best Christian armies was. And as yet, while Walter continued to stare, there came to him the unpleasant thought of the unusual thing he was looking upon. It struck him like a clashing discord—the fact of danger for even him and his army in this enormous woods—a condition inconceivable, and out of tune with the beautiful things he had built up in his mind about the army and the general, his niece, and his own mission. In his soul he had envisioned even Gertrude and the Vivian Girls as lovely lovely roses, easily crushed, easily destroyed, a sweet line of treasures to be guarded from all such horrors of a "fore sy" war, a number of little Violet creatures as fragile as they were brave and loyal. And General Concontinian Arronburg standing there in full uniform at the edge of his raft, looked as if he was a leader of some army that all the army of earth and hell could not lick.

There was something about this great man, something even saintly about him. He needed only the attire and Walter could have sworn he was the "Great Heart" we read of in the Pilgrims Progress written by John Bunyan. At least these were his first impressions, impressions roused by thoughts of Gertrude Angeline, being his niece.

Then the reaction swept over him. General Arronburg was not an officer of lower rank than others, even though his excited mind unconsciously had at first conceived him as such. There were gladness and laughter in his face. There was even the contagion of joy and good cheer in the voice that boomed over the river. Laughter and shouts and chants answered it from the shore, while the rowers in Gertrude's boat burst into a wild and exultant snatch of song, and made their oars fairly crack. And there came a solitary yell from the old woman, who was close to the head of the raft now. And from the raft itself came a slowly swelling volume of sound, the urge and voice and exultation of red blooded men a thrill with the glory of an unconquered Christian army, and the wild freedom of their leaders. The truth came to Walter then. General Arronburg was the beloved big brother of his whole army.

For a long time he waited, his muscles tense, his jaws set right good and tight. Good inspiration, a righteous sort of inspiration set upon him for his being willing to wait for his coming, and not show the showing the moral cowardice by going off against the advice of Gertrude or Evans who knew when it was best to remain and when it was best to go. The boat was very close to the raft now. He saw Gertrude after looking back at him, turn and herself fling a rope to General Arronburg. Then the boat swung alongside. In another moment General Arronburg had leaped over, and Gertrude was with him on the raft. For a space everything else was hidden out of sight from Walter. Then he saw General Arronburg arm ga arms gather the alba form into their embrace. He saw Gertrude's hands go fondly up to the soldiers' faces. And then, what a great man,-- Walter cut the distance there. He turned his shoulder to the raft, and snatched the binoculars in the case at his belt saying to himself: "Would to God she was his daughter instead of his niece. He was worthy of a hundred good children like her." Some one was coming in his direction from the big boat. It was the soldier who had brought to him and Gertrude the news of general Arronburg's arrival. Walter went down to meet him. From the foot of the ridge he again turned his eyes in the direction of the raft. General Arronburg and Gertrude Angeline were just about to enter the little cabin in the center of the drift of drifting mass of timber, and just then the messenger said to Walter: "You poor boob, why did you not follow instead of standing there gazing. General Arronburg wanted to see you awful bad, now he is coming to you. Stay and meet him in the ship."

It was easy for Walter Starring to guess why the soldier had turned back for him, and why the second message to him. Many men of the forest rangers were busy about the big boat, and Jack Evans himself stood in the stern, a long heavy pole in his hands, giving command to others. The big boat was beginning to swing out into the stream, when Walter leaped aboard. A wide grin spread over Evans' face. He eyed Walter keenly and laughed in his deep chest, an unmistakable suggestion in the note of it.

"You look to be seek 'alt," he said in an undertone, for Walter's ears alone. "You look ver unhappy on pise lak lecture boy about something what happen when you took ze pack through ze glass up there oh? Or see it is zat you grow frighten because you fear ver soon general Arronburg might I not let you go on ze adventure? Res eet sat?"

"A quick thought came to Walter. "Is it true that no Glandelinian general no matter how good his fighting men of the army is can not whip general Arronburg?"

"Evans threw out his chest with a mighty intake of breath. "Then he exploded: "No Glandelinian general in ze world can lick ze general Arronburg."

"I do believe general Arronburg is a good man and has a powerful army to back him," mused Walter, letting his eyes also travel slowly from Evans' feet to the top of his head. "I measured him well through the glasses, Evans. He will some day have a great fight with the best Glandelinian general living and leading armies and that is with general Isner Hoidi wylstee. But I am afraid he'll be no match for that Glandelinian general."

He did not wait for general Evans' reply, but went into the cabin and closed the door behind him. He did not like the taunting note of suggestiveness in the other's words. Was it possible that Evans suspected the true state of his mind, that he was worried about Evans, general Arronburg his whole army, and all the others concerning the nature of the burning forest, and that his heart was sick because of what he had felt and believed all along. He flushed hotly. It also made him very uncomfortable to feel that even Evans himself might have guessed the great and hidden danger lurking in those dreaded woods."

Walter looked through the window toward the big raft. The boat itself was drifting downstream, possibly two hundred or more feet from the shore, but it was quite evident that Jack Evans was making no effort whatever to bring it close to the floating mass of timber, which as he observed in the fire glow was making no kind of change down the river either. Walter's mind painted swiftly, what was happening in the cabin into which Gertrude and general Arronburg had disappeared, and he wondered what would happen if the great fire would come up just as the raft grounded on the river. At this moment Gertrude was telling of him, of the adventure in the hot patch of sand. He fancied the suppressed excitement in her voice as she unburdened herself. He saw general Arronburg's face change its color his muscles tighten --- and crouching in silence he seemed to see the misshapen form of the insane woman listening to what was passing between the other two. And then suddenly he heard very close to him again the mad monotone of the insane woman's voice crying plaintively: "Has any one seen my little girl, nelli! nelli!"

His blood ran a little faster and his old craft was a strong living thing within him once more. Love for his cause had strengthened his desire and also his great ingenuity. For a long space or time a thing had risen before him that was mightier than the majesty of the Abhisennian military law, and he had not missed the telltale eye---because of his love for his country. Now he had shot squarely for it, and the bell rung in his brain. Three times three again made nine. Facts assembled themselves like arguments of in flesh and blood. Those facts would have convinced any Christian general, and they now convinced Walter Starring more than ever. He had set out to get that information, very important for the cause, and he was going to do it, and he, Walter would like to know the one who was going to stop him. For all these past disasters, Glandelinia to him was like a monster who had painted the blackest page of crime in any history of worlds, and therefore he was going to obtain the chance to go alive or dead.

The thing was a shock, but Walter no longer tried to evade the point. His business was no longer with a cause supposed to be outrun by a foe. It was with the efforts to find out who was really responsible for the disasters, and he would like to see who would prevent his going, Angeline, or Glandelinian, and also Evans. He smiled a little grimly as he thought of his approaching adventure with the Vivian Girls' guards. General Arronburg would be astonished at the position he had also in store for him. But he was sure that general Arronburg would accept. And then if he ran out in his adventure, for and for Violet, and her sisters secured the information they so ardently desired. The smile faded from his lips. His face grew much older as he looked slowly about the cabin of the big boat, with its sweet and lingering whispers of the presence of a brave girl heroine. It still was a part of her for it seemed still to breathe of her fragrance, and her holy beauty, it seemed to be waiting for her, crying softly for her return. Yet once he had been with other child scouts even lovelier than Gertrude Angeline. He had not hesitated then to go into their company. Without great effort he had secured the friendship of Violet, and her sisters, and had sent her their enemies all of them to--- well need not mention the word but we know what the word is. And now as he recalled those days, the truth came to him that even the in the darkest hour, Violet and her sisters had repaid him a thousand fold. They had not failed to do what they promised him. With him they had fought bravely and defiantly. And had Gertrude Angeline done that? Yes done as much was also a great and brave scout worthy of her co mission with the Vivian Girls. If not for her he would be in the grave now. And she in danger, secret danger. His fingers clinched slowly, and a thickening came in his throat. His hatred of Glandelinia burned him.

Would she bring on him a exulted place by telling general Arronburg of the many hours they had spent to gether and how he had shown his gratitude to her for saving him. Would she confess to him the secret of that precious moment when she had lain across or against his breast, her arms about him, her face pressed to his. Would she speak to him of secret hours, of warm flushes that had come to her face, of glowing fires that had at times burned in her eyes when he had been very near to her. Would she reveal everything to general Arronburg Arronburg her uncle. He was powerless to combat that voice that told him no. If she did what would the general do? Even Violet and her sisters had helped him fight the enemy openly, and had not employed their beauty as weapons. Gertrude Angeline had put between him and danger a strong barrier, and that was the general himself. What he was thinking seemed laughable, yet he knew there could be no discriminating distinctions between adventures now that he was determined to play the game to the end, for the Country's cause.

When Walter went out on deck, Evans was sweating from his exertions at the stern sweep. He looked at Walter and noticed there was a change in him. He was not the same a man who had come into the cabin an hour before, and the fact impressed itself strongly upon Evans. There was something in the appearance of Walter that held back the speech at the end of Evans' tongue. And so it was Walter Starring who spoke first.

"When will general Arronburg sent for me to come into his presence?" he demanded. "If he doesn't go soon, I'll go to him."

For an instant Jack Evans's face darkened. Then as he bent over the sweep the sweep with his great back to Walter, he shouted audibly, and satill: "Would you go Walter, surely why did you not go when she called to you. They been waiting."

Evans did not look over his shoulder, and as he did not see the hot flush that gathered in Walter's face. But Walter was sure he knew it was there, and that Evans had guessed the truth of matters. There was a confident note in his voice as if he could not quite keep to himself the surprise, that he that is Walter had made a great mistake in not following after Gertrude as she had asked him to, who if his own judgement had been followed would not have been on the adventure with him long ago. It was the final surprise to Walter. He realized he had made a mistake and his muscles tensed. For the first time he felt a desire to shoot a naked iron covered fist into Manley's mouth. He laid a hand on Evans' shoulder, and the lay latter turned about slowly. He saw what was in the other's eyes.

"Until this moment I have not known what a great pleasure it will be to go out on the adventure with you," said Walter quietly. "Let's make the plans of it to morrow---in the morning if you wish. Take word to general Arronburg, that I will ask him a great favor that I wish, that I will obtain the information, a gamble as large that I believe he'll refuse to cover it. But I do think much of this general Arronburg having heard of him so much though it is the first time I have had the chance to see him. I believe him to be a big fighter, like yourself. And also a dangerous man to the enemy as well as his army. Mark my word, he may tickle the danger is so great for us that he will not accept my wager."

Evans did not answer. He was looking over Walter's shoulder. He even did not seem to have heard what the other had said, yet there had come a sudden gleam of exultation in his eyes as and he replied still gazing toward the raft:

"I believe you myself as Walter. See General Arronburg, so being general he seems to answer for himself. I hope he does not refuse to let us do it, for sat would spoil our great country to morrow."

Walter turned toward the raft. At the distance which separated them, he could make out the graceful and quiet figure of general Arronburg getting into a boat. The humped up form already in that boat he knew was the insane woman. He could not see Gertrude Angeline. Very lightly Evans touched his arm.

"Wait as must go in ze cabin," he suggested softly. "If something important happens between ze two eet eet, eet bes, to many eyes do not see. You understand we I mean wait. Maybe spies around. You no like zat eet?"

"I understand," nodded Walter.

For some time Walter waited in the cabin. He did not look through the widow window to watch the approach of general Glandelinian Arronburg. He sat down and picked up a prayer book from the table upon which lay the same old cat fast asleep, was as cool as ice now, and his blood flowed evenly and his pulse beat unhurriedly. Never had he felt himself more his own master, more like grappling with any situation even dangerous. General Arronburg was coming to interview him. He had no doubt of that. Perhaps not unusually at that. But one way or another something unusual was bound to happen in the boats cabin within the next half hour. Now that the impending day was close at hand, Walters seemed for having Arronburg go into the making of a stupendous wager seemed to him rather ridiculous. With calculating coldness he was forced to concede that general Arronburg would be somewhat of a fool to accept the wager in mind, when it seemed impossible to carry it out. For Gertrude, and the chief of the Angelinian ladies, the best thing would be to move on into the safer parts of the woods and not run headon into the face of one of the worst forest fires on record. As his mind charged itself for the approaching interview, Walter found himself staring at a picture of a Saint, and he looked at it closely. Then Walter replaced the book on the table without weakening the cat and looked toward the door. No General Arronburg would not hesitate to even also warn him not to make the trip. Not if he Walter Starring made the solution of the matter a necessity. There were times he told himself when it was confoundingly embarrassing to force the letter of the gambler's law. And this was one of them. He was not afraid to disregard advice, and there was no one who could stop him if he so desired to go in spite of him, as the papers on him proved he would if possible not accept no hindrance and could arrest any one hindering his purpose. But he was not a reckless man and did not believe in trying to accomplish anything that might be like suicide. He was now thinking again of Gertrude Angelina, and then of violet, and her sisters. The scraping of a boat against the side of the big barge recalled him suddenly to the moment at hand. He now heard low voices, and one of them he knew was general Arronburg. For an interval the voices continued, frequently so low that he could not distinguish them at all. For ten minutes he waited impatiently. Then the door swung open and general Arronburg came in.

glowily and respectfully Walter rose to meet him and saluted, and at the same moment the great general closed the door behind him returning the salute. There was no greeting in either one as it was the law they could not greet each other like civilians did. Both were unexcited, sure of themselves, impassive as a thing of steel. Both were ready to fight the foe. They always expected to fight. It only remained for general Arronburg himself to show what sort of a fight it was to be when the proper time came. And Walter was amazed at general Arronburg without betraying that amazement. In the vivid ruddy light of distant fires that shot through the windows (Walter having not lighted a lamp) the chief general of the best christian armies stood looking at Walter. He wore a yellow silken shirt just now open at the throat, and it was a splendid throat that Walter saw, and a splendid fighting head and face above it, with its coal black mustache and hair. But what he saw chiefly were general Arronburg's eyes. They were the sort of eyes he liked to see in a fighting Abbaonian general, the greenish brown that reflected the fire light like polished flint. But a just now there was no flash of battle glow, as he was not war excited. A glandolinian army was far from him. And general Arronburg was not either excited nor in a bad humor.

Nor did Walter's attitude appear to disturb him in the least. He was smiling, his eyes gleamed with almost boyish curiosity as he stared admiringly at Walter—and then slowly a low chuckle of laughter rose in his deep chest as he advanced with an outstretched hand.

"I am general Concentinian Arronburg of the Abbaonian National National army," he said. "I have heard a great deal about you. Colonel Starring." In seeking after your information you have had an unfortunate time, and now if you need I am come to help you."

It was astonishing to Walter to have this great general come to him, a mere under-rank colonel with an extended hand of real friendship, when he had anticipated only a military greeting. At general Arronburg was smiling at him in a way his own father used to smile. There was no doubt of that. And he had the great chance to tell him that though he had been unfortunate in his adventure that he would give him all the help he needed. Walter's attitude did not change as he reached out a hand to meet the other. But there was a responsive gleam of humor in his eyes and on his lips, and seeing these things, the general turned his hand then to the open box of cigars, and then said as he handed two to Walter:

"It's funny" he said, as if speaking to himself, and with only a drawing note of the Abbaonian in his voice. "I come to this point, find my place in an awful fix, a terrible situation, rescuing a colonel, go through a forest fire twice, and the stranger happens to be one of the best known friends of the famous vivian girls. I know so well, gracious but—say it is strange. And my little niece saved his life, and made his peace, and gave him my own bed, and walked with him in the forest. Ah what a lucky boy you are Colonel. I wish indeed that you were my son." He turned looking at Walter and then continued: "Yes indeed you are lucky Walter. But for any one would my Gertrude have done that. You are lucky because the sniper did not kill you behind the rock, and you are lucky you did not perish between forest fires, you are lucky he shrugged his big shoulders. And now you are to receive my help Walter. But heavens I cannot understand why you desire such an adventure when you know the likeness of such an one enemy. I sure cannot understand. It is more perilous than any adventure I ever heard any one go out for before in a life."

To say his life Walter could not in these few seconds measure up the great general's life had said nothing at all but allowed general Arronburg to do the talking as he should. And now general Arronburg stood there, one of the finest Abbaonian soldiers he had ever looked upon, as if he were overcome by a great wonder. And yet Walter also sensed the feeling that that Gertrude had clutched for him and more was true. He had given him assurance of her unlimited confidence that her uncle could adjust to any situation in the world, and Walter responded that general Arronburg measured up splendidly to that particular type of man. The smile had not left his face, the blood in or was still in his eyes. Walter smiled back. He recognized the cleverness of the general too. General Arronburg was a man who would smile like that even as he fought and lead troops through the thickest battle, and general Arronburg was like that now, and Walter loved a smiling fighter, even if he had to go to the death with him.

"I am colonel Starring of general Vivian's right grand division, and also a member of the powerful Gemini," he said. "Sit down general won't you, and I will tell you a few things that have happened. And then—"

"No, No I do not think it is necessary sir. I have already already listened for three hours and a half, and I am a man who does not like to hear a story twice no matter how interesting it is. You are of the Grand Gemini I know it from that ensign you wear. I love the Gemini, and especially their grand leaders. They are the bravest of men I have ever known, and all kinds of brave men are my brothers. They have done a whole lot for our country's cause, and are doing everything like you are attempting now. I know your mission for the Vivian Girls themselves wrote to me about it. You are out to find the reason if possible why and to what purpose the enemy made all the disasters of the past. Mainly what their purpose is. Is it not so. And you were shot at behind the rock back there. You were almost killed. And it was a skulking cowardly glandolinian an oak woodchid the shooting. Yes for a time she thought were you were dead. She tried to shoot your assassin. But she says it was bad shooting for her. I have taught her better, and so have violet and her sisters and others but the glare of distant fires was blinding there in the hot white sand. And after that I know everything that has happened. General Jack Evans also was right. I shall ask him a lot about the situation. But also you know Gertrude must have her way, and my Gertrude's gentle heart was touched because you are a brave man and a soldier Walter. But I am not surprised for I have heard lots about you. And therefore we shall be friends. Only as a friend will I take you along with my army to let you make on out plans for your purpose. And we are going there, to get out of these burning woods. It is danger out for even my very army. If I had known this I'd have taken a different course. But one third of my men will do what they can to check the course of the blaze."

In spite of what might have been said and what might have been the entirely proper thing to do at this particular moment, Walter's face broke into a smile as he drew a second chair close up to the table. He was swift indeed to readjust himself.

It suddenly came back to him how he had grinned behind the rock, when death seemed so close at hand. And general Arronburg Arronburg was like that now. Walter measured him again as the chief of the Christian armies sat down opposite him. The gleam that lay in his eyes told Walter that the general was not afraid of anything on the face of the earth, even of the worst glandolinian or others.

"We are smiling now because it happened to please us immensely," Walter read in them. "But in a moment if it is necessary we shall give glandolinia all the fight she wants."

Walter looked a little over the table and studied the general for several moments. "You go we are not going to be able to go very fast on the march if the army fights the fire then, Your Excellency," he said. "We might be forced to stop many times during the advance, and there you and your armies could fool the enemy if you will and use the whole army at intervals to fight the fire. If they who have always terrorized the enemy cannot overcome the fire, then it must be 'some fire'. If we both could I know it: we would capture every glandolinian general there is in glandolinia overseas to make them answer for the awful flood and other great disasters that have happened. There is one thing I'm sure you know general. That is largely up to you if you'll answer. Why did the hidden glandolinian sniper try to kill me behind the rock. And what did he know about my mission when I tried every means possible to keep it a dead secret, even from my best friends?"

General Arronburg's eyes did not for an instant leave Walter's face. But slowly a change came into them, the smile faded gradually, the blue went out, and up from behind seemed to come another pair of eyes that were as hard as steel and cold as ice. Yet they were not eyes that showed excitement or passion. And the general's voice when he spoke, lacked the deep and vibrant note that had been in it. It was as if the general had placed upon it the force of a mighty will, chaining it back, just as if something unusually terrible was hidden and lay chained behind the eyes.

"Why should we two men play like little children Walter?" "!!!!!!" He asked. "We might as well come out squarely, honestly like men. I know what happened. You were almost killed by the sniper, and you heard that poor wreck of a woman call for her baby girl. My niece has told you about that—how one of my men found her in the forest, with her mind gone and her body broken up like you see it now. And about my niece general Arronburg's fist grew into knotted lumps—" on the table. "No, I will die---I will kill all the glandelinians before I'll let the enemy harm a hair of her head. I will tell you why the skunk shot at you behind the rock. We are men both of us and of the nationals even though you are of a foreign nation. You sat out on your mission. Violet, one of the Princesses wrote me a note telling me that they were not able to warn you on time but that they saw several or more mysterious men follow you out of camp but at a distance. It was one of them, I am sure that shot at you while you were sheltered behind the rock. Gertrude told me when she and her party came up in the boat and on hearing the shots leaped ashore and answered it, they saw or she saw four men run and two of them looked like the "Mutt and Jeff" spies of the foe. But we are not afraid. And you in my place---what would you do Walter, fight the fire with my whole army or use half of it for the purpose and sent the other to continue the advance?"

In the moments silence each officer looked very staidly at the other. "I would use half of it to fight the fire while the other retreats," said Walter slowly. Then when necessary rest that half and put the fresh section into the fire battle. If it was for the purpose of trying to check such a fire I would fight it sectionally with the whole army."

"He believed he was drawing the net now for the conflagration, that it would catch the big fire where he wanted it. He leaned a little over the table. "And I too must help fight it when over necessary," he added. "You know our laws general. "We don't go back without winning the fight, unless we happen to be hoodwinked hoodwinked or die. And I and you would be stupid men if we did not understand or try to understand the situation here. It yet would be easy for any hidden glandelinian enemy to get rid of me in the bargain. But I don't believe if I had a good guard of sharpshooters my path way would be so dangerous." A flicker of a smile crossed his lips. "And Gertrude---Gertrude."

"General Arronburg interrupted him. "It will please me to have you call her Gertrude. And it will please me also. If we only had eyes that could see what is in her little heart. Life is strange and full of different kinds of adventures. Walter, it is a great time for us all, I swear it on my soul. "He shrugged his great shoulders smiling again straight into Walter's face. "She what happened? You set out for the most record breaking adventure ever made by any one yet. My niece comes up in her boat on time to save to you from the scoundrels who shoot you. She pitons you, saves your life, brings you home, and---it is true, learns to care for you more than she almost could. But that does not make me astonished. Walter, she would do that for any one in trouble like you have been. What she does I like to do. As the rule of old time pirates do "dead men tell no tales" Walter, but there are times when living men also keep tales to themselves. And that is what you are also going to do for your safety sake. Walter, you are going to keep to yourself, the thing that happened behind the rock, and you are going to disguise yourself so no one can know you. You are going to keep in your heart the mummings of outpour mad lady. Never if you value your safety will they pass your lips. I know it is for your safety. There may be even rebel spies in my ranks who know. I'll stake my life on it that you will keep mum." General Arronburg was talking slowly and unexcitedly. At least there was even an unshakable confidence in his deep voice. It did not imply a threat but only a warning, even though the general was sure of himself. And his eyes had deepened into blue again, and were more friendly.

"You would stake your life?" repeated Walter questionly. "You would do that? On what?"

General Arronburg rose slowly to his feet, and looked about the cabin with a shining light in his eyes, that was both pride and exaltation. He moved toward the end of the room where the great organ organ stood, and for several minutes his big fingers touched the keys, and he played the "Abbasian National March", then seeing the lacy bit of handkerchief that lay there, he picked it up and then placed it back again. Walter did not urge his question but waited patiently. In spite of his effort to fight it down he found himself in the grip of a mysterious and strongly growing thrill as he watched the great general. Never had the proud presence of any general before have the same effect upon him, and strangely the thought came to him that he was matched, even over-matched. It was as if general Arronburg had brought with him into the great cabin something more than the splendid strength of his body, a thing that reached out in the interval of silence between them, warning Walter that all the efforts of the whole world would not swerve the chief of the christian armies from what was already in his mind. Then for a moment the thought passed from Walter that fate in was in store for glandelinia if general Arronburg ever got big enough armies gathered together. His vision centered in the man and general alone, and as he too rose, to his feet, an unconscious smile came to his lips, as he recalled general's warnings.

"I ask you your Excellency" said he, "that if you would really stake your life in such a matter as you say, then can what would you stake it. Of course if your words were merely accidental, and meant nothing." "

"If I had a thousand lives, I would stake them one on top of the other, as I have said," interrupted general Arronburg. Suddenly his laugh boomed out, and his voice became louder. "Walter Arronburg, as you are a brave man I have come to offer you just that test. Out if it was not for Gertrude the glandelinian sniper would easily have killed you then. He could have put you at the bottom of the river, and how completely he could have made you disappear. And then all of wicked glandelinia's secrets would be safe. They would not be found out by the best christian spy in the world. And the man who ordered the floods and other disasters would be safe for a time. That reason had an easy answer against you as a man who in making efforts to destroy a little child, you were absolutely helpless then. But she saved you. It is best for you to go with us on the march until we have a chance for you to easily slip under a window as only there can you secure the information and no other way. So you are going on to the southward with us, and if at the end of October you do die, you do not willingly say I have won my wager---that you do succeed in obtaining the information for the Vivian Girls, I general Constantin Arronburg, the greatest leader of all christian armies, and the best fighter of all, will go with you into the forest, and you may shoot out of me the life which is the end of the game then. Is not that fair. Can you suggest a better way---between men like you and me."

"If you will let me sir, I can at least suggest a way that might and should have the virtue of saving much time," replied Walter. "First however I must understand my position here, especially if going with your army through the burning forest. I am---take it in as much peril as your whole army?"

"I presume so, but where you go?" declared general Arronburg. Then the eyes of the two officers met on a dead level.

"As soon as the opportunity comes I'm going to go on my adventure, and yours is going to be my help," said Walter. "It is a little sport in a way, and there was fixed up between us, for the rank surprise of the Glandelinian nation. I have heard that in strength and with the sword and pistol and other things general Jack Evans is the best fighting christian general ever known in any Abbasian army. And I fear therefore do not like to go anywhere just now unless I have him as a helper. And he has agreed to go."

For the first time general Arronburg's placidity seemed to leave him. His brow became quite clouded, there was a momentary frown in his face, and there was a certain disconsolate helplessness or hopelessness in the shrug of his giant shoulders. Indeed it was if Walter's words had suddenly robbed the day of all the light for the chief of the christian generals. His voice too carried on with a unhappily and disappointed note, as he made a gesture toward the window.

"Walter in my army as well as among your friends, there are many men, and now they have scarcely rested or slept since word was brought to them that you, was to make a special adventure and go out on it with general Jack Evans. Heavens but they have gambled without even seeing you until the very uniforms on their backs are in the hazard, and they have even cracked their very muscles in labor to overtake you. They have prayed away their very souls to god and His Blessed mother, and even all the saints and Angels that it would be a good successful adventure you are about to make, and that you would not run into any peril that would be too great. It is like an adventure of one man going out with one rifle to hunt a thousand tigers, which will fight among themselves before they eat you up too quickly. It has been a long time since any one of our best officers and soldiers have ever gone on an adventure, and also along time since my army has ever had a good fight with the enemy since we have dared to stand up against Inner Wyltze at Delights Junction and Gedomind. Ugh it tasks my heart out to tell you that the adventure cannot be until I say so. That now is too dangerous to proceed."

General Arronburg made no effort to suppress his emotion. Indeed he seemed more like a huge disappointed child than a great man. He walked to the window, peered forth from it the raft, and as he shrugged his big shoulders again something like a groan came from him. The thrill of approaching triumph kept through Walter's blood. Even the flavor of it was in his eyes when general Arronburg turned from the window.

"Q Are you disappointed or scared, general Arronburg. You would like to see me and Evans make the adventure right way."

The blue steel in general Arronburg's eyes flared back. "If the price were a year of my life---I would give it---if the peril was not too inner brain-sure as it is now. The Glandelinians would discover your plans too quickly. I'm an sure, I love to look upon a good brave man, especially one who is successful in anything he goes to undertake."

"Then you shall see a good successful adventure, your Excellency." "If I discovered the Glandelinians would kill you, Colonel. Think also of the cruel forest fires ranging for hundreds of miles. You are not even big yet. You are not any match for such an adventure."

"I shall accomplish it, general,---accomplish it so that Abbasia can whip Glandelinia, and now she is her master."

"Do not know the situation or the nature of such an adventure, Colonel. For ten times many of the general have tried that, and have been unsuccessful."

"But I shall succeed in my mission," repeated Walter. "I will even wager you anything in the world---anything possible---even a life---against life---that I shall succeed---that I shall accomplish the most astonishing adventure on all record."

"My niece has made me promise that I will try and stop your intentions," the general said.

"And why---why should she insist in a matter such as this which properly should be settled by the Vivian Girl Princesses themselves. If only they say so I'll postpone the trip. I must do it or Ghandolina will continue to take such awful disasters, and maybe catastrophes that will be worse than the Albigaon horror."

The glow before had faded from the face of General Armstrong, but in a moment it became clouded again, though he laughed with a "Thank you so much." My little niece is a very gentle hearted girl, and I think that she is a perfect little princess. She laughed and thought that it was a joke, and a general usually was so often ridiculed by the "Vivian Girl" people. But with this girl it is quite different. She was able to see the face when she started and went to let her go out on such an unkind attack with penance, who also she is greatly concerned about. You also is afraid that if you will never come back again, and she does not want you to come to and up in disaster. But I tell you I am not so sure about your safety either Colonel. And she does not try to hide but anything from me. She tells me everything like a little child. And so--"

"I'm going to make the adventure a success," said Walter. And he wondered if general Aronburg could hear the thumping of his heart or if his men gave betrayal of the hot flood it was pumping through his body. "General Jack Evans and I have pledged ourselves. We shall fight the enemy by gaining this most important of information, and will proceed as soon as possible, unless you tie one of us or both of us hand and foot. And as for a wager-----"

"Yes what have you to wager?" "I'll give you a demanded general Arronburg very eagerly.

"You know the odds are tremendously great," temporized Walter.

"That I understand Colonel."

"But making a tremendous adventure without a wager would be like a pocket book without money, your Excellency."

"You spoke truly, Colonel."

Walter came nearer, and laid a hand on the others arm. "Your Excellency -- I hope you and your grand little niece-- will understand what I am about to offer. It is this. If Evans and I do not make a successful issue of the adventure, then I and he will disappear into the forests, and we 'll never face the Vivian Girls or their friends again. No whisper of our presence will ever reach even the world. I will forget everything that happened in the past, and will brand ourselves as the greatest failure of all times. All this if we fail." He paused and waited. General Aronburg made no answer, but amazement came into his face and after that a slow and burning fire in his eyes which told how deeply and vitally Walters words had struck into his soul. "And if I should happen to win?" continued Walter, turning a bit carelessly toward the widow. "Why I should expect a large payment from you. If I do win your fulfillment of the great wager will be to send to the Abbotinian Government my records and gain for me a position as a general in your co. co. command. That is all I am asking for no odds, though you concede the handicap for us both, I and Evans is tremendously great."

He did not look at general Arronburg. But behind him he heard the others deep breathing. For ten minutes he sat there motionless. Outside they could hear the soft swish of water, the low voices of men in the stern, and a shout and the barking of a number of dogs coming from the raft face on the river. For Walter the moment was one of great suspense. He turned again at his ear only as if his proposition were a matter of but little little significance to him.
 General Arronburg was not looking at him. He was staring toward the door as if through it he could see the powerful form of general Jack Evans standing before it. And Walter could see that his face was flaming with a great desire, and that the blood in his body was pounding to the mighty urge of it. Suddenly he faced Walter.

"Colonel, listen to me carefully he said. 'I know you are a brave man, that you are a man of honor, and I know you will bury secretly in his heart what I am going to tell you now, and never let a word of it come--even to my niece Gertrude. I do not blame you for loving her as if she were your own child. You could not help that. All the soldiers and officers do. You have fought desperately to keep it within yourself, and for that I honor you. How do I know. Why because she has told me. A heart of any good child understands, and her ears are quick to hear also.' Colonel, when you were wounded or on to death, and your mind was wandering, you told her again and again you would give anything if she was your own daughter, that you loved her as a father loves his only child--and when she brought you back to life, her eyes saw more than once the truth of what your lips had betrayed, though you tried desperately to keep it to yourself. Even more Colonel, she felt the touch of your lips on her head that day. She understands. She has told me everything, openly innocently, yet her heart thrills with that sympathy of a child who knows she is loved by a friend. Colonel if you could have seen the light in her eyes, and the glow in her cheeks as she told me these very secrets. But I am not surprised Colonel. No it is only because you are a brave man, and one of honor that I tell you this now. Yet it is necessary that I tell you, because if we make the big wager we must drop my Noice from such a gamble. It would not be right for her. Do you comprehend me, Colonel starring?"

There was a pause a momentary pause then the general continued----"We are two officers two men, one an Abbinannian, and the other an Irishman, both strong men, strong in the holy Abbinannian cause, good fighting men good officers, one a great record breaking general, and the other a professional record breaking christian spy. I general Conscientious growning--cannot feel the sense of hanking a child's heart which is pure and sweet, clean and a lover of Our Blessed Lord, and where a man has fought against a love with honor, also has also fought against Our Blessed Lords enemies with the same fury, as you have fought, and you, Walter Starring, of the great and noble Gomini--cannot + know strike with your hard mans hand that tender little heart, that is like our Blessed Lords most beautiful flower, of paradise, and which this moment is beating faster than it should with the fear that some hour will betray you if you go too soon on such a rash adventure. It is not so Colonel Starring. We will make the wager ~~you~~---yes. But if you go out on the adventure too soon, and you cannot succeed in a thousand years effort I'm sure--I will bring you a good high commission in my army and have you my next suucessor in case I fail in battle. But in case of such peril I will not under any conditions despite that permit you have in your possession allow you to go too soon because of the peril. No never. Yet I swear if you go when the proper time comes and you succeed I will do you the favor, if you win + will secure for you the com mission but then you must furnish evident proof that you are able to tell all you discovered, and of who the ones were who ordered the wackling of the great war disasters of the past, and that is very considerable, Walter. Please for her sake, wait a little while until we advance near enough to secure a view of vanoyles army, and get out of the reach of this unusual Red Plague. Do you agree?"

Slowly Walter held out a hand. Ge a general Conventinian Aronburg gripped it tightly, and the fingers of the two men met like bands of steel.

"To morrow you and general Evans may make the plans if you like," said general confederian Aronburg. "You two will face such terrible perils that I'm afraid I should both of you may not come through it alive, and the nation will never forget it, or forgive it: it'll am sorry. Such a man as you I would like to have as a good brother. And Gertrude I'm afraid she'll never forgive me. And she always will remember it. The thought will never die out of her heart, that I was a beast you let you and Evans go out on such an adventure. But it is best for the safety of the nation. You are doing your duty. And my men. Ah heavens but it will be an unusual expectation for these Colonels. I'm sorry."

Slowly his hand unclenched. Then he turned to the door as if reluctant to boggle a moment later it was closed behind him, and Walter had w was alone again. He had not spoken this time, or replied to the engulfing truths that had fallen so fall quickly quietly and without a betrayal of confidence in the outcome of the adventure from general Arromburg's lips. Inwardly he felt he was crushed. Yet his face was like stone, hiding his shame. Then suddenly there came a sound outside that sent the blood through his cold veins again. It was general Arromburg and many of his men who had boarded the boat praying for Colonel Starring. It was not the prayer for the successful issue of a undertaking, but the feeling of a man whose heart was bleeding, and into whose life there had come an unexpected pain or grief. It sound of the prayer was wild and free, and filled with fear of the results of Walter's adventure. And Walter listening to it, felt something that was more than admiration for this great general growing within him. And unconsciously his lips slowly repeated the prayer, "Blessed Lord Jesus preserve the two brave men on the adventure and let it rather be a failure than anything bad happen to them." Amen. In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost Amen. "....."

For over an hour Walter stood at the boat window, and watched the boat that carried general Conscientious Armstrong, and his men and others to the shore. This time it moved slowly, as if general Armstrong was loitering for a purpose, and was thinking deeply of what had just be passed between him and Walter. Walter's fingers tightened, and his face grew tawny... as he gazed into the glow of the western section of the forest fire. He was here now probably two weeks and several days and never had seen the sun and always the sky had been heavy with smoke. Now that the stress of the new nerve breaking moments in the boat's cabin was over, he no longer made any efforts to preserve the sense of coolness and decision with which he had encountered one of the greatest of the Christian generals. For a time deep in his soul he was crushed and humiliated. Every nerve in his body felt as if they were bleeding.

AN UNUSUAL DISCOVERY.
THE FIGHT WITH TWO SPIES.

He had heard general Arronburg's prayer a moment before, but it sounded like a man who was stabbed at the heart. And he was going back probably to Gertrude Angeline like that—drifting scarcely faster than the current that he might secure time to strengthen himself before he would look into the eyes of his niece again. Walter as he watched could see him motionless, his right shoulder hunched forward a little, his head bowed, and in the stern the same woman and two other men paddling listlessly, her eyes on the face of the great general. Without voice Walter cursed listlessly, her eyes on the face of the great general. He had told himself he had made a splendid fight in resisting the temptation of backing out of so great an enterprise. But now what was his own struggle compared with this probable tragedy which even general Arronburg feared his two friends might be facing.

He turned from the window, and looked about the cabin room again—and his face burned in its silent accusation. Like a living thing it painted another picture for him, and for a space he lost his own identity. He saw himself in the place of general Arronburg. He was the uncle of Angelina Arronburg, loving her even as the general loved her, and he came as general Arronburg had come to find a friend of his and his niece in his portion of the woods, a friend who had taken in the boat once belonging to one of the chief forest rangers, which boat he had been, when general Arronburg's niece had a runed back to life, a man who had loved her as if she was his own daughter, who had told her of his love for such children like she, who had kissed her, who had held her close in his arms, whose presence had brought a warmer flush and a brighter glow into eyes and cheeks, that until this friends coming had belonged only to him. And he heard her, as general Arronburg had heard her, pleading with him to keep this man and Evie from going out on a very dangerous adventure, her heard her soft voice telling of them the things that had passed between them, as he also then saw in her eyes—

With almost a cry he swept the thought in a picture from him. It was an unusual thing to conceive, impossible of any reality. And yet the truth would not go. What would he have done in general Arronburg's place? . . .

He went to the window again. General Arronburg was better and more calmly minded than he, for he had come quietly and easily, offering a hand of friendship, generous smiling, while he Walter staring had returned the first handshake as well as he knew how. His eyes first passed from the boat to the raft, and from the raft to the hazy billows of green forests that melted off into countless miles of distance beyond the river to border against the when shown of fire lights beyond the forest horizon line. He knew that on the other side of him lay that same distance, north, east, south, and west, vast spaces of a forested region studded with forest villages and towns, the same green and golden forests, ten thousand miles of forests, a million hiding places, where hidden armies may lurk and where countless tragedies might remain forever undisturbed. And all this forest was in grave danger of being consumed by an enormous fire. The thought came to him that it would not be difficult to slip out into that world and disappear. He almost cried to general Arronburg. It was the voice of Jack Evans in a snatch of wild and discordant song that brought him back in to grim reality. There was after all that awful unseen peril, and the ways of the accused Glendoline.

After some time he finally observed that the boat was moving faster, and that the paddles of the men were working steadily and with forceful speed. General Arronburg no longer sat hunched in the bow, for now his head appeared to be erect, and he was waving a hand in the direction of the raft. Then a figure had come from the shore too, and Walter caught the glimpse of a little girl in dress something white fluttering over her head, waving back at general Arronburg. It was gone Angelina Arronburg, and he moved away from the window.

For a few minutes or moments he wondered what was now passing between general Arronburg, and his little niece, in the hour or two that followed. The big Rangere bateau had kept abreast of the raft, neither moving faster or slower than it did it, and three times Walter gave in to the strong desire to scan the deck of the lumber raft of floating timbers through his powerful military binoculars. But he saw a better the general or Angelina Arronburg there again until the coming of evening on the and he was on shore somewhere. Then later a general Arronburg appeared—and he was alone. Even at that tremendous distance over the broad Nico-Hollister Run River, he heard the Throbbone voice of the general. Life sprang up everywhere thicker than the swimming of a forest of ants where there had been the drowsy of complete inactivity on the raft and in the forest. A dozen or more of the great swamps were swiftly manned by men who appeared suddenly from the shaded places of canvas shelters, and striped tents. A low murmur of voices rose over the water and then the murmur was broken by howls and shouts as the men ran to their places at the command of general Arronburg's voice, and men in the forests as far as Walter could see were spreading out to many a tree at one time and soon there was the roar of many explosions, and down crashed hundreds of trees. The fight against this forest fire or the effort to check its course in this direction it possible was begun. The work was to make a wide and long breach for the first move of battle. Walter gripped himself, as he listened and watched the slowly drifting raft. He could see general Arronburg clearly, and also his staff which appeared suddenly also shouting as excited midway on the river. For now the big river boat or bateau had worked itself quite nearer. He could see the hard heads and naked arms of the men at the swamps, while many men appeared running this and that way in the forest with long saws and axes. The ever thickening smoke caused by the distant forest fires filled his lungs with that spicy smell of burning pine needles and leaves and pine wood, as that picture of intense excitement lay before him, and and and there came into his own excited soul a covetousness and a strong yearning where before there had been great humiliation, and the grim urge of duty. He found it hard to breathe the air of that burning distant world, he could look at the scenes far off with disgust, he felt he could not tolerate it—and yet he knew that he and his country or the country he served was a part of it—was all the Christian world, and all the unfortunate homeless refugees were a part of it. He felt sorry for the homeless he felt his heart swelling at the exultation and joy in the song of the soldiers as it was evident they were quickly making a large forest breach as quickly and positively many trees were being cut down, and many houses were being brought up to haul them away, while men chopped away the branches. They were making a purpose to stop the course of the fire in this direction while the rest of the army moved on. And yet he was irrevocably an alien, not even receiving his second papers which he was waiting so long to gain his share for desired citizenship. And in spite of all that he was sent out, to find out why the enemy made a perfect sea of destruction throughout California and parts of Angelina and other states, he was an agent of a powerful and merciless force against such ravaging glendolines, that carried with it terrible punishment and death, for those responsible for such awful disasters if caught.

The crew of the big big boat had joined the shoremen in the fighting, and yet as Walter looked through his binoculars again over the ridges and hollows of the forest tops, he could almost discern the course the forest fire was taking in following up the movement of the boat. Walter understood now what general Concentin Arronburg's command had been. Even the large raft with its tented city of life was preparing to tie up for the night, and men were placing in empty spaces all kinds of explosives, tools, and piles of sacks, blocks, shovels and the like. The fight was going to be general. Concentin Arronburg was determined to outwit the fire if possible. A quarter of a mile beyond the river still widened, so that on the far side was a low distant shore, toward which the effort of men at the swamps were slowly edging the raft. A number of other boats shot out on the shore side, and dropped anchors that helped drag the big raft in. Two others tugged at low lines fastened to the shore side bow, and within twenty minutes the first men were plunging up and out of the water on the white strip of beach, and were whipping the fire lines about the nearest trees, while others brought the new explosives and other implements on shore. Long lines of men were working hard as far as Walter could see, cutting down trees, and when they fell break off all their branches, while others were digging ditches as long as deep trenches. Walter was unconsciously smiling in the thrill and triumph of those last moments, and not until he saw a whole line of great trees crash down to heart with a roar like a broadside of cannon, did he sense the fact that Jack Evans and his own followers, and also a number of Gertrude's boy and girl scouts, were bringing the big boat to the opposite shore to be on the safe side, and now both raft and houseboat were anchored for the night, while the fight to prevent the advance of the fire in this location was on in general. It was evident to Walter that general Arronburg was determined to defy the fire in this manner and encamp here for a short space of time.

As the shadows of the distant forest deepened when the glows faded out probably before ever increasing clouds of smoke, Walter felt impending about him an oppression of emptiness, and loneliness, which he had not experienced before. He was disappointed and surprised that the big boat was not tied up just then with the big raft. Already he could see men starting to light small ground fires far in the distance heating at them with empty sacks and making ground ditches or hurling dirt upon the flames. Spirals of new smoke became clouds, and he knew that it was evident the advance guard of the main fire was coming very close, evidently was very near. He looked at his watch. It was only after four o'clock. My gosh he thought, no wonder it is dark like evening. It's the sky covered so thick with smoke. And all the time Walter had thought it was the gathering of night. Then he watched the increasing glow of distant fires again and it was as red as a sunset in the west, and elsewhere against the still thicker shadows more advancing ground fires threw up long streamers or ranks of yellow flames.

On his own side Jack Evans, were preparing their own part of the work, eating however as they done so. It was five o'clock when a soldier waiter had not seen before brought him his supper with the only question,

"How would you like to go out and help stop the fire sir?"
He ate without answering, scarcely noticing the tasteless taste of his food, and half an hour later the soldier reappeared for the dishes, saying kind of sheepishly "I think sir the fire is going to give us a successful resistance."

new heavy forest fire in my day but not one like this. It in flames and smoke I'm going out to fight that's called."

It was not quite dark when he returned to his window, but where the glow was not too bright the far shore was only an indistinct blur of blackness and gloom. The glow of the distant but nearer fires were brighter and appeared nearly the whole horizon. One of them though still away seemed to cover the distant sky with flames while one of the foremost of the ground fires, being twenty miles long threw its flames sometimes twenty to thirty feet in the air and had begun starting new crown fires with amazing rapidity but not heading toward the fighters as yet. But the big one was catching up and Walter knew it.

And he wondered what Angelina Arronburg was doing in this great and exciting hour. Last night they had been together, as if they were daughter and father. He had marvelled at the witchery of the fire glow in her hair and eyes; he had told her of the beauty of it, she had smiled, she had to laugh merrily with him, for hours they had sat in the spell of the night lighted by distant forest fires glowing the sky with red brightness, and the unusually reddishness of the river. And to night, now, she was with general Arronburg, watching the men as they worked desperately to subvert the advance of the "Red Army."

She had not forgotten him and hoped he was safe. He felt sure of it. She was sure if he was to leave now even to do so without saying a word he would never see her again as he had seen her then, and something of bitterness came to him as he thought of that. General Denshchikoff and Arronburg, could he have seen her in a year, when he told her she was the bravest girl in existence, would have shook hands with him in a still more friendly way in that meeting in the clubhouse last night who had told general Arronburg all she could have revealed. There were things that she could not keep to herself, which she dared not keep to herself if she desired Walter to receive the honor. Did she feel that enthusiasm as he was feeling it now as he watched the soldiers at work like so many busy ants. And it was yet impossible to think otherwise, and for that reason more than others, he knew that before long she would see him again and probably that night. And when she had told him of what nights she had observed during her forgetting it also all the way from Altkhenn to Angelina Arronburg, he had seen her eyes flame with that same hatred of Ginnadzhik, that he had observed in the eyes of Violet and her sisters when they heard the news, and believed her letters.

With the dull hub of a thing that of late had been given growing shade of him, he wondered what had happened to him must in the morning that had gone under the worn of flood darkness had been a thing of the past. Last night and the night before strange dreams of her had come to him in restless slumber. It was disturbing to him that he should wake up in the middle of the night dreaming of her as that morning with general Arronburg, when he had gone to his bed with a mind filled to overflowing with the sweet presence of Angelina Arronburg. And now his mind reached out poignantly into mysterious darkness, and doubt even as the darkness of night really was spreading itself in a thickening and reddish canopy over the river. He felt within himself, "If that woman here is my hunt, and the flood has been the cause of her loss and condition, a more intimate of mine why to the Ginnadzhik's life!"

Gray black and pinkish clouds, multitudinous rolls of clouds had followed the glow of distant fires, and sometimes sheets of flame seemed to break the gray clouds overhead. When Walter turned from the window it was so dark in the cabin he could not see. However he did not light the lamp, but made his way to the couch, and sat down in the silence and gloom, and he saw his growing slowly and carefully for the safety of the fighters outside.

Through the still open windows came to him the noise of the fight going on still farther a than ever, the shouts of command, the explosions of dynamite, the falling of trees and the sound of heavy guns. And now and then the shouts of men above it all he heard the lapping murmur of water under as it rushed under the wheel and side of the big houseboat or barge, and far off came the never ceasing whispering noise always heard at the approach of a great forest fire. For a long time he sat in this darkness saying his own prayers over and over again as if he could do nothing else, and the more he prayed the stronger was his prayer. And then he was suddenly aroused by a sound that was different, than all the other excited sounds,--a low monotone of voices, the dipping of oars instead of a paddle, and a long wide rowboat passed close under his window, and up the shore. He paid small attention to it, but continued his prayers. It was still at that when he finished the Gloria -- the boat returned, and its occupants boarded the barge. It would have seemed very little interest than had he not heard a voice that was so familiar like that of Ginnadzhik. He drew his binoculars and looked and indeed the boat in the area, and stared through the darkness toward the door.

A moment more and there was no doubt. It was almost shock that sent the blood lapping through his veins for the incredible Ginnadzhik had happened. It was Angelina Arronburg out there in such a night, talking in a low voice to Jack Peters. Then there came a heavy knock at his door, and when Walter said "Come in" he heard the door open. Through it he saw the ruddy glow of the outside night partly shut out by an immense black black shadow.
"Colonel starting," called the voice of voice.
"I'm here," said Walter.

"You have not yet come to bed Colonel?"
"No sir."

The heavy shadow seemed to suddenly fade away, and yet there still remained a shadow there. Walter bent forward as he looked the shadow and said childish eyes of it. For a moment there was silence. And then,
"Will you light the lamp Colonel?" a soft voice came to him. "I want to know in, but I could not be able to see in this darkness and will knock something down."

He rose to his feet, fumbling in his pockets for matches.
He did not turn to face Angelina Arronburg, when he started to light the first of the great lamps made of gilt, and which were hanging in the center of the cabin, flooded the cabin with light. He then approached the second, and after striking another the third, and so on, until he had lit all the lamps. He then stood before her He observed that she was watching him intently, but then a little bit more, and he thought that something must be wrong for she looked worried. He stepped a little bit forward, and she also seemed to be a little more tense in her eyes, and he wondered if she was more at him for not following when she bid him follow. But he did notice she was looking at him very steadily, as she herself finally smiled and nodded.

Walter started, and his tongue came in the way of his mouthpiece.
"What is it all this evening that you have been sitting in the dark?" she asked above the others, and closing the door. "Did you not expect me to return? And why did you not follow me this afternoon? Did you not expect me to return? And as suddenly this afternoon? Or was you advised or shy of presenting yourself?
I before the general in my commandant was hostile. Afterward I myself was allowed that I did not grasp you by the hand and have me follow. Of course I was excited Walter and he smiled, it was so long since I saw him."

"Of course," he hurried to interrupt her. "Understand General Denshchikoff Arronburg in a lucky moment caught me as well as himself in the garden even in when you and the whole nation can place faith and confidence. But I was so mixed that it was hard to the end and could do nothing else but watch and stare."

"He absent even seemed to me for tonight a new thing you as I did, and not bring you with me as I did. Walter said that I being a great girl about, and you a high school of the family, that I should have shown my better courtesy than to leave you like that, who was a member in our own army. If you were brought to his camp, you see I have returned like a good little girl to make peace."

"It was not necessary, it was I who should have followed you."

"But you were very late and I should have followed you."

"He nodded." "Yes."

"And besides," she added, as quickly and calmly, that she was much pleased. "You were so always anxious to be on this big boat. And general Arronburg believe me, you are."

"But this is an honor," said Walter, the blood rushing to his face. "You have taken up all this for me. You heard this once and not to me not let me go the great general."

General Arronburg cannot place to night as he has must of his part of the day working hard to try and stop the forest fire from heading in our direction.
The forest he will not leave the shore. He replied Barbara bending from his table which she had brought along with her. And I like me little more forward."

But he stopped himself, for he could see a sudden entry, deepening in the shadows of the general's face, as she looked for something in her bag. He therefore felt that if he continued on he would see some sign of a flat blunder, that in general the trouble itself was also not quite reasonable to expect that so long as Barbara Arronburg could appear again like this on the first night of general his arrival, he told himself, perhaps there was some a serious danger for the whole army and that it was hardly the general, and therefore he had must be able to find out at all times. He looked at the general of Ginnadzhik in the center of the table as the he could see at her was slowly. If Walter had been unpleasantly and unpleasantly observing the situation black, the little girl could in no way even evidence of the situation seemed to accept a high in her eyes, but it was not a account of Barbara not, for she was so embarrassed in not very much, and as she looked at him he was more filled with the flash of laughter which he had caught her eye stealing to restrain. Then finding an old a great book, she seated herself and again he saw he found himself looking down on the drop of her long lashes and the unusual glow of her luminous hair. Tomorrow in a moment of tranquility, shadow into light, and he was amazed to see that she was laughing back at the general, and that her two forefingers were thrust in her ears to keep out the loud bellow of her Uncle's unusually loud voice. She was not however disconcerted by his unexpected appearance, but joined in the humor of the thing with the general, though he fancied he could see something in her face that was forced and uneasy. He believed that under the surface of her composure, she was suffering a distress, which she did not care to reveal. The general advanced and carelessly patted her head with one of his big hands, while he spoke to Walter:

"Has she not a sweet voice for a child of her age Colonel? From any children, did you ever hear a sweeter or as sweet? I say it is enough to get down into the soul of a wicked man and convert him unless he is already half dead in his sinfulness. That voice--"

He caught Gertrude's eyes. Her cheeks were flushing. And her look for an instant, flashed lightning as she halted him.

"Goodness, goodness I speak it from the heart. Why he persisted with a shrug of his huge shoulders. Am I not right Colonel Starring? Did you ever hear a sweeter voice for a child of her age?"

"It is wonderful," agreed Walter, "but you ought to hear the Vivian Girls when they sing," and he went on wondering then if he had hazarded too much.

"Good it feels me with happiness to now of one man who is loyal to those great heroines. And now both of you good night. I must return to the shore. We have not finished the work yet and soon the fire'll be here."

A shadow of vexation, crossed Gertrude's face.

"You seem to be in great haste."

"For overcome fire plagues and pesty disasters, you are right, Gertrude. I am most anxious to get back to my war troubles there, and you and --"

"Will also bid Walter good night," she quickly interrupted him. "And you will at least see me to my room, Uncle, and softly put away for the night."

She held out her hand to Walter. There was not a tremor in it as it lay for an instant soft and warm in his own. She made no effort to withdraw it quickly, nor did her eyes hide their softness as they looked into his own. Mutely Walter stood as they went out. He heard the general's voice rumbling along about the darkness of the night, and the stronger red glare in the sky and the stronger swell of burning forests and of the wind that was starting to rise. He heard then pass along the side of the big boat forward, and about two minutes later he knew that the general was getting into his boat. The dip of a paddle came to him. For a long space there was silence, and then from far out in the black shadows of the immense river, rolled back the great voice of general Concentin Arronburg singing a hymn to the Sacred Heart of Jesus. At the open window he listened. It seemed to him that far over the river, where the giant raft lay, there came a faint answer to the words of the hymn.

With the slow approach of the great forest fire coming on a third time to catch up with the boat, and which was advancing over the wilderness, and while large portions of Concentin Arronburg's army was working hard to break it or breach it if possible, Walter felt more strongly the growing unrest that was in him. He heard the last of the general's voice, and after that the distant fires seemed to die out slowly, giving way to utter blackness, and to others it might seem it was going out. But not so. Thick clouds of smoke were rolling in advance of the flames so thick as to utterly obscure the glow. Continually there came the musketry discharge like roar of many blastings, some close, some far, and some very near, and the fury furthest like the faint low rumble of thunder, added by the noise of as many trees continually falling. Including this was the sound of axes, and saw, and shouts of men. The air was growing heavier and smoke perfumed, and to night even there was no sound of a night bird over the breast of the river, and out of the thick cedar and balsam and other trees there came no cry or whisper of the nocturnal life that had fled before the advancing "Red Plague." In that unusual stillness Walter put out the lights in the ships cabin, and sat close to the window in darkness.

He was indeed more than sleepless sleepless. Every nerve in his body seemed to demand immediate action, and his brain was fired by strange suspicious thoughts, until their vividness seemed to bring him face to face with a reality that sent his blood stirring with an irresistible thrill. He believed that he had made a strange discovery, that general Arronburg had left his raft utterly deserted because of the battle with the fire. What he had visioned the conclusion he had arrived at, seemed inconceivable, yet what his own eyes had seen, and his ears had heard pointed to the truth of it all. The least he could say was that general Arronburg who loved his niece, like a daughter, and whose attitude toward her was like that of a good father in the presence of a child of whom he was fond in more than a fatherly sort of way, was going to be in danger of some loss, unless he Walter Starring interfered. His affection as he expressed it, was parental and not in the careless yet loving way of a Uncle. Even there was nearly the betrayal of a lover, the suggestion of a husband who cared deeply, and who could be jealous of another man. Yet he felt that, so good a man so great a general was in danger of a tremendous loss of something. For why was that strange light in the cabin of the raft, which flickered a moment and then went out.

Sitting in darkness, thickening with nearer approach of thick smoke clouds, Walter recalled also the stab of pain mingled with humiliation, that would come into the eyes of Angelina Arronburg, his niece, when she would stand facing her beloved uncle in morning greeting and discover he suffered a loss. He heard again with a new understanding the low notes of those in her voice as in singing the hymn she had called upon Our Blest Lord to help her--and hear her. He could guess of the tragedy then. Now he knew, now he was suspicious, and he thought of her lying awake in the gloom beyond the bulkhead, her eyes wet with tears the following night, grieved over the turn. And general Concentin Arronburg unconscious of the mysterious light in his raft cabin had gone back to the shore singing defiantly in the night. Where before there had been a feeling of delight in his presence, there was now dread for the results in that cabin.

clouds

There was a great reason for general Arronburg's masterly possession as commander of a mighty successful christian army, and it was not, as he had thought because of his bigness of soul. It was because he cared and loved his country and its cause as much as he loved his own niece. He was a splendid general, one that Emperor Vivian can be proud of, slaying his game against haunty haughty Glen delin as well at the beginning, but ending it with crushing success at the end. He loved his count country as he loved Gertrude Angelina. He had spoken often of his country as he would speak of his own child, and he had treated Gertrude Angelina more like a daughter than a niece, and was so passionately in the face of even a situation which roused the spirit in all his officers and soldiers. And suddenly recalling the thrilling hour in the large white strip of sand, and all that had happened since, it flashed upon Walter that the general was using his niece as the vital moving force in a game of his own--that he was having her to keep a good eye on him that is Walter himself. To achieve, a certain mysterious something in avoid the too quick carrying out of his too hasty plan of going out on an adventure that both the general and Gertrude and even Jack Evans knew would have a fatal ending if entered upon too hastily. And the general and Gertrude were right. Yet he could not forget the infinite faith Gertrude and the general, had expressed in him. There had been no shading in her watching and bringing him through a crisis during his illness, or in her belief that her uncle would straighten out the tangles of the dilemma in which he and she had become involved. Adding these facts as he had added the others, the general saw the truth of some danger staring the general himself, out of the darkness of his cabin room. Gertrude Angelina loved her uncle as a father, and both were good to him. Why let such a matter go unvoiced. Again the light appeared in the cabin and disappeared. A heavy crash of thunder from a big falling tree, brought Walter back to a realization of the impending fire. Taking advantage of this the unseen foe in that cabin would ransack. Walter rose to his feet in the chaotic gloom, facing the bulkhead beyond which he was certain Gertrude lay wide awake. He tried to laugh. It was inexcusable, he told himself, to let his thoughts become involved in probably a fancied danger.

Gertrude Angelina Gertrude Angelina in the final situation did not appear to be especially apprehensive, and her mind was not in turmoil. Probably she would thank him however in for his interest in the matter.

He went to the window. There was scarcely a breath of air, it was uncomfortably warm, and unfastening the screen, he thrust out his head and shoulders into the night. It was so black that he could not hardly see the shadow of the water almost within reach of his hands, but through the chaos of gloom that lay between him and the opposite shore he again made out a single point of yellow light. He was positive the light was again in the cabin on the raft. His temptation to go and investigate was growing stronger. He was more apprehensive. A huge sheet of fire suddenly seemed to break through the utter gloom almost spreading across a portion of the sky showing the rolling shapes of the closer walls of smoke, and behind him he heard sweeping over the forest tops like a roaring hurricane the quickening march of the fire storm. There was more crashes of explosions of dynamite and falling trees. Walter drew in his head and shoulders. He tried again to make out the raft or light on the raft. But it was gone.

Mechanically he began taking off his clothes, and in a few moments he again stood at the window, half naked but with his holster and cartridge belt still around him in a water proof belt. The crashing of falling trees sounded elsewhere, and in the renewed flashes of fire, Walter's ghost-white face stared in the direction of the raft. In his veins now an insistent and compelling desire was overcoming. Over there probably in that cabin was some one who did not belong there, and something might happen if Walter himself did not take advantage of the gloom and near approach of the forest fire to go to the raft and investigate.

It seemed to be almost a presentiment alone that drew him bare head and shoulders out through the window, and every hunting instinct in him urged him to adventure. The unusual stygian darkness was torn again by a distant sheet of flames piercing the smoke clouds, and in it he saw the river and the vivid silhouette of the distant shore. It would not be a difficult swim and it would be good training for the morrow. Like a badger worming his way out of a hole, a bit too small for him, Starrling drew himself slowly through the window, for he did not care to go out by the door way for fear Gertrude would see and question him, and he did not want her to aid and run into the peril he might chance now. A brighter glare of flames shooting through the rolls of a smoke caught him at the edge of the big boat, and he hid slunk back quickly against the cabin, with the thought that other eyes of hidden enemies might be staring out into that same darkness. In the pitchy gloom that soon but gradually followed, he lowered himself quickly into the river, thrust himself under water, and struck out for the direction of the big raft.

When he came to the surface again it was in the more prolonged glare of the approaching conflagration, that prolonged for a considerable time. He flung the rapidly warning water from his face, choose a point several hundred feet from the raft, and with quick powerful strokes, set out in its direction. For two minutes he quartered the warmer current without raising his head. Then he paused for a moment floating unresistingly with the swift sweep of the big river, and waited for another spell of fires illumination. When it came he made out the tented raft scarcely fifty or less feet away, and a little below him. In the next spell of lesser darkness he found the edge of it, and dragged himself up on the mass of timbers. The thunder of explosions and falling trees, and the sounds of axes saws and shouting men had been rolling steadily on as if a battle was going on, and Walter crouched low, hoping for one more good flash of fire light through the smoke clouds to brighten the raft. It came at last good and strong as if from the infernal regions from a mass of inkly roily cloud far to the west and north, so strong that it strongly illuminated the whole raft, showing all the tents and shelter, and giving him direction but compelling him to hide for a space also. Before this glare became obliterated by the smoke he saw the deeper shadow of the cabin forward.

For many minutes as the glare now continued he lay where he had dragged himself without making a movement in its direction. No where about him could he see any other sign of a light, nor could he hear any other sound of life. There probably was not a single soul on the raft. All of the men belonging to the raft were evidently with the rest at the work of checking the progress of the forest fire.

Walter had no very definite idea of the next step in his adventure. He had swum from the big boat largely under impulse, with no preconceived scene of action as yet urged chiefly by the hope that he would find some suspicious person in the cabin, and that something might come of it. As for breaking down the door, and rousing the suspicious person too suddenly—he had at present moment no very good excuse for that. No sooner had the thought and its objection, came to him than a broad shaft of light shot with startling suddenness through the blackness of the raft, revealing the whole raft cabin and everything else on shore as bright as day. Swift as the sudden flare itself from the fire Walters eyes turned toward the doorway of the cabin and saw a certain man suddenly disappear and heard the door slam shut. Walter held his breath in amazement, staring at the doorway, the glare now continuing without a letup and growing brighter and brighter. Walter for a moment now seemed to be measuring the forest fire possibilities. Who was in that cabin? It could not be that the general had gone in after all and did not go on shore. Maybe he could be mistaken. No word had come from the individual, and therefore there was one guess to make. It was positively certain that the general was not on the raft. He decided to hush the party. The spies of Glandelinia are usually cleverer than any one would have supposed, but he too was clever. But why seize upon an opportunity to raid the cabin on the raft. What could be their object or his object in wanting to hide himself on the raft?

He stood up on his feet and mopped the warm water and sweat from his face, while the gradually decreasing gloom hid the grim smile that came slowly to his lips. Close upon the thrill of his astonishment he felt a new stir in his blood which added impetus to his determination and his action. He was not disgusted with himself, nor was he embittered by what he thought a moment ago as the evident fact that a suspicious character was in that cabin. To be beaten in his game of hunting for important information was something to be expected, and Walter always gave proper credit to the fair winners. Just who was in that cabin, and why he was there, it was his duty now to find out.

An hour ago he had never thought of this going to happen, and now he felt that he would rather cut off a hand before allowing a Glandelinian spy to go roaming around general Arronburgs cabin. He felt no uneasiness or fear as he approached the cabin for all what Gertrude had done for him had destroyed all reason for any delicate discrimination on his part. As there was no one apparently on the raft he had no fear of chance discovery. The flames had drawn closer, but the night at one particular point would remain dark for a long time, and in his bare feet he made no sound the sharpest ears of a dog twenty feet away or five feet away might have heard. Close to the cabin door, yet in such a way that the sudden opening of it would not reveal him, he paused and listened as he said a prayer. Distinctly he heard a mans voice, but could not distinguish the words. A moment later came the laughter of another man, and for an instant a hand seemed to grip Walters heart filling it with holy rage. There was no clear and homely in that laughter. It seemed indeed to tremble in an exultation of success in something he was doing inside the cabin. Suddenly the man came nearer the door and his voice was more distinct. "I tell you comrade this will be the greatest joke of my life," he heard him say. "We are safe as no one is on the raft. If it should come to the worse, we can settle the matter in another way. I cannot but sing and laugh, even in the face of it all. And she in that very innocence which amuses me so has no suspicion, neither had her uncle or others—"

He turned and vainly Walter layed his ears to catch the final words. The voices in the cabin grew lower. Twice he heard the laughter of another man. The second one when he spoke said the words in a voice that was unintelligible. The thought that his random adventure was bringing him to an important discovery possessed Walter. The spy, he believed had been on the very verge of disclosing something which he would have given a great deal to know. Surely in this cabin there must be a window, and the window would be open—

Quickly he felt his way through the darkness to the shore side of the cabin. A narrow bar of light at least partly confirmed his judgement. There was a window. But it was almost entirely curtained, and it was closed. Had the curtain been drawn four inches lower the thin stream of light would have been shut entirely out from the night. Under this window Walter crunched for several minutes hoping that in the calm which was proceeding the advance of the forest fire it might be opened. The voices were still more indistinct inside. He scarcely heard either one, but twice again he heard the laughter of one or the other. The grim smile settled on Walters lips as he looked up at the narrow slit of light over his head. He had an overwhelming desire now to look in. After all it was a matter of military business—and his duty. He was glad the curtain was drawn so low. From many experiments of his own he knew there was small chance of those inside seeing him through the four inch slit, and he raised himself boldly until his eyes were on a level with the opening.

Directly in the line of his vision was a short man. He was seated, and his back was toward him, so he could not observe his face. He was dressed heavily, and he wore a peculiar hat. He scarcely looked at the taller man who was on his feet looking at a certain number of papers, not until the taller man reached to a desk and crumpled a small book in his big hand, and laughed. It was a laugh filled with the unutterable joy of possession. The smaller man rose to his feet, and put something into his pocket. Then he turned. His face fronted the window, and out in the night Walter stifled a cry that almost broke from his lips. For a flash he was looking straight into his eyes. His parted lips seemed smiling at him. He dropped down his heart choking, as he crouched close to the door looking over his pistol. It was hard for him to get a breath. He stared through the gloom in the direction of the boat. Gertrude Angeline his little girl scout friend was there. In her little cabin all alone on the estate was Gertrude, and how her heart would be crushed if she knew who the two were rifling general Arronburgs cabin. Within the two the cabin were the two vilest wretches he had ever known, that Nutt looking men of the Daily News. Funny side, that tall International Sp. y. And with him, was the man, small one who looked so much like "Jeff. They were dangerous he knew, but he decided to act, to surprise them, and if not capture them at least frustrate their work.

The shock of the amazing discovery which Walter Starrling had made was as complete as it was unexpected. His eyes had looked upon the last thing in the world he might have guessed at or anticipated when they beheld through the window of general Arronburgs cabin the faces of the two International Professional spies which were the most dangerous of all. The first effect of that shock had been to drive him away almost almost frantically frightened. Of course his action had been very involuntary almost without the benefit of reason as if the two spies had been the very Vivian Girls giving him such a shock, and which it was both insult and dishonor for he himself to allow to go unavenged. He realized now that he had made a very serious mistake in leaving the window too quickly. But he had no intentions of leaving the raft, for there was something very revolting, something too revolting in what he had seen, and with the revelation of it a swift understanding of the truth which made his hands clench as he sat down near the edge of the cabin waiting for them to come out so he could surprise them. The thing was not however uncommon. It was the same monstrous story as old as the war itself, but in this instance it was filled him with a sickening sort of horror which gripped him at first even more than the strangeness of the fact that he Walter Starrling was the first Gemini Member to come face to face with these famous and most dangerous of all spies, not Glandelinians either, but working in her cause for the tremendous sum of wages they receive for every attempt successful or not. His vision and soul were reaching out to the bog big boat lying in darkness on the far side of the river, where Gertrude Angeline was alone unconscious of the fraud in the boat raft. His first impulse was to fling himself in the river and race to her—his second to go back to general Arronburg, and call him forth to give the spies a good reckoning. In his own profession of man hunting he had never had the misfortune to kill any Glandelinian, but he could kill these two professional spies now for he knew and still remembered what the cowardly second-rate had tried to do to Penrod because he would not confess the hiding place of Jennie Turner. His fingers dug into the slippery wood of the log under him, his blood ran hot, he was fury stricken and and his eyes blazed the fury of a wild enraged animal as he stared into the wall of gloom between him and the girl scout Gertrude Angeline. If she only could have known why did he not tell her and she could have made plans for causing their capture as they too were her two bit enemies. Why was he such a fool to go off alone. She is only a little girl of course, but nevertheless her nature, prowess, quickness and so good at the pistol makes her our times better than himself. Why did he do it? These were the questions which now pounded in his brain. He suddenly recalled his reference to the plans he was going to make with Evans, his apology to Gertrude Angeline, that he would not let it go for no one as it was his duty, and he saw again the queer little twist of her mouth as she let slip the hint that she was not the only one of her sex who would know whether he was successful in his enterprise. But now something struck home. Sure it can be possible, these two professional spies may know something about the reason why the flood disasters and other horrors of the war were made. But did they know more than that. And if only Gertrude could know the truth, and was with him, or could her heart on ly be filled with suspicion and fear, aggravated by his going off the boat alone, she would surely call some of her retainers and follow him to the raft.

Again Walters mind flashed back, recalling her words concerning the perilous adventure he was making or intended to make, when he first told her his story of the situation. There could be one conclusion. Angelina Arronburg knew full well those two men on the raft. If she only knew they were there. As cooler judgement returned to him, Walter refused to concede more than that. For any one of a dozen reasons, these two professional spies might have been hidden somewhere on the raft when the general came down the river with it, and it also was quite within reason, that Gertrude Angeline might have some apprehension of him if she knew he was absent from the big boat, and that possible intuition would have begun to impinge upon her a disturbing fear of something that might happen. But she had no such suspicion, and Walter knew that if she had sensed even feared that these two strangers might be on the raft, ransacking her uncle's cabin she would have been a little tigress let loose upon them in a way they would not withstand. From what he heard of her she was a little volcano when aroused despite her easy winning ways and that smile never leaving her face. She had betrayed no anxiety to him of any such dangers to her uncle's plans in the days that had passed, despite her prediction that the woods may be filled with hidden enemies on the lookout for him, she had waited eagerly for general Arronburg, like a bird she had gone to him when he came, and he had seen her crushed close in the general's arms in their meeting. It was this night that would have made the shadowings of her unrest a torturing reality if she only knew. And she would have gone to that raft as quick as she did in meeting her uncle. "My God" he thought "If I could only attract her by a single word. But the spies would see the signal and escape. So he told himself that there was no way to make Gertrude Angeline know the truth, not as he had seen it through the window of General Arronburg's cabin. Confound those spies. She had been hurt however when the general had told her he was going out into those dangerous forests to check the curse of the "red plague". He had seen the sting of it, and in that same instant he had seen her soul rise up and triumph. He saw again the sudden fire that came into her eyes, when general Arronburg urged the necessity of his haste, her saw her slim little body grow tense, her red lips curve in a flash of fear and disdain. And now as Walter thought of these two spies his muscles grew tighter, and he heaped all kinds of imprecations upon her and her war of destruction and wholesale massacre of whole countries at once in California. Angelina Arronburg might be hurt by general Arronburg's own dangerous duty, she might guess her uncle's eyes and thoughts were too frequently upon another cause--but in the glory of her child hood, and possible sainthood it was impossible for her to conceive of a crime such as he had witnessed through the cabin window. Crime it surely was, he was sure of it, for what business had those two voracious to go spying and eavesdropping upon private matters of a nation they have nothing to do with, have no business to spy upon as long as that nation is not at war with theirs. One an Italian and another a Mexican. And then suddenly like a blinding sheet of lightning out of a dark sky, came back to him all that general Arronburg had said about his niece's niece, and also what all other generals and even the Vivian Girls had said about general Arronburg and his army. He had pitied and respected general Arronburg then, he had respected this great cool eyed giant of a soldier and officer who was fighting gloriously and desperately and successfully in the face of a situation that would have excited the whole world. Frankly general Arronburg had told him that Gertrude had cared for him her uncle more than a parent, and with equal frankness he had told him, and revealed her confessions to him, that she knew of his fatherly love for her too, of his kiss upon her hair and of his temptation twice to fold her into his own arms. She too had told him all of her unguessed greatness, goodness and fate and yet of his his humble humbleness despite it all. Now he loved general Arronburg as if he was his own father, and these two spies, these two darn criminals-- they-- kill these two professional spies now, would he not be justified, and might not general Arronburg or his niece have an equally just desire to kill them if they knew of their presence. Suddenly Walter made a decision. He would wait until he had a chance to capture them. He knew where they would land on his leaving the raft and he would get there before they did, and expose and fight to capture them if possible. And Gertrude Angeline--

Clark,

Portland Bldg.,

Chicago, Ill.

He decided to wait. Slowly he lowered himself into the warm wash of the river with another silent prayer to Our Blessed Lord, and an invocation invocation to the "Little Flower of Jesus, and the Blessed Virgin, and instead of going to the shore as he would struck out toward the other side of the raft, toward where he could watch and surprise these two arch enemies of Abba's holiness. He crossed through the darkness to the west end of the raft, but drifted with it and reached the opposite shore part of it a quarter of a mile below the Bateau, and a great sky full of flame came through them, revealing plainly the whole length of pebbly wash along the shore and throwing a great heat felt even by him on the raft. He then was tempted to crawl back to be under the window but then he felt it would not be to no advantage. He saw the window however, and noticed the narrow slit of an opening that one of those spies inside had turned the lamp very low, and therefore he rubbed his muscles until they burned. He must be fit for the coming struggle, and the knowledge of that fitness filled him with a savage elation. He must frustrate those spies, and he was not going to let all Hell's legion stop him. A good humored love of sport had always induced him to fling his boxing sports into the face of any powerful man, and Walter was equally as powerful as Evans himself. The approaching fight, was going to be the biggest physical thing that had ever loomed up in his life, either with guns, or with fists, and he yearned for the time to come when those two spies would leave the cabin and run into his path on the raft. The closest parts of the forest fires was not yet up, it seemed evident the soldiers were winning their portion of the battle, but the flush of it was searing the sky like a strong sudden sunrise pouring an equally dark night simultaneously, and therefore he listened for some sound that would prove the spies were preparing for their escape from the cabin. If Gertrude Angeline was still awake she would soon hear the conflict and sound the alarm. There was noise still ashore, the booming of explosives, the roar of many falling trees, and other indications of the fight against the approaching forest fire, and across the river he could hear the shouts and prayers of the soldiers and rangers, and through his own view he saw to the left walls of heavy gray smoke rising like a rolling canopy mountain far above the trees tree tops and he invoked all the Blessed and Saints in heaven to ask our Blessed Lord to aid them in checking the course of the terrible plague of fire.

All this time Walter waited, tense so with the desire for action to begin. He sensed no premonition of evil about to befall him when the unequal encounter between the spies both of whom too were powerful, and never such a his body was alive for the combat. He thrilled with an overwhelming confidence, trusting their purpose, an almost dangerous self conviction of approaching victory in spite of the odds in weight and brute strength, which would be pitted against him. A dozen or more time he listened at the bulkhead of the raft between him and Angelina Arronburg, and though he managed to have secured some needed her assistance, and needed it badly he thought if he was to at least to capture the two spies, and make them confess if they knew anything about the origin of the flood and other great disasters of the past months. It was eleven o'clock that night, when he heard one of the men come close to the door, and ask if his smaller companion was ready to go. Then the tall man appeared and found himself suddenly confronted by Walter. He met "Mr. Mutt" faced him, with pistol drawn. For an instant the eyes of the two men met, and then swift as lightning, his arm shot out, and knocked the pistol out of Walters hand, but still simultaneously, Walter struck with the flat of his hand struck the spy a terrific blow squarely in the middle of the face or between the eyes. The sound of the blow was like the smash of a paddle on smooth water. As the spy staggered back flung almost from his feet by the force of the blow, a subdued cry of amazement broke from him. And then in another flash, the spy had caught himself and whirled like a wild beast. Every muscle in his body was drawn for a gigantic overwhelming leap, his eyes blazing, the fury of a beast was in his face. Walter waited prepared to meet the rush of a madman. Yet he knew that at least in one way he had met his match in this international spy. In the splendid service of which he was a part he had known many men and soldiers, even spies of both sides of iron and steel, men whose nerve and coolness not even death could very greatly disturb. For a flash he had transformed the chief of the Glandelinian spies into a volcano which broke into savage fury, yet neither the crash nor the destruction had come, for he directly gave him good and heavy blows in quick succession that seated him every time. The spies face darkened. He drew back half a dozen steps, and cried out a word to his companion to come out and help him. Walter wondered what his chief general Dargar would say if he saw him now, backing away slowly from one man and then the other, as either one or the other giant advanced upon him, for he knew his face might be betraying to the two scoundrels anxiety and indecision. Very slowly, yet with eyes that seemed to shift uneasily, he watched his trick and the effect of it on either spy. Twice one or the other man followed him about the rounds of the raft. A third time Walter maneuvered his retreat. And then:

A howl broke out in the middle of the smaller spies throat. Swifter than anything Walter had leaped in at him first. The bigger one saw him strike. He heard the terrific blow. They saw the "Jesse Jeffs" head rock back as if struck from his shoulders by a club and he saw and heard another blow, and a third like so many flashes of lightning, and he went down as if shot. The man the two had laughed at was no longer a hopping sparrow. He was waiting bent a little forward, every body in his muscles in his body ready for action now against the taller man. As the bigger man rushed him, the "Jeff" fellow staggered to his feet. His mouth and bleeding and choked with splinters, and a great lump was beginning to swell over his eye. A deadly vengeful fire blazed in his face as he also rushed like a mad bull at the powerful opponent who had tricked and mortified and humiliated him. This time Walter did not retreat but held his ground and a yell of joy went up from "Mutt" as the mighty bulk of the smaller spy descended or rushed upon his adversary. It was an avalanche of brute force, apparently crushing in its apparent destructiveness, and Walter seemed to reach for it as it came upon him. Then for two minutes there was a quick succession of raining and tremendous blows interchanged like seen of a prize fight, then Walters head went down, swifter than a diving goby, and as "Jeffs" arm swung like an oaken beam over his shoulder, his own shot straight for the others mouth. It was a bulls eye blow with the force of a pile driver behind it, and there was a perfect shower of teeth at his feet. "Jeff" roared like a demon rushed him again and almost caught Walter on the side of the head, but his own fist caught him on the pit of the stomach and the crowd that forced its way out of "Jeff" "Jeffs" vitals was heard plainly by "MUTT". His weight stopped his arms opened, and through that opening, Walters fist went a second time for the others jaw, and the second time the spy sprawled out upon the logs. And there for a moment he lay and made no effort to rise. "MUTT" with his great mouth open stood for an instant as if the blow had stunned him in place of his master spy. Then suddenly again he came to life and once more rushed at Walter himself. For Walter the opportunity was too tempting. He swung and with a grunt the gorilla like body of "Mutt" rolled over that of the second chief of Glandelinian spy spies. This time Walter did not wait but followed up so closely that the rescal had scarcely gathered the crook out of his knees when another blow on the jaws sent him into the end again. Three times he tried the experiment of regaining his feet, and three times he was knocked down. After the last blow he raised himself groggily to a sitting posture, and there he remained blinking like a stunned giant with his big hands clutching the rounds of a log.

He stared up unseeing at Walter who waited over him, and then suddenly at the cabin, and the shore and muttered something incoherent as his head wobbled and "Jeff" himself seemed to hear it, for he stirred and raised himself slowly, until he was also sitting in the sand staring at "Mutt".

It was about twelve o'clock when one of the shore men saw the fight and raised a hue and cry. Walter joined him, even shouting "Miss Angelina Arronburg! Miss Angelina Arronburg! Two spies on your Uncle's raft." quickly men on the shore joined him. The uproar seemed to bring the spies back to their enses. They staggered to their feet, and staggering in to the cabin closed and locked the door. Walter tried to follow but a minute later saw the two men swimming to the opposite shore, and suddenly a portion of the cabin burst into flames. Walter would have plunged in, but as soon as they were across the two started a dangerous pistol fire, which kept him from his intention. Finally they were gone and Walter swam for the Christian side of the shore, while a large number rushed for the raft to extinguish the fire in the cabins he swam to the shore. Walter was sure he caught the slight movement of a curtain at the little window of Gertrude's cabin in the glow of fire light. He raised his hand, and at that the curtain was drawn back entirely, and a moment later she was on deck, signalling to her own scouts, and shouting to some other men to get out the cabin fire. There was great excitement, but the first concern was rapidly getting the blaze under control. The raft was swarming with the men, and on the shore side of it had gathered a crowd of excited men.

It seemed odd to Walter that over the incident they should remain so quiet, when he knew the natural instinct of the soldiers of Arronburg's army was to voice his emotion at the top of his lungs. He spoke of this to one of the soldiers who shrugged his shoulders and grinned.

"There was no man of general Arronburg's," he explained. "Hoon general, hee hee no men make hee noise at--what you call hee incident of ze burning cabin--what you call hee some one make hee fight with some persons on ze raft. And if hee catch hee there was goin to be hee gran fun-o-ral, Colonel."

"I see," Walter nodded. He did not grin back at the others humor. He was looking at the crowd of smoke begried soldiers. A giant handsome figure had appeared out of the center of it, and was coming slowly down to the river. In it was general Arronburg. Scarcely had Walter reached the shore, when he leaped forward to meet him. Behind general Arronburg came Jack Evans. He was stripped to the waist his clothing having been burned off from him, and he was knarped from the knees down. His gorilla like arms hung huge and loose at his sides and the muscles of his hulking body stood out like carved mahogany in the glimmering flicker of fire. He was like a prize, a human creature of monstrous power, tall and straight as a st. stick, something good and fantastic to look at, for wicked enemies to back away from, to fear. Yet Walter though he saluted both scarcely noticed him. He met general Arronburg, faced him and stopped--and he had gone swiftly to this meeting--so that the chief of all Christian generals was within earshot of many of his men. General Arronburg was smiling. He held out his hand as he had held it out before in the baten u cabin, and his big voice boomed out a greeting. In his hurry to explain the situation Walter did not even look at the extended hand, and then swift as lightning, he said--

"General You have been spied on, hoodwinked. Your cabin has been raided. I fought the spies, but they shot it out with me and escaped into the woods after setting the cabin on fire."

The news was as if Walter had struck him a terrific blow squarely on the back. Not a single soldier within sight but heard it, and as General Arronburg staggered back, a subdued cry of amazement broke from the waiting men. Evans stood like one stupefied. And then in another flash the general had recovered himself. Before all his army he had suffered the deadliest insult that could be offered a man of his country--a treacherous blow struck by the traitor raid of the spies. Anything else one might and will forgive, but not that. So much a man if not avenged or stopped was a brand that passed through his whole army and even child scouts would call out "White Feather--White Feather" or "You have the back bone of a jelly fish--You have the backbone of a jellyfish" or "Yellow back--Yellow back", or "Gold foot susie--Gold foot Susie" to the man who was coward or foolish enough to receive such a raid without resentment. A rumbling growl rose in the throat of Evans in that moment, when it seemed as if General Arronburg could about kill the man who had struck him thus--in the back. He saw the prickle of his own plane gone in a flash for he too had something important in the cabin. In a moment both were on the raft, with one of the men and Walter entered the cabin. No, thank God nothing was missing. The spies had not taken anything, but they might have duplicated and so the original had been changed. For a moment Walter saw a mighty struggle in the soul of general Arronburg. The giant held himself back. The fury of rage died out of his face but his great hands remained clenched as he said for Walter alone--

"That was a playful blow for you Walter. It was a joke from you spy!" "It was on you, general," replied Walter. "You were raided by a cowardly spy--a skunk, who put a little boy once in a barn with pottymakers because he would not tell a secret. I came to this raft to fight in seeing a suspicious light in the cabin, looked through your window, and saw what happened there. They were not fit for a decent man to fight with, yet I fought them, and they escaped and tried to burn the cabin."

General Arronburg's eyes widened, and for a breath or two he stared at Walter, as if looking into him and not at him. His big hands relaxed. Then he looked behind the transformation in a moment, they were amazed for of all he waited only the general and Evans had heard Walters words, though they had heard and so seen the evidence of false work on the raft.

"You swim to the raft" repeated the general in a low voice as if doubting what he had heard. "You looked through the window and saw—"

Walter nodded. He could not cover the sneering position in his voice, his contempt for the man who escaped him.

"Yes I looked through the window. And I saw those International Profounders of spies who resemble 'Mutt and Jeff,' the lowest spies raiding your cabins."

The general suddenly turned to his son.

"STOP, those spies if possible. Go across the stream, follow their trail through the woods, and do not come back without them."

And the general's voice broke out of him like the sudden crash of thunder. His face was livid, his eyes shooting flames. Then he controlled himself with a mighty effort. And then as if he saw something which Walter could not see he tried to smile, and in that instant Walter caught a grin cutting a great slash across the face of Jack Evans. The change that came over general Arronburg now was as swift as sunlight coming out from a shadowing stormcloud. A rumble grew in his great chest. It broke in a low note of curiosity from his lips, and he faced the boat in the river.

"Colonel you did it because she befriended you, and for my sake too. Is that it? You went and fought to save plans—"

"For the cleanest, finest little girl scout who ever lived, your niece, for you and for your Blessed Country."

"It is grand," said general Arronburg as if speaking to himself and still looking at the big boat. "Yes it is very grand, Angelina it is grand. A foreigner has told you he loves our country, and you too as if you were his child, and he had secretly kissed you, and then held you in his arms—and now he fought two spies stepped in sin, spying for a business not of their own and fought them to defend your, and my plans and Evans from capture and so succeeded. So what else can I do but recommend him to a reward. Vivian! I must reward him. I must reward him until he cannot climb any higher. And then I will send him back to win out his mission and receive all the help he needs, and for that blessing he has willingly fought two dangerous spies. Is it not so, Colonel? He was willing and no longer excited when he turned to Walter. "Colonel, I will reward you. And also the wagers shall stand. And in this hour let us be good and honestlike men, and make confession. You love Abigail and this country and all in it including Gertrude and the Vivian Girls as your own? Is it not so? And I—I love my country and all in it as I love no one else in the world, and still better our Blessed Lord who had done us so much good in our holy cause. No as soon as you will have it let us straighten the thing out. If the spies are captured we'll make them pay. Evans in the meantime slouched away like a beaten scold to explain to his own officers of what had occurred on the raft, and as that news spread like the fire itself in the fir tops, there came but a single response—shriill and terror and that was from the throat of the insane women."

And now general Arronburg was smiling again, and now he betrayed no sign of the tempest of passion that had swept him a few minutes before. His cool steady eyes had in them a look that was positively friendly. The general spoke in a low voice to Walter.

"Colonel it seems a shame that you should have had to fight these men alone. I like you. I have always loved a man who would have fought to protect a woman, but to fight and protect the property of a general and his niece, a little child too makes me see reason as I never saw it before, and as they might have done, nor had they destroyed your beauty. Yet if these spies had first observed you spying through the window tonight, they would have killed you with as little time as possible, for as regards us and you their disposition is terrible. We have contempt for such men, such infamous men who being foreigners spy for our own enemy just to get rich and not for the sake of even her cause."

"I believe they are ready for the pursuit, general," said an officer. "The others have gone before."

For another moment general Arronburg hesitated as he thought of what horrors those woods might contain for any pursuers so long into them.

"I'm so sorry to take the chances but we must—"

"Are you ready, general?"

"In such a situation it is not fair, and if anything happens she will not forgive me. Well we let them go, but warn them that if anything does not look right, in case of a smoke of the fire to make themselves a marked trail so they can find their way back. It is like three hundred miles fighting a child to go out into those dangerous woods now."

Then at the general's command they were off. Then he listened as Walter told of the scene on the raft. At the sound of the colonel's voice the men grew tense, and the attitude of the listeners was not one of uncertainty or of very great expectation in spite of the staring faces and muscular tightening of the line. He knew what was passing in their minds and in the low whispers from lips to lips. They were listening, and the unusual scene of the fight and its result struck home even to Jack Evans.

After this, Walter picked up his hat which was left on the raft, and with the general he returned toward the Boat in a long rowboat. There was demonstration behind them, and to Walter the whole thing had been a clear mistake and he was not at all reluctant to get off from the raft as quickly as his dignity would permit. Before he got off the "Mutt and Jeff" followers offered to show the general on shore and put a further dangerous bet upon his prowess. But he wanted to laugh, and he thanked God at the top of his voice for the absurd run of good luck that had made his triumph not only easy but utterly complete. He had expected to win, but had not expected such a terrific fight before the last blow was struck.

And there had been a great fight. And yet he was returning to the boat without a single scratch, his hair scarcely ruffled, and he had defeated both of the spies, and most disgracefully and removed nearly all the front teeth of one of them. It was inconceivable—and yet it had happened—a veritable burlesque, an opera bouffe affair, that might turn quickly into a tragedy.

If either the Mutt and Jeff "Spies" or their followers suspected the truth of it. For in that event tonight have to face them again in a terrific gun fight with the bad luck all on his own side, and he was honest enough with himself to confess that the idea no longer held either thrill or desire for him. Now that he had seen both the "Mutt and Jeff" in battle against him, he had no further desire for another encounter with them. After all their was a great merit in caution, and he had certainly the aid of heaven just at the present moment. He was a bit suspicious of the attack of the affair.

The spies might demand a re-hearing when they had the opportunity.

Not until they were half way to the boat did Walter dare to glance over the shoulder at the man who was paddling, to see what effect the scene had on him. He was also a big mounted clear eyed powerfully muscled fellow, and he was grinning from ear to ear.

"Well what did you think of it comrade?"

The other gave his shoulders a joyous shrug.

"Gee great. Have you heard of one man named Joseph Andrews, Colonel? No. Well I am he, what a great christian spy. Evans he have sent me twenty times to spy and I made no fail. It was grand fight you won on so spies. To bad you no capture them. Many times I have seen the same thing. It was funny but you deserve one grand comess."

"Yet it is funny," agreed Walter speaking in english too. "It is a bit too funny. It's a pity I did not capture them for I felt they might know something of the information I'll be out looking for concerning the floods." Suddenly an inspiration hit him. "Joe what do you say—shall you and I go off now, and go through the adventure?"

Like a sprung trap Joe's mouth closed and the grin was gone.

"No, no," he grunted. "There is too much danger, and Joe Andrews must save his duty for other otherwise unless I'm sent. For why you wish to go don't you know? See dangerous. Angelina Arronburg, she hate so sing of her dangerous mission. Iak she hate so devil, Colonel. Take my advice and don't go."

His paddle dug deeper into the water, and Walter's heart felt lighter. He could now in the fire of glare see no one aboard the boat below when he climbed from the boat. Looking back he saw that other boats had started from the opposite shore, and that the fight was raging against the fire with redoubled energy and it was successful. Then he went to his cabin door, opened it and entered the general for a moment or so remaining outside to speak with Evans. Scarcely had the door closed behind him when he stopped, staring toward one of the nearest windows that opened on the river.

Standing in the full glow of the distant forest fire which entered the window was Angelina Arronburg not even in her night gown but in her girlscoat uniform. He was facing him. Her cheeks were flushed, and her red lips were parted. And as he looked he observed that her eyes were aglow with a fire which she made no effort to hide from him. In her hands she held or still held the binoculars he had left on the cabin table. He then guessed the truth. Through the glasses with the help of course of the fire's light she had watched the miserable fiasco. He felt creeping over him a sickening embarrassment, and his eyes fell slowly from her to the table. He held his breath when he saw what lay there. It was the entire surgical outfit of an army surgeon, and there were basins of water, and white strips of linen ready for use and a pile of medicated cotton, and all sorts of odds and ends that one might only to ease the agonies of a dying man. The evidence could not be mistaken. She had expected him to be brought back more dead than alive, for she had seen more than for him then he thought, for on shore were glendolians who would have shot him down had not the spies been in the way of their aim. They were their confederates, and she had prepared for the thing she had thought was inevitable—even his head was nicely turned down, its fresh white sheets in inviting an occupant. And Walter looking at Gertrude's face again felt his heart beating hard in his breast at the look which was in her eyes. It was not the scintillation of laughter, and the flame in her cheeks was not that of embarrassment, and neither was shame. And the ludicrousness of her misadventure had not struck her as she struck him. She placed the binoculars on the table, and came up to him slowly. Her hands reached out, and her fingers rested like the touch of velvet

"It was magnificent, splendid, and grand," she said softly. "It was more than I expected. I heard the noise of the battle while I lay down. I saw it all. It was too bad I wasn't there."

She was very near her breast almost touching him, her hands creeping up until the tips of her fingers rested on his shoulders. Her scarlet mouth so close close he could feel the soft breath of it in his face.

"It was grand and splendid, and magnificent," she whispered again.

And then suddenly, she rose up on her tiptoes and kissed him three times so swiftly it was done that she was gone before he sensed that wild touch of her lips against his cheeks. Like a swallow she was at the door, and the door opened and closed behind her, and for a moment he heard the quick running of her feet. Deliberately with that ravishing glory of something in her eyes---General Arronburg's new voice had just kissed him. On her tip toes, her cheeks like crimson flowers, she had given her still redder lips to him. And now his own lips were burning, and his heart was pounding hard and rapid. Rapidly, and he stared for a long long time like one struck dumb at the spot where she had stood by the window. Then suddenly he turned to the door and flung it wide open, and on his lips was the reckless cry for Gertrude's news. But she was gone, and at the tail of the big sweep sat only one lone soldier guarding watchfully.

Walter would have now gone to bed, but the three boats were drawing nearer, and in them were a number of men---and Walter knew that they were watchers set over by the general to keep off the spies from theateau should they dare to return. Then a fourth boat left the far shore, and when it had reached midstream he recognized them as were officers. He went back into the cabin as the general and Evans still stood on deck, and stood where Gertrude had stood---at the window. She had not taken away the basins of water, and the bandages and other things were still there and the pile of undyed cotton, and the suspiciously made up bed. After all probably he might have been losing something by not occupying the bed---and yet if the butt and Jeff spies had messed him up badly or licked him, and a couple of soldiers had begged him in between them, it was probable that Gertrude Angeline would not have kissed him. And that kiss of Angeline Arronburg would now remain with him until the day he died.

He was thinking of it, the swift warm thrill of her velvety lips, red as raspberries and twice as sweet, when the door opened and and and and General Arronburg came in the in in. The sight of him, in this richest moment of his life gave Walter no sense of embarrassment. Between him and General Arronburg rose swiftly what he had seen to night---the two spies raiding his cabin, trying mainly to rob the girl scout who lay a moment before had pressed her lips close to his, and as the eyes of the two met, there came over him a desire to tell the other what had happened, that he too might be surprised. Then he saw that even would not surprise the general, for the chief of the christian artists, standing there with his big rounded hat on had caught sight of the things on the table, and the nicely turned down bed, and his eyes lit up with sudden laughter, and his white teeth flashed in an understanding smile.

"Gracious, I see she expected you would get hurt, and was preparing to nurse you with gentle hands," he chuckled. "See what you have missed Colonel starring."

"Yes but I'll say I have received something, which even a fine nursing makes nothing whatever," declared Walter with a smiling face. "And yet right now general I have a greater interest in knowing what you think of the fight---and if you are preparing to pay for the wager."

General Arronburg was chuckling mysteriously in his throat.

"It was splendid---splendid, but it would have been much more better for you in particular if you had captured them, for they know a whole lot of what you might be seeking. And Jack Evans and I saw her run out blushing in the fire light like a red rose in July, and that she did not say a single word, or stop to greet us but flew like a bold into the shadow of the nearest trees on the shore."

"She was dismayed because I worried the spies in the fight, general....."

"No, no---she was like a lark filled with joy."

The general seated himself at the table, and heaved out a groan as he said:

"She saw the fight with the spies. And she did not have the needs to bandage you up did she? Would to heaven some of the men had captured those spies. They got away with something belong to her."

"Perhaps she can destroy her plans on that and frustrate the enemy, general."

"And I am ashamed to go to my own part---with this groan. I blow struck her and and---Colonel. And on top of that disgrace---you insist that I continue on the wager."

"I do."

General Arronburg's face hardened.

"Oh, I am to continue it. After all I tell you about the dangers of such an adventure. And do you know I am conscious of a great secret. Do you believe it is so?"

"And what is that?"

"I know the man who shot you in ambush. But after I told you---what then? Will you later on continue on the adventure, or do you recall that I gave you any guarantee Colonel? Did I say I would let you go? Did I promise I would allow you to go off into these fire swept woods where if you are not overtaken by the flames some of the "landolinians" hidden in the wood woods may kill you and sink your body to the bottom of the river. If I did I cannot remember."

"Are all those landolinians beasts as well as murderers and---"

"Stop. Do not tell me what you saw through the window even though it has some thing something to do with this. The landolinians are worse than beasts, they are no men. Had they had the chance they would have even killed you from shore in this cabin knowing what you are after. I'm not trying to keep you from performing your duty, even though the landolinians are trying to kill you, and yet it may be necessary if you still insist on going out of the proper time. You understand Colonel. To allow a soldier to go out on a rash and suicidal adventure is a greater crime of the military government, than of preventing him to go under such necessary conditions. I am hop helpless otherwise. I must pay the wager when you win, but before you even go when you do, it is fair that I give you timely warnings."

"You mean?"

"I mean nothing as yet. I cannot say what it will be necessary for me to do after you have heard what I know about the ones who shot at you from ambush. I am quite settled on a plan just now, Colonel but the plan might change at any moment. I am only warning you that your adventure is the greatest hazard on all record, and that you are playing with a fire of which you know nothing whatever because it has not burned you yet."

Walter seated himself slowly in a chair opposite the general, with the table between them.

"You are wasting time in attempting to frighten me general," he said.

"When the proper time comes I'll proceed on the adventure even through hell if need be. Yet who are the ones who shot at me?"

For a moment the general was clearly troubled. Then his lips tightened, and he smiled grimly over the table at Walter.

"I am sorry Walter. I like you as if you were my own son. You are a fighting man and no coward, and only fate being against you caused your failure in capturing those so spies. I should like to travel shoulder to shoulder with you in all things, and such a thing will be, for you do not understand yet. I tell you it would have been many times better for you, had you captured those two spies."

"Well it is the spies I am interested in, general. Why do you hesitate?"

"I hesitate. I am not hesitating Colonel. I am giving you a chance. He leaned forward, his great arms bent on the table. "And you insist Colonel Star ring?"

"Yes I insist."

Slowly the fingers of General Arronburg's hands closed into knotted fists and he said in a low voice.

"Then I will tell you my secret Colonel. Those two International spies know a whole lot of who are responsible for the floods and other disasters. They know it all, and the ones who gave orders for such disasters to be made. They are even responsible partly in it themselves. And---and---they are the ones who shot at you in ambush, and when Gertrude and her scouts drove away and of which one, she said she wounded."

The astounding statement of the great general who sat opposite him held Walter Starring entirely speechless. He had guessed some mysterious cause of his being so treacherously shot at, because he was going on an adventure for certain information the whole world itself was looking for and which he himself was after, but did not suspect this, and general Arronburg with his hands unclenching, and a slow humor beginning to play about his mouth waited coolly for him to recover from his amazement.

In those minutes, when his heart seemed to have stopped beating, Walter was staring at the other, but his mind had shot beyond him---to the girl who was the general's niece. Angeline Arronburg who had saved him when nearly killed by these two rascally spies. He wanted to cry out against the possibility of such a fact that those were the men who had ambushed him, yet he sat like one struck dumb as the monstrous truth took possession of his brain, and a whirlwind of understanding swept upon him. He was thinking quickly, and with a terrific lack of sentiment now. Opposite him sat general Arronburg, almost the wholesale loser of important documents in his cabin because of those two spies, and he Walter Starring was almost the victim of them also. Angeline Arronburg the general's niece had lost her important papers. Jennie Turner, was one simply of her kind, and he'd have given anything if she too was with him on the raft during the fight. And general Jack Evans the soldier scurrier, and the poor broken woman, and all the homeless army were of general Arronburg's breed and kind, and suffered at the hands of these two dastardly spies. Love for the country had proven to him the facts which now crowded upon him sadly. Like a lamb the general and his army might have fallen among dangerous wolves. A fighting coolness possessed him as he spoke to general Arronburg.

"I will admit that this is a tremendous surprise. And yet you have cleared up a number of things very quickly. It proves to me again that comedy is not very far removed from tragedy at times."

"I am glad you see the humor of it Colonel Starring," general Arronburg was deem dream that came to him it was the spies who again faced him in battle, and he awoke with that dream a thing of fire in his brain. The day light was not yet showing itself and the flush of the fire glow was just peering the sky along the horizon, and he dressed quietly and carefully listening for some sound of awakening beyond the bulkhead. If Gertrude Angeline was awake she was very still. There was shore noise on the christian side of the shore, and across the river he could hear the singing of thousands of men, and through his window he saw the distant fire smoke still rising above the far distant tree tops. The forest fire evidently was following. It was an ore orderly who brought him his breakfast and it was Gertrude who returned for the dishes half an hour later. After that Walter waited, tense with the desire for new adventure, but the boat had been going all night and there had been no letup in the steady creaking of the long sweepers, even in the swifter current, Walter could hear the working of it, and he knew he had seen the last of the more slowly moving raft. Near one of the partly open windows he heard two men talking just before the bateau shot into the wider section of the stream. They were strange voices. He listened and shot into the Arnonburgs raft was made up of forty five cribs seven abreast, and that time times when the river was too narrow for the huge raft, the huge craft had been split up so that each crib could be run through the narrow part by itself.

That would be a big job indeed, Walter assured himself. It would be very slow work as well as greatly hazardous, and as his own life was in no immediate jeopardy as long as he obeyed orders he would have ample time to in which to formulate some plan of action for himself. At the present time it seemed for his own good the one best thing for him to do just now was to have patience and wait according to general Jack Evans instructions. When Walter began to think about the situation, he felt sure there was a saving element of humor about it all for he had always wanted to make a trip down the big Mio-Hollesater Run River in a big boat, and now he was making it.

At noon a guard brought him his dinner. He was not sure whether he had ever seen such an Abbeemian soldier before, for he was a tall lithe fellow built to run like a deer, and who had beside his rifle and pistol a most murderous looking knife at his belt. As the door opened Walter, caught a glimpse of three others. They were business like looking soldiers, with a muscled built for hard work and fight, one sitting cross legged on the bateau deck with a rifle over his knees, the other standing with a rifle in his hand, and the third with a shouldered musket with bayonet attached pacing up and down before the door. Instead of appearing to be guarded from enemies he looked more as if he was a prisoner. But general Arnonburg knew Walters peril and was guarding against it, for twenty times suspicious persons during the night had set up a storm of rifle fire at the barge which the guards had returned with telling effect. The soldier who brought his dinner wasted no time for words for guards under duty were not supposed to talk to any one without necessity.

He merely nodded, murmured "Good day" and went out. And as he began to eat, Walter did not have to tell himself twice that general Arnonburg had been particular in his selection of the guards, and that the eyes of the soldiers he had seen could be as keen as a hawk when leveled over the tip of a rifle barrel. They meant business in his behalf. It was another guard and a stranger who brought in his supper, and for three hours after that, until the darkness came on, there being no sunshine that day the boat continued to speed down the river. It had made about sixty de ho miles during the night and day, he figured.

It was still twilight however when the big bateau was slowly run ashore, and tied up, but this night there was no sound of voices or wild commands and shouts or singing of men. Walter looking through his window, there was an oppressive silence about it all. The shadowy figures ashore were like a death watch than a guard, and to dispel the gloom of it he lighted two of the lamps in the cabin, whistled, and as a solemn chord he knew on the organ, and finally settled down to smoking his pipe. He would have welcomed the company of general Jack Evans or one of the guards, or Gertrude and as his loneliness grew more and more on upon him there was something of companionship even in the subdued voices he heard occasionally on the outside. He tried to read an Abbeemian newspaper but the printed words jumbled themselves and meant nothing.

It was eight o'clock, and again the smoke clouds of forest fires had once more darkened the night, when through his open windows, he heard a shout coming from some distant point down the river. Twice it came before it was answered from the bateau, and the second time Walter recognized it as the voice of general Arnonburg himself. A brief interval passed between that and the scraping of a boat alongside, and then there was a low conversation, in which even general Arnonburgs great voice was subdued, and after that the sound of the turn of the doornob, and the general himself came in bearing a large basket under his arm.

Walter suddenly rose to meet and greet him, and saluted. Yet Walter was surprised for it was not like the coming of the old fashioned general, and on the general's lips there was not the slightest sign of a smile, not could Walter observe in his eyes any sign of the flash of good natured greeting. His face was was darkly and fiercely stern as if he had traveled far and hard with his army on either an unpleasant march or a retreat, but in it there was no shadow of any kind of earning or remorse, as there had been in that of general Jack Evans. It was rather the face of a tired man, and yet Walter staring saw and knew what he saw was not physical exhaustion. General Arnonburg possessed something of the thought Walter had in his brains, and his mouth for an instant opened and he said:

"Yes, I have been having a rough time on the roughness of all in my born days so far," he nodded. "Three times I was snipped at by hidden enemies who probably thought I was you. This basket is for you."

He placed the basket on the table. It held nearly half a bushel, and was evidently filled to the curve of the handle, and what lay in it was hidden under a cloth securely tied about it.

"And you are partly responsible," he added stretching himself in a chair with a gesture of weariness. "The Glandelinian snipers are trying to kill you even from your cabin, Walter. I can see it for the marks of bullets against your cabin door and walls, and of the testimony of the guards that they had a 'Hot night' last night, and used about six rounds of a munition answering the steady running fire from the other shore. And in spite of the fact that even I was fired on I bring you good things to eat. Half the day my noise has been fussing with the things in the basket, and then insisted that I also bring them to you. And I have brought them simply to tell you another thing, something good for your ears. I am sorry that we all have to go through this, and I am sorry for her too, and you, and I believe Colonel Starring you will find as many tears in the basket as anything else, for her heart is crushed and sick because of the humiliation she felt and steel feels every time she thinks of the past disasters, and of what she herself had seen soon."

He was twisting his big rough hands, and Walters own heart went sick as he saw the furrowed lines that had deepened in the others face. The general did not look at him as he went on.

"Of course she told me. She tells me everything. And if she knew I was telling you this in particular, I think she would feel much better. But I want you to understand. She is more than what you might think she is. And that kiss she gave you last night for defeating the two Professional spies came from the lips of one of the best little girls God ever made, Colonel Starring."

Walter, with the blood in his now running like fire, heard himself answering. "I know it. She was excited, glad I had not been injured by the scoundrels." This time the general smiled, but it was like the smile of a man suddenly grown forty years older at once. "Don't try to answer now Colonel. I only want you to know she is as pure as the saints, and has a great popularity with Violet, and her sisters and all the best, christian generals, and the nation in general. It was unfortunate but to follow the impulses of ones heart is not always wrong. Everything has been unfortunate since you came. The enemy is on your trail. My warning, hers and Evans's is correct. I have to have you guarded as if you were my prisoner in stead of a guest. But I blame no one except--"

"The two professional spies."

General Arnonburg nodded. "Yes I have sent my best woodmen and runners, good day daddy longlegged fellows to trail these spies if possible. Gertrude is in the cabin on the raft now, and because of so much shooting last night, and as it might be renewed she cannot dare cross the stream to come here. But even then I cannot blame her very greatly for being careful, Colonel, for it is impossible to show yourself now without being shot at. Tell me if I am right as to your and her peril? You must know. You have come to love her as well as you love the Vivian girls. Do you believe she too can be in peril?"

"It seems very unfair," protested Walter. "Angelina Arnonburg is your niece. General, is it possible she is too in danger?"

"Yes I fear so."

"And you too?"

"I'm afraid so too. You must know these two International Professional spies are so different from other spies, and they have no ways of the enemy either. One of them, the smaller fellow with the Jeff face is a spainard and the taller man from Italy. They have spanish and Italian ways. That makes them both dangerous. Therefore we have to look out for them both. I love Gertrude too much to allow such perils to come near her and therefore the raft cabin is guarded like your own. Is it possible for a big heart like mine not to do that? Colonel!"

With almost a snort Walter rose to his feet and stared through one of the windows into the darkness of the river.

"Your Excellency," he said without turning his head. "The evidence at all Abbeemian headquarters, at all headquarters of every state, city and town condemns these two Professional Spies as the two blackest hearted murdering agents of Glandelin on all records. But whatever these crimes were they are far less atrocious than the one they tried on Perrod because he refused to reveal the hiding place of Jennie Turner or for now to take to them bushwhack Gertrude Angeline like you said they have done for me. I am not ashamed to confess I love her proper probably a little less than I do Violet and her sisters even, because to do it would be a like a sin. I love her so much that I would sacrifice myself to any torment or peril. If that sacrifice could bring her back to better times to care only, and keep her out of sight of those scoundrel spies whose hands are stained by the crimes for which they must hang if caught."

Walter looked through one of the barred windows

He did not hear the general as he came from his door. For a moment the general stared at the back of the colonel's head, and in that moment he was fighting to keep back what wanted to come from his lips in words. He turned to face Walter, faced him again and did not pause until he stood at the cabin door with his hand at the latch. There he was partly in shadow.

"I may not be able to see you again colonel until we reach within sight of a part of your goal," he said. "Not until then will you know---or will I know what is going to happen. I think you will understand strange things then, but that is for the approaching days to tell. General Evans has explained to you that you must not make an effort to even show your face at the door or window too much. You would regret it and so would I. Two of your guards were killed last night and four hurt. If you have red blood in you, colonel---if you would understand a little that you cannot understand now---wait as patiently as you can. I'll send enough long-legged men into those woods to run the snipers to---will you wait Colonel. Staring and pleasant dreams."

"Good night your Excellency" nodded Walter.

In the pale shadows he thought a mysterious light of gladness illuminated the general's face before the door opened and closed again leaving him once more alone. With the going of general Arronburg, also went the oppressive loneliness which had gripped Walter, and as he stood listening to the low voices outside the undeniable truth came to him that he liked this man more than he ever did before. He was a general warning him still about his peril and to look out for these professional spy scoundrels, and he felt irresistibly the impulse to love and respect him, and to feel sorry for him. He made:

He made no effort to shake off the feeling, and he knew more than one good Christian general had always warned him and his friends or even the vivacious girls to look out for unseen perils. And stirred by this impulse he knew that the evidence of his peril was a sure fact.

But his loneliness was gone. With the visit of the general had come a new unexpected thrill, the revival of an almost feverish anticipation the promise of impending things, that stirred his blood as he thought of them.

"You surely will understand strange things then," the general had said, and something in his voice had been like a key unlocking mysterious doors for the first time. And then "wait as patiently as you can."

Out of the basket on the table seemed also now to come to him a whispering echo of the same word "wait." Therefore almost cautiously, bashfully he laid his hand upon it, and then a pulse of life came with the longed-for whispering. It was from Gertrude Angeline. Also the warmth of her hands seemed to be there still, and the sweet breath of her perfume seemed also to come to him as he removed the cloth. In the next moment however he was trying beginning to laugh at himself and trying to call himself a fool for it was the breath mostly of the newly baked things which she had made, especially she favored "hot cakes" he said he liked so well, besides hams, and everything else that will make your mouth water.

AN ADVENTURE THROUGH THE RED PLAINS..... WHAT GENERAL ARRONBURG THOUGHT OF IT.

NEVER before had Walter felt the strange inspiration of her presence more strongly than in a moment. To him it was like being in the presence of some celestial being. He could not explain or even try to explain to himself why the visit of general Arronburg had broken down his loneliness feelings which seemed so insurmountable over a hour or so ago. Any kind of an analysis was not possible, because he knew the transformation within himself was without a single shred of reason. But nevertheless it had come to him, and with it his strange peril whether within or without took on another form. Where before there had been thought of leaving disregarding advice and go on his advance, and a scrambling to locate that information if he had to kill every Glandelinian he captured to do so, there filled him now in a intense desire to reach the point general Arronburg was heading for.

It was far after midnight when he went to bed, because for a time he stayed up to watch the distant movements of the glows of distant forest fires, and knew by their appearance they were becoming tremendous. He however was up with the early dawn one of the guards waking him. He at first scolded the guard saying:

"Why its night time you boob. It's only midnight."

"Midnight no eye" said the guard. "Its after ten o'clock in the morning. There is so much smoke from forest fires that to day there is no daylight."

This surprised Walter, but in looking out of the window he could see by the small lights of bonfires on the sandy shore the army of men were preparing their breakfast. Wait Walter was somewhat apprehensive, even though he was eager for the days work to begin, and for the army to continue its march, and in that eagerness he pounded on the door and called to one of the guards that he was ready for his breakfast with the rest of them,, but that he this time only wanted coffee to go with what general Arronburg had brought to him in the basket basket the evening before.....

That afternoon the big boat passed the thick sections of the Mt. Hurraria sections of the Laramie and almost impenetrable Mt. Hollister Woods, and before the time for the sun to be well down in the west arrived, though of course all day there was intense midnight darkness Walter staring through shining lights of the distant conflagration saw the thick slopes of the north branch of the far distant Borden Hills, and the rising peaks of the nearest sections known at the St. Ann and St. Marys heights all crowned with forests which at many points seemed strangely shrouded with dark fogs as if they were volcanoes going to erupt. He felt uneasy as he thought of these sections evidently being in the path of the "Red Plague" and when the fire should come up "Good night" How his eyes would have popped if he could have been on a higher elevation and would have had a view of those same hills. These hill sides were afire in a most terrific conflagration but just now the smoke was so thick that the glow of flames did not pierce them. These ridges afire really caused the prolonged darkness of the day. He had no inclination however to leave the boat to see how the situation lay. He'd sooner chance a forest fire than Glandelinian snipers as the peril from them he felt sure was more certain. He wanted to go on and with a still more growing uneasiness he saw there was no intention on the part of the crew of the bateau or of the army to alter on the way. There had been no stop at noon, and even with the approach of night the bateau was not to be tied up on shore. For twenty four hours the bateau had traveled steadily and swiftly, and it could not have made less than one hundred and twenty miles as the river ran. The big raft, Walter figured, had not traveled a third of the distance and he feared it may be overtaken if the fires came up again. Never once had the wind changed direction to turn the horror another way. Always the same course the fire had swept growing worse and worse every hour.

The fact that the bateau's progress would bring him to some point far out of reach of the forest fire before long, before the main army or the general could arrive on the raft did not check his uneasiness. It was this interval between their arrivals which held a great speculative promise for him, and the action of the fire storm seemed about to frustrate this for him. In that time if his luck had not entirely deserted him, he would surely make discoveries of importance, but what made him wonder was why did his enemies have the nerve to risk the dangers of the forest fires also to try and get him from ambush every inch of the trip, for as long as he was awake day or night never did the sounds of shots from shore camps, or the new wing came from the guards, and he could count the number of bullet holes on the wall inside the cabin where they had come in through the windows.

Day after day the journey continued without rest, and so the distant and near shots along the fourth day after leaving the scene of the point where they met with the general's army, it was Jack Evans again who brought in Walter's supper, and he granted a protest at the long and desperate efforts of so much of the army hundreds of thousands of men unable to check off the course of such a big fire. When Walter questioned him, he shrugged his shoulders and said dispassionately: "Heem o me bang foire, bougeest foire that has made us bang a sweep over so forest since we war begun. I no lak but here can not be help. We must make us trust in Blessed Virgin and our Blessed Lord. Nothing else can make us bang a sweep."

One day about a hour or so later Walter looked through one of the barred windows

At this time the bateau was crossing the main stretch of the big river, slipping past the region of the fat & distant Mic-Allister Run, where it entered the bigger lakes far beyond. All this time there hardly had not been any thing we could call day light, and the darkness was oppressive and the atmosphere unusually warm. The thermometer on the boat sometimes registered from ninety six to one hundred and five. Two hours later the bateau entered the portion of the river where it swelled out like a great and wide lake, of very enormous extent, gathered this lake on both sides by enormous forests. That night the rejoicing of the men ashore was that of men who had come out from under a strain and were throwing off its tension for the first time in many days. A great fire was built on the sandy shore, and after they piled wood upon it, a number formed an altar from big box boxes and the like and thought though it was evening a priest offered a Mass that the forest fires would not come up too soon. Then in the flare of this fire a smaller one was built and kettles and pans were soon bubbling and steaming over it and a great coffee pot that held three or four gallons sent out its steam laden with aromas that mingled joyously with the odor of burning balsams and cedars in the smoke laden air. Walter could see the whole thing from his window, though he looked out from the side of it for fear a sniper might take a pop at him from the opposite shore which also took in the view of the window. This time when Jack Evans came in with the supper he found the great fire was at cooking over the fire was fresh smoke steam. As there had been no firing of guns except the answering shots to that of hidden snipers on shore, he was puzzled, and when he asked where the snipers had come from general Evans only smiled, shrugged his shoulders and winked at a covey, and went out singing a hymn about the Blessed Sacrament. But Walter noticed there were never more than four men of the boat guard ashore at the same time. The rest was always aboard the bateau, watching every movement on the opposite shore, or for the alarm of a rifle flash.

And he too felt the thrill of an axe to cut working suddenly within him, and this thrill landed in swift swift running blood when he saw the men about the fire suddenly jump to their feet and go to meet new and shadowy figures that came up swiftly and indistinctly just in the edge of the forest glow. There they mingled and were lost in identity for a long time and Walter wondered if they were more of the soldiers who might have been in further advance of the fire to warn these of its swift approach. After that Evans and others quickly ceased the fire, and came over to the bateau on a boat but not to sleep. No one but Walter went to sleep that night.

The next morning Walter again woke up to find it still as dark as ever, though on the sandy shores the cook fires were again burning, though far in the distance the horizon line for an enormous extent was breaking the darkness a trifle by a time a tint of the great fire glow, and at when the voices of many men roused Walter, he went to his window and saw thousands of figures, where the night before there had been only a score. Yet in the glow of the fire on the sandy beach he was not able to recognize any of them, all being strangers, and dressed in the uniforms of Winkie Abbeemians. He however realized the significance of their presence. The bateau had been travelling southward, but the waters of the mighty river flowed southward toward Lake Kwanmilin, and the bateau was heading for this lake as from the conversation he overheard the fire was cooking on in such a tremendous sea that only in this lake would the bateau be safe now. He caught a glimpse of sixteen big tug boats a little later, and six six men to the crews of each tugboat, and after that the bateau set out slowly, but steadily downstream for the huge lake.

For hours seeing a tremendous increase in the glow, Walter was at one window or the other, with something of awe working inside of him as he saw what they were passing through—and between. He fancied the water trail was like an entrance into one part of the watery entrance so road of in "Dantes Inferno" a region of dark and unbroken horrible hellish mystery, a country of hellish darkness and horror, broken only by the strange weird reddish glow, a country possibly of earthly lost souls and eternal death shut out from the world of sunshine and beautiful forests of trees he had known. He wondered how a forest fire could make so much heavy smoke to overspread a country in darkness like this. The stream widened and widened but in the darkness he sensed the feeling and odor of steam and wondered if the water was not hot. The forests along the shore on both sides was so dense that even in daytime any one would not have been able to see into it, or through it. The tree tops revealed at times in the dazzling light of the glow hung in a tangled canopy overhead, and a glow of archaic blackness filled the channel below, so that at points where the glow did shoot through it was like filtered rays of a setting sun shining on black soil....QQ

There was no sound except the dull, clug, clug, clug of the tuben's tugboats, and the ripple of water along the sides of the bateau. The atmosphere was very hot to day unusually hot, more like that of the great deserts of Africa, or better to say like the Death Valley of California on its hottest season. Walter kept the doors and windows closed to keep the smoke of the bateau very comfortable, and the general who had come inside to get some of the food said it was stifling.

The men on shore though they seemed to stand the heat well, did not shout sing or laugh, and if they talked it was but in low whispering tones, and often they wiped the sweat off their foreheads. There was no cry of any kind of birds or animals from ashore, and no more shots came from the opposite shore either. There was a dead silence.

And once Walter saw the face of general Jack Evans as he passed the window, and it was set and hard and filled with the look of a person having the awful superstition that he was passing through the uppermost section of the hellish country. And then suddenly the end of it came. A flood of great reddish light burst in at the windows, and all at once voices came from ahead, a shout of excitement, a yell of surprise from the bateau, and Evans himself started shouting commands in wild words from the bateau to the men on shore who answered in chorus. Walter found himself grinning despite the excitement of the moment. Yet Walter could concede that the intense darkness of the forest passage had put strange thoughts into his own heart.

The terrible fire however was branching off but before nightfall, Evans and another man came in warning Walter to stay on board the boat until further notice for they believed the heart of the conflagration was reaching the shore of the lake, but that it was through some probable chance of good luck changing its course. For four hours Walter watched the labors of the men, as they beached the raft which appeared close to the boat again on long rollers of smooth birch, and rolled it foot by foot in that intense heat outside over a cleared trail until it was launched finally into the wide lake itself. That night Walter was not hardly able to sleep as it was now even so close inside the cabin.

The following morning the river seemed to be no longer a stream, but a long wide lake, bordered on both sides by impenetrable forests, and at least the bateau was anchored about half a mile from the edge of shore near the edge of a great open in the forest with either by nature made or once cut by woodmen for a purpose. There was some excitement here then than ever, even though to day there was only twilight darkness, but never the less it was too dark for Walter to understand the meaning of it. There were many more voices. Then voices were at his door, and after a loud knock, and in answer to his "Come in" it opened. Walter saw a guard and Evans first. And then to his amazement, general Arronburg himself stood there, sitting at his and nodding good morning though he was sweating as if taking a Turkish Bath with his full uniform on. It was that time in the open door was like a warm breath from the Death Valley itself, and it was strong with the odor of pine smoke. It was impossible for Walter however to repress his amazement, and astonishment. "Welcome to my army," greeted the general in return. "You are surprised? Well I don't see out by a dozen hours--in a bar boat Colonel. It is only for your safety that I should be here to give you welcome. You will have to come with us, for the fires are due in all their fury, and will be on the water of the lake so that though it'll do no harm to the bateau you'll not be able to live on it because of the steady heat."

Behind him Evans and the guard were looking very sober, and then he came in, and the guard picked up Walter during a dawning sack and threw it over his shoulder.

Walter followed, and out in the open he sensed the heat to a very fierce degree. When he stepped ashore it was like that of an oven, and Evans and the guard being behind Walter, with four or five shadowy figures ahead, with the general walking a by his side, started on. There was no more voices, and he, and the unusually large clearing, and into it led a wide trail, which they a mile there was intense blackness over and like the roof of a cavern, nor did to the right a glow appeared. No one spoke. Even general Arronburg was silent, and at the end of a mile the trees began to open above their heads and they came not even half a mile away, was a village inside such a dangerous fire. He knew it before the general had the chance to say a single word. He raised it with the lighted windows, fully a thousand houses, without a curtain drawn, or a lighted place to be built of logs in the heart of a fire endangered wilderness, and at his side he heard general Arronburg say: "A beautiful place we struck unconsciously Colonel. I have seen this town before all built of sweet cedar where birch is not used, but the people in it must be warned. I can't see for that purpose. But we'll give the fire here after the one hour."

Magnificent. An hour or so later Walter looked through one of the barred windows upon a world still lighted by the distant fire pines. He could see the dark edge of the distant forest that closed in the little forest town near the river and about him seemed to be a dense level land with level meadow rich brown and there the shadow of a building in which the lights by this time were dim. The smoke clouds were still thick in the sky, and a strange quietness hovered over the world he looked upon. Yet true below him floated up now and then a puff of strong tobacco smoke. The guard under his window was evidently awake, but he made no sound.

A little later he made it an undress, put out the two lights, in his room, and stretched himself between the cool white sheets on the couch couch. After a time despite the warmth in the room he managed to doze off to sleep, but it turned out to be a restless slumber filled with trouble troubled dreams. The dreams were as if he sinking into some kind of a mire, and that there was terrible frightful darkness overhead, while all around him trees, stones, water everything even the muck he was sinking into was burning. Twice the dream partly awoke him, and the second time it seemed to him his nostrils sensed a more sharper tang of smoke than that of burning tobacco, yet he did not or was not just then able to fully rouse himself, and the hours passed, and now sounds and smells that rose in the night binged themselves upon him only as a part of the troublesome fabric of his dreams. But at last—there came a tremendous shock, something which beat over these things which chilled him, and suddenly aroused him to consciousness, finally forcing him to arouse himself, open his eyes and get up.

Even before he was totally awake he found himself on his feet. It was still very dark, but he heard many voices, voices that were not subdued but filled with a wild note of excitement and cowardice. And what he sensed indeed was not that of tobacco smoke. It was heavy in his room, even though the windows were tightly closed. It even filled his lungs and made him cough. His eyes were smarting with the stinging of it.

Finally there came to him a sense of being fully awake, and with a startled cry he leaped to a window. He looked to the south and west, and gave a cry of surprise and horror. As far as the horizon line extended he looked out upon a flaming world. He saw also a long row of forested slopes far off to the right and they were one mountain of flames and smoke. With his fist he rubbed his smarting eyes. For a moment the glow was gone and he saw outside he thought it. At first the strange deepening gray which he also saw outside he thought must be the coming of dawn ghostly with that mist of smoke that had come into his room. But it was a rolling wall of well it soon at day would be called white smoke. He could see legions of shadowy men or figures of men running wildly in and out, and disappearing with strange grotesque implications on their shoulders, and he fancied he could even hear the voices of many women and children, and from beyond the edge of the forest to the west and south came the howling of many dogs, and even the howling and screech of cats. One voice suddenly rose and boomed far above the others. It was General Aronburg, and at its commands little groups of other figures shot out into the gray smoke gloom and did not appear again.

Again in the southwest and along the whole western horizon as far as eye could take in the view the sky was flashing with red, and Walter opened the window to look out. A sudden breath of air blowing hotly but gently in Walter's face told him the direction of the wind. The wind had changed direction during the night, and made the conflagration change course. The beautiful little town lay almost in the centre of the growing line of the worst conflagration that Walter had ever seen before. He saw it was coming with the speed of race horses.

He quickly dressed himself, and went again to the window. Quite distinctly now he could make out General Evans under his window running toward the edge of the forest, at the head of a large brigade of men and even boys and men of the town who carried axes, cross cut saws, and other thin as used by rangers to fight a forest fire with. It was the last of Jack Evans soldiers that he saw for some time in the open meadow, but from the front of the house he could hear many excited voices, chiefly of women and children, and guessed it was from there the finally final and desperate efforts against the fire were being directed. The wind was growing much stronger in his face and hotter, and with it came a sharper tang of smoke, and the widening light of the fire seemed to be fighting to hold its own against the deepening pall of flame lit gloom caused by the heavy smoke advancing like massive storm clouds of erasus with the wind. There then seemed to come a low and distinct sound of some kind with that wind so indistinct that to Walter ears it was like a strange unearthly murmur more than a thousand miles away. He strained his ears to hear, and as he listened there came another sound like a moaning sobbing voice far away in the distance. The sound he heard now sounded like grief, something that went to his heart, and held him cold and still. Though the sound was like the sobbing of a little child yet he knew it was not that of a child. Nor was it a woman's. It evidently was the sound of the fire hurricane far away. An army of rushing figures came out into his view, and these hurried across the meadow with weapons on their shoulders and disappeared into the timber in spreading ranks where one great solitary evergreen showed dully gray through the ever increasing veil of smoke mist. For a space of time Walter looked after them, a strange being in his own heart. It was as if he had seen an whole army of men not going into the face of a most deadly peril, to fight back that peril, and at last he shouted out to some one to tell them it was folly. But there was no answer from under his window. Even the guard was gone. A nothing lay between him and the outside and he was down the stairs and outside in a few minutes with an ax of his own ready to help save the town. He hurled himself against the nearest tree, using the ax with powerful swings. He saw the lines of men working desperately hard, but not the thousandth of an inch could he see them winning any headway, yet he himself worked until he had brought down three trees and his ax was dull. Then he paused and studied the situation more carefully. Only one thing would avail them, and that if a big rainstorm came. Nothing else.

For about five minutes or longer after seeing the fighters being beaten by the advancing conflagration, Walter looked wildly about him, a strange and sad and heavy beating at the heart. With the doring of so many rangers it as to him as if he had seen as many innocent helpless children going to fight in the face of such a deadly peril, and losing, and at last he shouted for some of the rangers to bring back the soldiers and the towns folk. But there was no answer, except from the distant shouts of the fighters and the strange roar of the awful thickening smoke. Nothing lay between Walter and escape if he was cowardly enough to desert. But he ran over to where he saw a group of men working like mad to chop down trees, and he thrust himself among them, using his ax and staid studied the taller trees more carefully. Only one thing now would avail him and the rest of the fighters, and that was some object with which he could bring down those taller trees. He looked about him for an explosive shed but he saw not a shack for which to answer the purpose because of the fact the smoke hid things like a thick fog. Then not far off his eyes fell on something that looked like a barn. Eagerly Walter ran for it. The barn was locked but he used his ax, and hustled the lock but before he had opened the door he heard a great voice coming round the end of a building, and it was giving commands to another large party of men rushing to do battle against the advancing flames.

It a moment it was followed by general Conconthian Aronburg, who passed under a window and faced a large pine tree, as he shouted to the men to form in line and go at the fire with might and main.

Suddenly Walter called over to him, and the general turned and looked at him through the thick smoke gloom, his head bare, his arms naked, and his eyes gleaming wildly as he listened.

"A branch of the fire has went that way twenty minutes ago," Walter shouted. "It is raging in the forest toward where you see the dead spruce patch yonder. And it is going to leap the clearing general—I'm afraid—you better sent some men there, or the town is doomed, and we will all be trapped and your whole army of millions of men. Hurry general. We are going to head it off here."

If there had been other words to finish, the general would not have heard them. He was running toward the dead spruce with thousands of men at his back all with weapons necessary to stem the conflagration if possible, and Walter saw him disappear where the other men before had gone.

Walter knew the rangers trick in blasting down great trees, yet to carry out the explosives from this ammunition shed which it proved to be without a doubt without dropping any was a difficult problem, and it was nearly a quarter of an hour before he had loaded a wheelbarrow full of the most powerful blasting powder and sticks he could find. He intended to even blast great gaps and trenches in the ground by mining. He no longer had to hold his breath to hear the wild wailing moaning in the wind, and where there had been dense smoke gloom there now glared sheens of light, and black mountainous clouds, rolling and twisting over the tree tops far away of the south and western horizon forest line and east so as if mighty broods were now playing with them from behind. They piled up like thunderheads upon thunderheads, and the rolls were huge, and fantastic, and frequently pierced by flames that dart stretched across the sky at times taking it very light.

Walter now rejoined the nearest rangers, and one after another he blasted down trees. Strong this the other rangers secured explosives from the barn but it did no good, the fierce heat drove them all back inch by inch, even though they had made a good stretch of ground free from trees entirely.

Instantly Walter faced the direction taken by general Aronburg and those who had followed him, it was his purpose now to fight the flames there, and he felt as he thrust forward why he ordered all this devastation in California and elsewhere with this section of the forest fire overwhelmed that impulsive like smoke some inundation. General Aronburg had gone into the forest with 10000 men. The opportunity was here at hand, and if the fire was not stayed here either the fight might as well be given up.

Positive also that Gertrude Angeline had been left with the raft, the thought that the town might be devoured by the onrushing conflagration did not appall Walter just now, hardly he did not even worry, as long as the people escaped. The town held little interest for him now. It was to check the

And he ran toward the old dead spruce trees, bringing as much of the explosives with him as he could carry. He reached a path way which turned out to be a faintly worn trail, where it entered the thicker section of the forest beyond the spruce and here it was very narrow while the trees at many places were very close together and with brush thick with leaves hanging close to the sides of it, so that Walter now it was not in general use, and that but few feet had ever used it. He followed swiftly, and in five minutes came suddenly out into a great open thicket with smoke, where long lines of men were fighting and working like demons. It was a scene of confusion and death. A rifle shot in width, it

Here he saw despite this open which was a clearing a trail some hundred feet across and he saw that it was not sufficient to head off the fire, for it was high with brush and dry grass, and it ran in a semi circle as far as he could see through the smoke in both directions. Thus had the people of the town hoped to safeguard their property but it seemed no chance as the advancing fire was being preceded by a hurricane of wind. Walter followed the faintly beaten path, and up and down through the fog of smoke he could hear many voices, the sound of falling trees, the crash of axes, and other sounds and knew it was this great circular fire clearing that the people and soldiers and also the rangers were watching and guarding, but the fire though it had swung this way did not reach here as yet. So thick was the smoke that he could not see any one as he trailed across the clearing across the open. In a new soft path of the earth he found many footprints and he deeply made and wide apart, the footprints of hurrying men, telling him that general Arvonburg had all his followers were ahead of him, and that the general was somewhere directing the fight when he crossed the clearing. The footprints led him to a still more indistinct trail in the farther forest. It was here he knew the men were bottling and this trail he now followed went straight into the face of the fire ahead. He followed it. The distant murmur had grown into a shrieking roar over the tree tops, and with it the wind was coming stronger, and the smoke thicker. For half a mile he continued along the path, and then he stopped knowing he had come to the dead line, and he saw many men strutting in confusion before the advancing fire. Here the distant trees were rarely three feet apart, and they for miles in extent or so far as smoke and view would allow were all alike like huge lumber yards, the flames leaping way up and roffing the distant branches in their shotted tangles. Over him was a swirling chaos. The fire wind had grown into a terrific roar before which the trees tops nearest him and beyond him to the rear bent as if struck by tropical hurricanes, and in the air he breathed he could feel and sense a swiftly growing heat. For a space he stood there, as the others ran past him shouted "Run for your life you fool. The fire is beyond control." He was still standing there however breathing quickly in the face of a nightmarish peril. He did not see anything of the general. Where had he gone? What had become could it be that dragged him still further into the path of death? But had he struck aside from the trail? Was he alone in danger?

As if in answer to the questions there came from far and near of his but to the right a loud cry. It was general Arronburus voice, and as he listened, it commanded over and over again for the other men to retreat. Yet something in the cry held Walter. There was a note of terror in it, a wild entreaty that was almost drowned in the trembling wind, and the meaning that was in the air.

Walter was ready to turn back, but he had already approached too near to the red line line of death, and the clouds had already approached too near away the flames welled in the clouds themselves, yet that cry of general Avenbury urged him on like the lash of a whip. He turned back and then plunged and in the wild dangers of making no longer ill. He fought a trail under his feet three times again in a day, and then he heard the gun and the cry, and ran straight toward it. The cry he had recognized, and now he heard a great friend was ahead of him and he himself in great peril, and now the moment for Walter had passed. When danger or fear of death would have driven him back. When the general and his men had been alive and fought, he would live, and he gripped his ax and flung his blanket over his shoulder and ran straight to the top of the hill which he had to fight. He ran against his face and hands.

[illegible]

"Help we are trapped."..

Again he started northwestward through the dense spruce slopes. Enormous mountains of resinous spruce, black as ink were swirling skewed along the two sides of the giant valley and in the center now too. Under that lush pall the use of tin on were exposed through the receptacle in which they are to be hidden from a search by the lighting of the smoke. If the tin and tin cans could be made to burn in five or ten minutes they would be completely safe, and it would take him more an hour to reach the safety of the chimney.

He could find no trace of the path of the clothing.
Again the rider in the forest wildly swung his rifle, or he hurried the slight edge of the forest of general A. substance voice..... He felt sure driven back by the fire the general and his men were running like and toward the tip of that wedge, crying out now and then for aid. And always he bent ahead until at least a mile from the riders. Walter came to the side of a narrow stream and saw what it was that made the edges of the forest, for under his eyes the stream split and two arms of it widened out, one along each shore of the stream was a wide fire clearing made by the axes of the town people, in that direction the fire had spread and was still reaching, and it was a boiling hell of fire and billowing volcanic fountains of smoke and shooting sheets of flames throwing a blinding glare and lighting the rest of the forest for miles and so greatly was the heat of it that even when he stood Walters clothing started to smoke and it parched his face and hands. Dashing himself into the stream to soak his clothing, and to dash water into his face, he found it very warm about his feet. Then he looked across on his own line of advance. The fire typhoon had passed, but the wall of smoke was not seen any away, and yet what he could see through parts of the smoke clouds was not black any more, and yet what that had been brown. It was smouldering like a furnace, the dark corner of a world was a fire, and smoke rose as if from a low filled crater. Little tongues and big death-balls and now there was no wind here - only the shimmer of a distant coming smogging farther and farther away.

And then out of that waste across the river, Walter heard a terrible cry. It was General Ansbachburg still calling--even in that waste of hopeless death--for aid. Into the deepest part of the stream he was like a piece of drift wood, and only waste water came in to drown him. He saw where General Ansbachburg had come out of the water, and where his foot had placed it as he was scouldering red hot ash and char and scouldering de vis shal. It was a terrible inferno but this trail the colonel followed. The air he breathed now was stifling hot, and filled with stifling clouds of ash, and it dust, and smoke. He could not hardly see, and he went burning shoe leather. His feet struck red hot ash under the sky skeletons still crackled and snapped like so many ears of wheat and burst hot, and his face burned, and into his nose came a smoky burning pain--then skeletons too close together to pass through and they were founded in shining flames that spread the sky like a burn and died.

The general feared the sky like a hurt wild pinto by a shattered man, smoking chimneys no longer ceiling for aid, but were crashing through the air forced to turn aside, where the general had rushed through a half-dozen times of burning debris, and a third time following where the general had gone, his feet felt the sudden stab of living coals. In another moment he would have shouted of aiding, the great general stopped where the burning forest seemed to suddenly enormous white smoke filled spaces catching the burning pillars of the standing of the black edge of a cliff, which leaped off into a scoulding fire below a wide one, and which was like a white hot volcanic crater of irreparable size, big enough to hold many real big volcanoes and it was all flames and brightly valley extending as far as one could see between two ridges one of which in the distance looked like a ridge of volcanic in eruption, and as an hour was checked with living spruce, turpentine in eruption, and the growth held only about three feet apart and washed with drenches and bushes lit of horrible death, general Arreburto stood looking, and Walter heard a strange meaning coming in his breath. His great bare arms were black and scorched with heat, his hair was burned, his shirt was burned from his shoulders. Walter of a face that was like a black mask--and when he saw it was Walter who had spoken, his great body seemed to sag--and with an unintelligible cry he pointed down.

Walter Staring saw nothing with his half blind eyes, but to his terror under his feet he felt a sudden giving way, and the five cotton tangle of earth and roots crushing into the hot depths below, smothered in an avalanche of white hot ash that was rising round him. Fortunately they only went on for a distance down and stayed there. Then his fingers clutching at the living roots, he hid with a savage cry slinger to his feet, and looked around to find general Ambergburg a "Fine indeed," nodded Walter. "And you!!!!!!!!!!"

"A bit scratched and a broken leg, Mitt will be around in two weeks the doctor said," he held up his padded hands. "I would have died, and the country would have lost a great man for the army of his cause if you had not carried me to the river. Jennie Turner says the nation owes you her cause for having saved it." He.

"That is what I have come to tell you about," said the general. "The instant they knew you were able to listen and comprehend both Jennie's murmur and my voice insisted that I come and tell you things. But if you don't feel well enough to hear me now."

"Go on--" almost threatened Walter Starnin.

The look of cheer which he observed in the general face had faded away, and milder saw in it the sign of sorrow which had nettled them. He turned his gaze toward the fire not through which though far away the glow of still burning fires was coming, and nodded absently.

beyond record among soldiers and rangers. The forest fire, a loan burn started by the toll call, fully raze thousands of acres. They were trapped and the remainder of them are badly burned and injured, when I and they were they were reached. All the other fighters there under full force and in even though they were injured. The total is fifteen thousand dead, and 25,000 injured by falling trees and burned. They were burned there they had been found, injured by retreating rangers beaten back by the forest fire even heroes and brought in by the forest fire. Even himself was the only survivor and he was not injured.

injured. I thought his legs as great a miracle as his arm. He was not batter man than when I saw him will ever live. What he did was greater and all the others; and Colonel he told me that despite the right and fast in the first single the fire was handed off from building on Boulevard St. Omer. He sat cornered the fire when he saw the flames sweep through the valley like an ocean and hell fire. I was then trapped, though I did not fully understand my peril until I saw the calamity happening. But he was it all, and he drove to also come to my aid he but he was out of by that enormous fire man of the valley and squads of his own men were trapped. But he was it all over the the threatened destruction of all my men because we were trapped. And after that he knew how and why my men and his own and many others were trapped. And after that word of it did he tell me until I become better. Two were trapped but not a to Colonel. You remember that wedge of forest you saw. He did not want me on that part of the fight. He did it alone with his own command, and he saved that section of the forest from burning to the north. He saved the train killed a number of men, and he was forced to retreat deeper into the dangerous forest
A falling tree crushed one of his men out of shape, and his mind went at the same time, so that he fled into the forest and disappeared in the wild hurricane of fire. That is the kind of man we want, brave. That is the kind about you should have for a friend. Jamie Turner. She is great.

"Jennie Turner," cried Walter. And who is the other?"

"My darling Naice, who has a missing and lost sister."
"Lost sister?"

"Yes."

"The Anna Aronburgs!"

"Yes but for my sake and here don't tell a soul what I'm going to tell you. That boy Radcliffe who goes about with Peirce is her in disguise."

"It is the truth," said General Arrunburg, "and do not know what you say."

"It is the truth," said General Arnonburg. "And Arnonburg displayed as that boy in also my niece--and Jennie Turner--whom you saw carrying you--"he handed smiling into Walters aching eyes, taking full measure of recompense in the others heart breaking attitude as he waited----"Is my cousin, Colonel Starbuck, my youngest and nearest cousin."

"Yes my cousin said the same."

THE my cousin, and the bravest hearted girl scout that ever lived #0 for #0 I comprehend in all the world, and so Anapolita Argarigua and her displaced sister," cried the general, "I have pride in his vote." "It was she and Gertruda Anapolita who saved you, when the professional spies shot you almost to death on that shore of sand Colonoa. I tell you even the victim girls would have done what they did, bring you back to life. Why? I mean colonial and you will understand at last. She had known all about your purpose to go out that dangerous expedition, she knew your peril was bad, and so she and Gertruda sat out with a squad of boyacutas to trail you down river in a boat. Yet they feared the work to do, they risked peril of their own in shadowing you, the dangerous of forest-fire, and the enemy as well, as treacherous quickness in the water and on shore. Yet she and they loved you, and the more worried they were about you the more they hastened after you and the more they prayed for you, for they knew you had shadowed you after you left camp. Some time ago she had rescued Perro from an attic filled with rattlesnakes, so knowing your dangerous adventure to begin it was then that they set out to make a good flight to save you, and you know how that misadventure made that flight, colonial--until you recovered."

The General was leaning from his chair, his face shaken. "Tell me did she not fight those glandulins who shot you?" he cried. "and you untill the last long time ago did you not fight to save her from an unseen unseen peril?"

"In it is so," murmured the colonel.

"Well she was intimidated to rescue you and so was Jennie Nimmer." wait on the general. "You saved Gertrude's life 1 year ago. Now I won't let her be killed. I go to bail the rest of it. It went through the Vietnam area that Gertrude and Jennie Nimmer learned that you who had saved them were on your way down this coast to lead Hanoi's army to find information concerning the floods and other disasters created by the enemy. And the big Abkhazian flood and you were the first to identify the men about as if the world had been flooded by a four day rain. Well, you know, and that particularly you men doing the investigation should."

She was in the camp when the messenger came. She had but one desire--to save you --to kill if possible the Professional Spy who had trailed a you and she left camp to trail you and them. She and Janita disappeared from camp with a party of girl and boy scouts that day. You know how long after winter went happened. They were coming down river in a boat despite the fierceness of approaching forest fires. They heard the shouting--and saw the flames--and chased the two intruders--but you were guided out by the wind so that you

It was she who ran out to the front door, pulled out the shotgun and pointed it between trees, ready to fire again if the two men appeared again. It was Gertrude you saw standing over you, it was she who knelt down at your side and prayed and then --

The general paused, and he smiled, and then grinned as he forgot himself and tried to rub his two bandaged hands together.

"Water, late Mexican things you will find. I found a few things, and stood over you, will a partridge nest down at your side, loving you. Yes it is true. She looked upon you as a brother. And then for a space of time they fought over you for life and death; for the apias returned on the opposite shore and renewed the firing, and they won, wounding one of the apia. Then as you lay there bleeding and hopeless you looked pitously to Jennie. - I saw her, and she came to me, and they dragged you to a place below, 114 after that they walked on together, and pined, while my army was making down mountains strong from the north.

The Pasadena mind works very quickly and strangely. Miller, and perhaps it was that Miller, who could intuition which made them do what they did. After this incident Gertrude knew it would never be far from her mind. Her adventure as it was too well let out, so in their belching of things, she insisted on not allowing you to proceed if she could help it, while Jimmie Turner came back in a flat motor in boat to meet me and tell me of the proceedings. Both were frightened over your situation and danger, and when I seen the whole thing I had gone too far for me to mend or prevent, and I knew you must be held back from proceeding on your adventure to the city, and I told them to go home. The Princesses telling them the whole situation, when I saw what was happening, that you loved our Country as well as well that you were willing to fight for her honor, when you thought even at our property was in danger on that raft, and of course it was-- I miss sure it would all end well. But not one of us could take any other chances until I knew, and regarding your part continuing even on the boat, there were hard at your mind, and minds on land and sea.

The general shrugged his shoulders and said, "on matters of combat I have again and in his voice was a little break as he said "I am not going to tell you much more if I don't, Colonel," and I had left him to love for our country, and these beautiful girl scouts and violet and white misters would not have had no chance to tell me anything but I did not know how to tell him. He closed of telling you that Magill's was with us, though now he is going back to Ireland, and besides that fight of yours, against those two spies on the raft. Interested me very much for I saw in it a wonderful test in a man who might become one of my generals if he chooses wisely between his duty and other things." I loved you for it, and I saw the whole fight at a distance and I think what you heard that "little" fellow at the raft was a really bold and now my voice and Jennie Turner loves you for bringing me out of the fire, and I'll love you forever. Violet and her sisters, will hear of it, and you'll love me too.

"Put you are not listening."

The general had noticed that Walter was looking past him toward the open road and he said when he saw the look that was in the colonel's face.

"Aida-de-oump," he called loudly, "Come here." "Hill."

In the moment there was the sound of running feet outside, and the Aida-de-oump came rushing up. The general held out his two great handgloved hands, and Walter met them with his own, one handgloved and the other one free. Not a word now was spoken between them, but their eyes were the eyes of men between whom suddenly came the faith and understanding of a brotherhood of of love as strong as life itself. Then the orderly wheeled the general from the wagon and, and the colonel straightened himself up against his pillows, and waited and listened almost impatiently, until it seemed that two hearts or even four were thumping inside him in the place of one.

It was a long time, he thought, before Gertrude Angelina stood near the opening in the rear of the wagon. For a breath she paused there looking at him as he stretched out his handgloved arm to her, moved by every yearning impulse in her soul to come in, yet apparently ready as a bird about to fly away. And then as he called her name, she ran to him, climbed into the wagon and dropped upon her knees at his side, and his arms that therefore went about her, inseparable to their injury--and her hot face was against his neck, and his lips crushed in the smothering sweetness of her hair. He made no effort whatsoever to speak beyond that first calling of her name. He could feel her heart beating against him, and her hands tightened at his shoulders, and at last she raised her glorious face so near that the breath of it was on his lips. Then seeing what was in his eyes, her soft mouth quivered in a little smile, and with a broken sob in her throat she whispered:

"Has it ended all right Walter?"

He drew the red mouth of the child to his own and with a glad cry which was no word in itself he buried his face in the lustrous tresses he loved. After wards he could not remember all it was that he said, but at the Angelina Arronburg had drawn a little away so that she was too big at him her eyes shining gloriously and her cheeks beautiful as the petals of a wild rose, and he could see the troubling in her white throat like the beating of a tiny heart.

"And you'll be careful as to where you go when you recover!" she whispered joyously.

"Yes and when I bring you back to Violet, and her sisters--and tell him or them of my adventure here with you he'll reward us both. They said if I could not gain the information they too were going to seek for I need not chance it unless I want to, you see." He held out his arms again. "You see" he cried his face and throat in her hair again. "I've found many good experiences up here and again a new and good and glorious girl scout. Are you a little glad Gertrude?"

Outside not far from the wagon general Arronburg waited in his wheelchair grunting miserably now and then at the long time it was taking Jennie Turner to discover certain things a little distance down the road. Finally he heard her coming riding on her beautiful horse from the direction of an open glen in the woods, and the general quickened and tried to rub his handgloved hands when she again came up to him her face pink and her eyes shining with the greatest thrill that can stir a child scout's heart.

"If we had only known," he tried to whisper, "I could have brought my army down quicker." He desisted at a great occasion for having saved my plans from being discovered by those unprofessional spies. But tell me--could you too see? Did you hear? What--"

Jennie Turner put her hand over his mouth. "In another moment you will be shouting," she warned. "Maybe I did not see, and maybe I did not hear the fight on the raft--but I know there are many happy people now in the very world because of him. And now if you want to guess what is going to happen next--"

"Walter Starring is going back to general Victoria's lines."

"No."

"Well then if you insist, you and Gertrude are."

"Yes, and the next!"

The general chuckled. "Walter Starring," he said.

"No, no, no. If you mean that--"

"I mean always that he must go unless you want him to remain with me," corrected general Arronburg, kissing the hand that was gently stroking his cheek. And then he leaned his great head against her where she stood behind him, and Jennie's fingers ran where his hair was crisp with the alight of fire, and for a long time they said no other word but let their eyes rest upon the wagon where Walter and Gertrude were.

If it can be stated that during the fire of Walter Starring experienced in these woods in which while rescuing general Arronburg and where but a few and the general were burned a large portion of the forest fire was said to have struck the big town of Jonesville on the first of September, and the whole town went up in flames, the fire also doing immense damage in the gum plant forests and heading toward the general Mis-Hollister woods close to the boundary line of the Virginia and Angelina States. The fire is no extended that all kinds of transportation is absolutely halted, and the whole country in that region because of the heavy clouds of smoke covering the sky and in twilight darkness since the past three days. However, he extensively other spots in the wooded regions at this section in the north boundary of Angelina State on the Mis-Hollister Run River and elsewhere were threatened by the huge conflagration was not yet known, but it was reported that Evangelina St. Clare was still in danger!

Later--18 eighteen rangers fighting the fire were killed, scores were hurt and thousands of dollars worth of property were ruined by an explosion caused by the forest fire which struck a dynamite plant while sweeping across northwestern Mis-Hollister forests that same day!

The known dead of the rangers were: James Anderson, head man of forest police killed while attempting to put out fire near Cantt. Belton Anderson his brother, Hendrick Gunter, forest ranger also trying to put out fire near shed.

The villages in the path of the fire storm were: Malden City, Penderro, forest Glen, Glendale, Honor, St. Ann and St. Paul. Destruction of many telegraph and telephone poles and wires made it impossible to learn of other towns menaced by the fire. One other ranger was killed when the fire reached the station of another trapping him. His charred body was found half a mile away from where the other rangers were lying dead. Another ranger also died in the ruins of the forest. Six others at this spot were injured. Two other rangers were killed while they were chopping down trees. A surviving ranger was injured or partly burned.

Probably two thousand people were saved by a ranger and to two of his men they rode into one of the burned towns, and warned the people to flee before it was late, and directed others to a large lake just as the fire hurricane struck. The town was consumed and the fire went on. One unidentified man was burned to death but dying a hero. He ran into a lone house when he saw the wall of fire coming and shouted a warning. The occupants managed to flee to the river and reached safety but the farmer or man whatever he was was not able to get away so quickly as he was overtaken, and a falling tree felled him to earth. At the town of Penderro sixteen persons were killed, many were injured, and unusual property damage was caused by two distant explosions that occurred near the village when the fire set off some mysterious blasts. Ten were also killed at St. John and two hundred and sixty injured. The business section of the town was completely wiped out with thirty business buildings, and eight houses demolished by the shock. Many other structures suffered severe damage, but the fire did not reach here, yet it is to be feared that the death list would mount when some communications could be feared with many outlying sections which were in the path of the storm of fire.

At the town near the San Juan forests about twenty million dollars damage was done or caused by the forest fire which struck them early on the morning of September the 1st and late that night as still raging elsewhere. The hurricane of the wind reached its highest strength at the time the fire came up at about 11 o'clock in the morning just before that time, the smoke was so heavy that the people of the town did not see a chance of hardly escaping before a hot rushing wind blowing one hundred and thirty two miles an hour, and roofs of large pieces of wood were carried away by the force of the fire gale.

From what many witnesses claim the force of the fire hurricane might have been at an estimated rate of one hundred and fifty miles an hour, but at the rear of the giant conflagration there was no wind hardly as the sea of flames leaped straight up into the air. Because of so much communications destroyed by the tremendous forest fire scores of large cities were even in darkness and completely isolated from the entire country, and all telegraph and telephone wires and poles hanging down all over and all transportation being stopped now. The extent of the loss of life or injuries among inhabitants was not known. Even river shipping on the waters of town in the path of the fire gale suffered heavy losses for they could not get away and they too were consumed. A freight steamer pulled in at the anchor during the fire storm but was overwhelmed. The roof of a small hotel in the town of St. Helena was carried away by the wind when the forest fire approached the town as also was part of the roof of a I.M.C.A. Hundreds if not thousands of lives in this town suffered either partial or total destruction, and trees by the tens of thousands had been uprooted many of them smashing into homes and falling across streets. Many of the popular trees and pines in the garden of a rich man's palace had been flattened while in the building itself windows and doors were blown in by the wind. As the weather and other bureaus stated that though St. Helena had borne the brunt of the fire hurricane as far as the town is concerned, the fire it was striking a branch in its vicinity would not threaten the town with destruction, but nevertheless all the able bodied citizens men women and even older children girls and boys flocked to the threatened point determined to fight the fire should it come upon the town.

This is one report received by the Bureau of Angelina Agatha--11 Penderro, Sept; 1th 1913. -----The forest fire bureau issued an advisory forest fire warning to night as follows: //

No report to night far west of Angelina Agatha between Dorothy Gale and Wild Junction. However big forest fires central in consuming fury near southwestern

Point of Haldi Junction, moving just now west, and southward, and pass on at near Haldi Junction Chamberlains, and home and Topsy, a few feet morrow morning. Greatest caution and timely a warning given and advised to all in habitants in towns and villages near its path. This is a dangerous forest fire.
Big Haldi burning, a new in flames. Inhabitants in panic as they flee. Inhabitants of Membi, Koley goblin and Angelina Agathia giving warning as said towns also are in grave danger. The Observatory says that Big Girl Knoll and Haldi by the record breaking forest fire, sweeping Chamberlains and Haldi. Observatory officials said that the forest fire warnings had been sent by wireless to many towns in this vicinity but that there was no ground so far for alarm for Haldi Junction or Big Girl Knoll, unless of course the direction of the wind changed.

In this vicinity more than a score of new towns, and a dozen good sized cities in the rich Mic-Hollister gun section were added to the forest fire area to night, as the enormous conflagration swept across a hundred mile stretch of the Mic-Hollister gun toward Melbourne driven forward by a terrific hurricane of hot scorching wind. A wide section was isolated. Danger reports also indicated that the winds were somewhat less severe than those elsewhere but the fire nevertheless was fiercer.

This section of the conflagration had an advancing front extending from below Good heaven, now to above the districts of Swangline St. Clare, and preceding the advancing sea of fire wind waivered from fifty to eighty miles an hour were expected. All wire communications here also were disrupted and the glow of the fire at night could be seen for more than a hundred miles away.

The weakness of the forest fires was added to towns bordering on the State line of Angolia and near the once scene of horror of Lake Belicia, where terrific seas of horses racing fires inundated wide areas of the forested regions like a landslide.
Lava ocean. Most of the towns were in darkness because of broken power lines and the inhabitants were fleeing. Buildings by hundreds were reported to be unroofed or otherwise damaged in Calce, Lake St. Belicia and other smaller places with the conflagration closing in on the town. Big Hedda became isolated when fires went down while city officials were relating to the authorities that a eighty nine mile an hour windstorm hit and scorching and blinding thick fogs of smoke was sweeping the city. Little Hedda had sent no news to the outside world late at night and it is feared she is burning burning. It is reported the heart of this section of the conflagration is raging over the southwestern Herbert County, as far as has been learned there has been no loss of life in this district. Apparently the Apparently the forest fire was more than half way on its course from its starting point to these sections after ravaging a two hundred mile strip along its path last night and early to day, the fire having started in twenty different places.
It is a terrible incident realizing that four or five other big ones are still raging since two months ago and 10,000 smaller ones growing into big conflagrations.
Grave fears were felt for the great Mic-Hollister Run Forest also in the immediate path of this immense fire storm.

One Forest Ranger whose name is Juan Antonio drove or rode a horse fifty miles over almost impassable roads to a small town to warn people of the approach of the fire, and also gave the first report on the destruction wrought by the dangerous forest fire in the city of Little Hedda and the near by ones. His account follows:

Melbourne, September 1th Calvernia State. --A two hundred and fifty mile strip along the Mic-Hollister Run River suffered severely the last two days and also last night and to day from terrific forest fire fires preceded by dreadful hurricane fire winds that left a trail of desolation from the locality of Eva St. Clare Evangeline St. Clare city to Haldi Junction. It is more extended and more destructive than the other big forest fires still raging in southwestern Calvernia. Central Calvernia and elsewhere, and the accompanying wind is violent enough to smash windows unroof houses by the thousands, tear great trees up by the roots, tie knots in telephone and telegraph wires, and threaten these very towns with complete destruction from the advancing fire sea itself.

Joan City suffered an estimated damage of $1,000,000 by wind, for stores windows were blown out by the hundred, roofing of all kinds was stripped off like kindling every telephone and telegraph was put out of commission and telephone and telegraph and street car electric wires strewn over every street. The fire fortunately turned around the town as there was a big fire breach. Fort St. John suffered more than a million dollar damage for thousands upon thousands of roofs were torn off, and the tremendous sea of fire set off set on fire many buildings until a good part of the town was destroyed and debris lay all over the streets. Here there was another heavy sufferer mostly from fire, torn roofs, smashed windows, and signs smashed down and blown away. Only the desperate efforts of the inhabitants have saved the town from total destruction by breaching a good deal before the fire came up.

For twenty minutes the wind was from the direction of the approaching fire exceeding one hundred and thirty miles an hour. The fire was catching the trees said to be at the rate of a thousand a second or more.

1500
423 have been able to save her. As she went with Angelina 'ichee along the river she noticed that in the skirt another smudge had formed from the heat. Fearfully she tried to get out of enlarging the hole.
"I'm not too far off yet or the heat might singe your body," said Angelina.

"Really would it now?" asked the little girl. "Why it will kill me if the dress burns."

"But you must not just the same," said 'ichee.
"My net!" asked the child as she held a real little girl, and questioning an older before she knew what it meant.
"You mustn't because otherwise you cannot bear the heat on your skin," repeated Angelina 'ichee.

As she looked about her anxiously. Still she did not understand for it seemed to her the fire was going down still more, or some minutes Angelina 'ichee tried to explain the actions of a forest fire is treacherous.

"But the fire is not so bad now here," the child persisted.
Angelina 'ichee then made an effort which wrinkled her brow. She did not know for sure whether the fire was going down or not, but no signs about showed any such thing.
Her memory helped her, she pointed to the frock, to the tear and shook her head.

"If we all spoil our clothes then we will have to run around the gods naked for days and the soldiers won't like it," she added.

"The soldier's soldier's won't like it?" asked the child looking puzzled.
"No," said Angelina 'ichee. "It's nothing though if you are on fire like the rest have and cannot be blamed. But your dress don't burn so quick as you must not tear it unless you have to." And she pointed vaguely to the burning trees and brush about a hundred yards away to their right. This little girl felt a remote fear of the fire, and as she looked she suddenly tripped on a stone and her little white legs sprang up in the air.

It would be very strange to detail at too great a length the few days of flight that continued. The cries for their mothers which had been common on the first experience of the flight from the fire now ceased to be uttered, for during the flight the time passed swiftly as it does during terror and confusion.

They had gone far from the stretch of fire by reaching where the wind blew either direction, they were alone in the woods, without shelter, without regular sleep or meals, without orders, and without regular bedtime. They were not happy, they found fruit or fresh cold water, under the trees the rough dry grass was harsh.

Quickly they began to hope they were out of peril and would reach some Christian city by and by. When they did dare to lie down to sleep they would dream of their comrades, of their parents, of Benard, and Islet and her sisters, a army cut, the faces of their beloved relatives, brother -- brothers and sisters bending over them. It conveyed nothing to make them happy. It was the cruel effects of dreams. The strange appearance of a member's mother correspondence corresponded with their clothes. It seemed they were brought from heaven by the fire so hard did they feel, and as the fire was very extensive at night even come here they realized they must find the Christian lines or die.

In perilous conditions, and the constant menace of falling trees caused the child-at times to scatter apart, though the majority of the children were real Abbeonians the predominant language among the children was not that of Abbeonians, because the majority of the children had been so often among Angelinians. Only a little over half the children spoke Abbeonian, there was a strong Angelinian contingent, there were six Abbeonians, ten little Abbeonians, whom no one thought they could understand. One of the children may gain an idea from the following conversation which took place on the second day between Angelina 'ichee and the little Abbeonian girl, Francis. They talked along for a while, inspecting each other shyly, as new children will. Then the child began to sing. I stepped on a burning pile of rubbish, and I've hurt my foot."

"My foot is singed. I stepped on a burning pile of rubbish, and I've hurt my foot," said Angelina 'ichee, with her blue eyes looking intently at her.

"I did not see it when I was running and walked right into it. That's how I hurt my foot," Francis repeated pointing to her foot which was red and swollen and also blistered.
"You don't you do something for it?" asked Angelina 'ichee.
"I have lost all our supplies," said Francis. "I cannot do anything for my foot."

"I did not," said Angelina. "We are all in the same fix, burned and singed, and sick and died. I also hurt my foot and have to lie up. This is a nice mess we are in!"
This makes me hate the Angelinians all the more," said Francis.

Most of the conversation had become impossible, because of the heat and smoke, but a little later when both little girls during the continued flight were sitting down a hollow with one of the boy scouts whose name was Jose, a little Abbeonian boy, he stubbed his foot on a stone and fell. He hurt it quite badly but nevertheless he bravely held back his tears, and Angelina 'ichee herself suddenly suggested that she should kiss his foot to make it well, but the lad was too bashful to allow her to do so, and the little girl influenced with amaranth zeal, asked him if his foot hurt him very much. Upon this Jose gained the impression that she had been a sort of little

424

But now they were fleeing before a world of infernoes, they had no swift conveyances to help them along, and through in their minds the idea of flight from woods to woods survived. Seeing no soldiers, no dangers and the like they were discouraged, to some from fear and suffering shapes of trees and other objects and even clouds of smoke became blurred, so that within a few hours they imagined they saw evil creatures in the shape of fire approaching after them, creatures neither shaped like man nor beast.

Angeline Picheu tried singing but it did not cheer any one. As no impressions came to survive, and especially to strengthen the faith and courage of the children, they weakened because of the increasing peril all around. They were frightened by the mere shadows of moving tree tops, they developed more complicated ideas of dangerous things, and were inspired to new fear by the apparent shun of such objects in fire, and they feared they were in the "bad place" already.

One important column of the fugitive lives comprised those led by three boys, three good looking little boys, of an inquiring but quick turn of mind, and not at all inclined to desert even girls. So you may imagine a scene which might be denied by even the forest rangers. The three were beating their way through brush and grass. Donia being the strongest was leading the way along the banks of the river, while the other two boys followed behind thirty of the girls.

A little one of the boys clambered up a small rise of ground, and the others followed him.

girl, with blue eyes and a prettily formed mouth, and she wished to accompany them. Another of the bunch was led by Juan Arantit, a very thin dark tall and bony little girl, already downy on the arms and legs, her face by the Mandolinian face she was a very tempestuous, ill natured child, and when rebels had seized her to stab her strangle her she had fought with her finger nails and teeth if not with weapons. It otherwise she was good to her friends of her own cause, and little

Francis, impressed by strength and resolution had joined her aqua squad. Had they all been a little older, they might have accomplished their flight much better, but since they could not do this, they kept close to the better ones. Usually came Angelina, Alice and the rest. She represented almost the very spirit of the vivian girls. Time passed and the child refugees were still unhappy enough, fighting for their lives and not yet aware of enemies or fresh perils. Yet during this flight, flight on the land seven more of the children had died overcome by heat and smoke, or some out of weakness and fatigue, some under a blow from a falling branch, and one was lost in the forest and never found again. Finally since it was boys and not girls whom death took so easily the number was reduced to fifty nine, of whom twenty four were boys, and thirty five girls. The death of so many of their comrades greatly impressed them. They were no longer even able to conceive the pain of dissolution, they realized that a few hours before, one of their fellows was, and now was not. Yet they had no time to take

They were waiting now for the initiative.
So far at least a quarter of an hour they looked curiously over the gun wale, constant ly being carried on along the shore by the water. At last however the boat grounded for the first time and at this point some of the fires had gone down so that the shore was walled in the dark. The smoke was high mingled with shoots of flame now and then. Even sometimes the dense smoke rising high and flames were now pointing at the strange sight of this large white smoke and flames. After some hesitation a small girl almost timidly climbed out of the boat, jumped on the hot sand, and went slowly toward the shore. She was smoking for curiosity. This daring landing was effected by a girl scout whose name was Winnie Allen. She was at the moment like a white cat except for her shoes on her feet.

The only draw as near to the wall of fire and smoke as the boat allowed, yet little's example had spread so quickly that the children were gradually climbing out of the boat for as it seemed the fire had burned down somewhat there would be more safety even here than on the river. Falling trees hurled sparks and embers over them, and some trees falling into the water drenched them with hot spray, but yet they all boldly clambered upon the sand, and watched with gasping breath. Only ten children stayed on the boat in awkward positions, lying twisted or face down, these had died from the effects of the slow suffocation, and from burns and scalds, and four were girls, the girls showing in time of trial the stamina which is always theirs.

showing in time of trial the stamina which is always theirs.

The sandy beach of the river rose steeply toward the forest fire. Indeed the whole shore was a wall of cloud and fire. Along the steaming beach of the river the children edged their way, many forgetting for the moment their hunger and thirst, and looking out for falling trees and burning rubbish. They were on the north bend of the river which was now a smoking seething hell, a inferno so fatal that if the children had gone any closer they would have been singed to death from the heat, and the land on which the children found themselves was a pen., and in fact a long stretch of burned woods lay across the northern point toward which the fire was not traveling but the children did not notice this. Had the children been able to see through the dense smoke, they would have discovered this avenue of safety and pure air. Yet the children did not struggle close to the fire for hunger and thirst and more suffering came upon them.

They clung closer to each other than ever, and now they felt as if they would give anything to see the friendly Christian lines again. The heat of the fire sent at them so severe gusts that it would have slain any child if they went closer. They were urged to the river, where at once they were lying flat out of reach of it. In drinking deeply of the hot water, but keeping their heads and bodies out of reach of it. Now in this hot moist air, the whole forest was indeed a place of carnage, a fight between forests and fire. The hillsides outside of the sight of the children were blazing smoking volcanoes.

the children were blazing smoking volcano.
However and though the river was thickly lined with the burning and burned trees, the rest of the children might still have died of the heat, if they had not kept on away from the e.g. edge of the fire. As they went on they watched the relentless smoke half frightened of it, then another big tree crashed down in their very midst, and the children had much difficulty in preventing themselves from being burned. One of the little girls screamed as her rag & dress blazed up but the little boy ran toward her. He had much difficulty in tearing off the burning dress but he was a dogged little boy, and tugged with both hands at the burning cloth, and at last pulled off a large portion of it. The others followed him, the dress was torn off and left lying, and the little girl stood there completely naked but they could not help help it it was better that way, than be burned to death, when ever another tree threatened to fall toward them there was an absurd jostling, and a pushing of each other to get each other out of the way, for the children escaped from hell it seemed, were still fugitives. Another died from the heat, adding his name to the roll of dead.
As much did their clothing burn off that they had been compelled to tear off much so that all were half or completely naked by this time. Yet one little girl who still was much more completely naked than the others was wearing a burned brown linen frock. Though it had been burned several times it had not yet occurred to her to remove it, and probably she would have succeeded. In fact the buckle was so firmly set that it was difficult to suggest she would have been burned to death and no one would

'My name's Francis.' 'What's your name?'

Then as luck would have it because of the collision with the burning launch the boat again almost grounded on the shore, and a tree which had burned through just at that moment fell with a crash right upon the middle of the boat. At once the children were smothered by the heat of the burning embers, but without a word the strong red headed boy yelled to some of the other boys, and they were quickly looked in combat with the burning trunk, while seeing them so desperately employed, the other children to save themselves and the boat also threw themselves upon the tree, the little boat was a scene of battle against fire, and the danger of being thrown into the scalding water where neither sex nor weakness even appealed. They were in desperate peril, they were even reached over the age of eight, and yet already they were like men and women saddened by the perils of life. It was this rush that saved the boat, for so many pitched upon the burning log, managed at last to roll it off from the boat, and it fell with a mighty splash into the water and with a loud hiss the fire in the trunk was quenched, several of the boys and seven girls had their lips, torn, their clothing half burned from their bodies, charcoal and even partly burned. One girl had a bad gash on her abdomen and chest from a sharp point of a burning branch and forgot in the peril and excitement the boy attended to their injuries and burned as much as he could. Then they had to get out about the water and no sooner had this been accomplished when another tree fell and caught the two children under it killing them instantly. They could not even get to them so fierce was the heat and as the boat again drifted on into the hot atmosphere.

rom From over the gunwale of the boat a row of small touselled heads peered at the land which seemed new to them - safty now, since they first secured the boat all had been a mass of fire on both sides of the river and to the children the peril had appeared more sudden than it would have been to an adult for they had been taught about perils and therefore knew their situation. Many were still crying conscious of their thirst. They had tried to drink the river water but had no cut or anything to scoop it and to use their hands was impossible for the heat of the water was growing worse. Of these was little Francis who was weeping persistently, only knowing that she was thirsty, and unable to conceive the future as to her safty. The winds which had sent the flames in long stretches across the river had by degrees ceased blowing, and now had almost fallen, thus allowing the flames from either shore to rise to a astonishing er it was dawn or night. The disaster had happened to them suddenly and they could not tell when it rose and fell in the steaming hot waters. The terror of the children, their bewilderment continued, and the restlessness of their experience wanted them to take them more when which they could hardly do in this boat they were so closely packed. They wriggled on the thwarts to escape the fierce heat of fire and water, and they pressed close to each other, and once in a while a child would start to cry anew, and cry for Panrod, or Violet and her sisters. Yet there was no one to still their tears.

men, as there was no food, or drinking water, and as they were terribly exhausted, little by little they fell asleep inspite of the perils all around, except two or three, and especially Angelina. These, who prayed persistently for the safety of the trip down the raging hot river. One of them however could sleep soundly because of the heat and suffocating conditions of the atmosphere, and they again awakened and this time racked humanity began to move. Most of the children already felt ravished but there was no food for them there. Among the childescote thus. In such peril was a small boy scout named Art, about the age of eight, yet a boy quite tall for his age, very stout, stout, with black hair, white skin and had deep blue eyes fringed with black. He was among the most reckless because of the heat and smoke, and because of this pushed frequently against a girl of his own age, who with three others shared his thwart. She was a pretty child, having dark brown eyes and a mass of heavy dark hair. She was sad and sticky with the river water, and she was almost naked so much of her clothing had been torn or burned from her. He observed that he suffered more than she. He did upon which the little girl placed her arm around his neck and tried to console him. Of course the little boy roddened, but nevertheless he felt grateful and in a moment had his arms in a tight hug.

"You are a good boy," said the little girl. "I'll tell Penrod you were good to me."

41 however with curious persistence, being only so the little boy strove again for more fish, while those who had secured their their mouths. The little fair girl noticed this, and a sudden animation came to her face. "please get me a wish," she wailed. "i'm hungry."

at even at the risk of becoming too noisy,

Now when the child scouts had been so suddenly surprised by the tremendous wall of fire sweeping upon them, they came upon the banks of the river. One leaped into the water and started to swim across, though heaved up and back and forth and onward and pounded and pulled at by the raging currents. One of them desperately swam against the troughs of the waves, which dashed them back and forth, and trying to carry them under. Some succeeded in getting to the middle of the stream, but at every pull of the current after every rush and dash of the wild waves, the children grew more tired and weaker in their struggles, and some already were drowned. Others had secured a big boat which was beached on the shore and pushed out. It was indeed a most terrific scene under the flame-robed sky of the "le-lester" river, a sky thick and hellish as if with the roof of hell with smoke and long streaks of flames, and roaring with the most tempest, flamed and clouded with plumed clouds of fire and sparks. As the boat was pushed off and careless at that the flames rose in floods from the trees on even the opposite shore, and poured across the sky in parching hot sheets, and about the shore they just fled from the fire curled in rage of appetite, forming immense far reaching tongues, and great blood red maws, and running wildly along the shore in lines and lines of far reaching waves, roaring and hissing, and casting a veil of white and pink smoke over the terrified child fugitives. Their clothing was smoking, and to the scream of the frightful hot wind, and the pounding of the waves produced by the river current joined the shrill cry of escaping steam as if some small stream shrieked in its last agony before boiling out of existence. One of the little girls put her hand in the water and drew it quickly out. It was getting hot too. "I'm rose to the surface dead and I increased in number, one of those swimming in the water were close by and were helped into the big boat but others could not reach it and drowned or got to the opposite shore only to probably perish in the flames there. Mildred and Angeline Riches were in the boat. Yet upon this atom so near awful eternity the child scout's scouts struggled for existence, clinging to the gunwales of the boat, and lying low so as to ward the heat of the flames. They were being dragged close to the shore again, and one of the tall trees gave way, and struck the boat, almost upsetting it and hurling blazing leaves and limbs along of all of them. The boat then rolled off and disappeared reduced to a black swimming object, which slowly hissed itself out, and then went out.

Some of the little girls especially had their clothing set on fire, and their voices of fear and horror were heard about above the shouts of the boys. Several of the boys saved the girls by the hair, dragged them to the bottom of the boat, and with wet clothes slapped the flames as hard and as fast as they could. They then fell together locked upon the bottom of the boat the boys for a while fighting the burning dresses ferociously, and were victorious at last.

"We will have to keep away from the shore or something will happen to us yet" said one of the little boys whose coat smoldered from the fight.

"But you saved us," said one of the little girls. "I'll tell Phred when he sees him again that you are a hero."

There was crying among some of the other terrified children, but only a little crying, and they kept low on the bottom of the boat, and another tree almost fell upon the boat as it threatened to go aground on the shore, and the children every one of them were covered with a shower of spark but not otherwise injured. Above all the voice of M Angeline Riches was heard giving commands to the rest. Almost grounded at the shore the boat found itself at the apex of the fires assault. From the shore the flames were rising like a great wall, which were burning all the trees, and which flooded the sky with tongues and clouds of fire. Almost simultaneously while these big waves of flame soared skyward there by hundreds were menacing the boat as it floated on so close. As the boat almost grounded the trees fell again close by. It seemed as if from contrast scalding hot water and leaping flames fought for the possession of the boat and its small occupants each intent on destroying. A sort of panic quiet invaded the hideousness of the scene for none of these children had ever witnessed a forest fire of such fury before and struggling with conditions that became rapidly more terrible they did not know what to do and gave themselves up for lost. Death too was busy in the boat, and as some died in the boat from the heat, and as they feared to keep those in the boat they were cast into the hot water.

There were in this big boat a hundred and thirty children and only ten of them boys and the rest girls, two thirds of these under the age of even six and eight, and it seemed impossible indeed that these children could have ever survived the terrible experiences they were to go through. The elder children of whom there were eighty six, took care of the more frightened younger ones. Though the boat finally made for deeper water once more and though the boat was old it was strong and it managed to get caught in the full current of the river and set out northward toward the direction of one or the Christian camps so far away where they could be in safety and whence help would come. The boat continued on down the street in the face of the fiery inferno with the terrified, half scorched, suffocated children, with dead fishes floating all about them, yet forced onward by the current. Then came another threatened disaster, the boat struck a hidden rock, and a seam was almost parted, and the scene in that lurid firey inferno as boded to bury, and were forced to leave them in the path of the fire, without fear for just now death seemed nothing to them. The survivors were all entirely naked at this time, since their clothes had long before been left upon branches of branches, or discarded because they were smoking and smoldering. From the heat of the sphere their skins varied from a lobster to a pale brown color. Sometimes because the heat they were inclined to languor but a vertiginous Angeline Riches allowed no one to stop, and only when it was safe were they able to halt and sleep for a few hours. Then they only sleep lightly as if they apprehended the enemy or the close approach of the fire. The constant coming together of Francis and Angeline Riches had been a thing because of their a haste to move. Some of the boys were with Angeline Riches, in this country boys never despised little girls, neither did girls have any hatred for the boys. Though neither had reached yet the age of ten, their points of view as to the peril was clear, and they were on good terms. Especially this incident had impressed all the boys and girls upon each other as dearest friends and comrades, and nothing could have so separated them just now.

Joe followed alongside of Angeline Riches, and when the company had to get from sheer fatigue and from hungry hunger, the boy and girl sat side by side at some time, behaving as children do. Across the river far off they saw another lot of trees go up in a surge of golden flames, and made a bright light. Yet despite a burning smothering heat these two children sitting there made a spectacle touching quite primitive. Both had well formed long legs, both tanned to natural brown. These naked children sat carelessly side by side, their elbows touching, their hands forming feelings and thoughts. They sat watching the flames in the distance, but with a certain amount of regret. After a short time he rose to his feet, and as a cry. Angeline Riches understood the peril, and with common accord both child giving commands to the rest started forward. When a li new took advantage of the position of the ground, working their way through grass and weeds less than three feet high, and here felt secure from the fire if it did not head this way. Then "see an" and Angeline Riches looked into each others faces seriously, and there formed in their minds a combat fit for the disposal of empires. They both were determined to get the lot of the woods out of the woods safe and sound. However she noticed that Jess looked a little discomfited, for after a moment she said:

"Let's head north-west."

The boy gravely nodded his head, and both started forward again, and went aimlessly. For a while to plan something desperate desperate. Yet during flight the companionship of this boy and girl was sweet.

"Shall we stop under these trees and rest," said "Iches." "It is so hot. I don't like it when it is so hot do you Jess?"

"But the forest fire makes it so hot," said Jess. "And we have had no day time for weeks."

"Wonder why the fire keeps burning so long?" said Angeline.

"I don't know," said Jess.

They pondered this problem for a moment happily equal in their ignorance. The suddenly

Angeline said:

"I think I hear something. No noise that warns me of peril. I wonder if there are other fires trying to head us off."

"I'm afraid so," said Angeline. "For I can hear the noise too."

They knitted their brows, trying to guess the real cause of the noise, but their attention finally wandered.

"But do you really think it is?" said Angeline.

"I don't know, but I don't like the noise," said Jess. "Do you think the fire is working around us?"

"Yes I'm afraid it is," said the girl with a little fear in her voice.

"Let's hope we are a little mistaken," said the boy. "If it does we are surely lost, for our escape will be cut off. We must find some way out."

Angeline Riches looked at him with admiration. They went onward through the sea of trees, while some of their companions were already disappearing, or running for trees to tree. For a moment at times you could see a little head where corn colored hair rippled, another head hardly more male, crowned with blacker hair, red lips as if gasping, and pass among the foliage so fast that only the flash of a white eye, and a humbly nimble little limb was seen. It was as if the satyrs pursued the boys, or the nymphs the satyrs. It came again that while the majority of them were again trying to sleep, that one of those who went on guard duty observed far in their left that the far far distant wild running forest fire, was surging toward them in an oblique manner. He gazed intently at it with the new scene, and also used his sense of smell. For a moment he stared at this new terrifying scene, with the caution of a startled beast. Then convinced the fire was working around him and his followers, and seeing no one conscious of it, he yelled and screamed as loudly as he could to give the alarm.

They were all aroused and were surprised and horrified to observe the movement of the conflagration. Angeline Riches had thought from the noise she had heard that it might happen, and she became more apprehensive than ever.

Indeed the flames spread quickly, and it was a miracle to see the flames a burn this much speed and yet it was evident that these children needed suffering and peril to bring them closer. Angelina's boy friend was closer to her that day and were watching the flames, which now had run over a large portion of the forest to their left, because for reasons not known to them—it burned so swiftly, Jones was just as troubled by this as Angelina was, for the fire was fiercer than ever.

"There is it going!" he asked the girl.
"I do not know," she said. "Then she saw tears in his eyes."
"It is no use to cry over it," she said.

"I'm not going to cry," the boy replied angrily. But he did not resist when she patted his shoulder, with a rough well meaning little hand. Then they started for a new direction in headlong flight.

Yet it was at that moment, that a big tree which had been displaced from its roots by a ground fire growing near it began to topple over, and before any one could even try to avoid it it crashed down and caught Ann Angelina's feet beneath it. At once a large number of the boys and girls leaped toward the tree, and together they pulled at it with all their might trying to get it away from the girl who though not hurt was held down by it, some of the others who had halted watched them without offering aid, as those who were bewildered by the accident usually do. After a while the weight and size of the tree proved too great for the boys, and they had to desist to resume a momentary rest, some of the other boys who had gone on ahead and who had been attracted by the scene came up now, and they proposed to join in helping to raise the big tree so she could get out from under, though of course the girl was not much hurt, but merely surprised and shaken, and as the others still watched them at their efforts they were called over to come and help. While all were thus striving one of the branches struck the girl in the cheek cheek, which caused her to yell with pain, and a trickle of blood ran down her face. Perhaps it was her cry that made them all strive with greater effort, but when she saw blood upon Ritchie's cheek, he first broke off all the branches closest to her, and then they all flung themselves a little harder at the tree. If they had been men they would have succeeded very quickly, but but at last, Angelina's face, screaming with pain, her face bleeding, was pulled out from under.

A moment more Angelina's face was stuck staunching with her hand and the blood which flowed from her cheek, and Jones breathing heavily, his legs trembling, his chest heaving up and down from taking deep breaths, his eyes full of tears watched her. He was exhausted from his efforts and so were the rest, at he had strove the fiercest and therefore for several minutes his body was numb. All his strength seemed to have gone into this furious effort against the tree. Yet Angelina's face still seemed to be thinking for a moment only of her scratched and torn cheek as he watched her, as his heart ceased to beat so fast and his gasping was arrested, fear gave place to a disagreeable emotion created by this trickle of blood. It was more than pity but he did not know it.

So after a moment he came toward her, put his arms around her shoulders, and with a piece of cloth wetted by a stream washed the cheek where the blood flowed, unable to express what he felt, yet as she felt his arms around her, she cried less then she ceased altogether. He laid her head upon his shoulder, and so for a moment they stood embraced, two little figures, both comforted because they were happy again. Omitting something of the misery of the girl and all the other scouts must have taken some effect upon any of the stranger boy scouts. Jones indeed was surprised by the response of the little girl. For it can be said that when Angelina's face felt about her the grip of a stronger and comforting hand, she felt more braver than, and then stopped her sobbing.

Then happened something very pathetic. As if animated by some outer force of friendship, and even even love, Angelina too placed her arm around him, and so remained walking on as if she begged him to release him from the dreadful horrors of those woods. It disturbed the boys mind to see her so distressed, and the others watched somewhat puzzled. Her legs were zebraed with blinding scratches, her yellow hair stained and matted. Yet they did not know that at this very moment a big christian camp was very close by.

HOW THEY ESCAPE FROM PURSUING GANDELINIAN SOLDIERS, AND THE FOREST FIRES.....

THUS ON THE FOLLOWING NIGHT when the lost party had halted for a very needed rest, and when Penrod boys obeyed him well, when all had come up to him to find out his further orders, when he made sure that every girl or boy scout was properly armed, when he had organized them all once more and given command to Radcliffe he said to the latter. "The flames in the distance are getting higher and nearer and the smoke clouds are increasing. If we do nothing the fire will be master of all. There are even big brush fires ahead of us which we'll have to fight our way through."

Therefore by Penrod's orders and suggestions the half naked party of girl and boy scouts continued on and now proceeded downhill for about a mile through a dense portion of the woods each boy finding his way as noiselessly as he could until at last they came within view of one of the big brush fires that was started from sparks and which was spreading in their direction. All was as still as death here, and not even a night bird called while the long lines of ground fire smoked and sputtered as it burned the brush and high grass.

"Forward, attack the fire!" growled Radcliffe. Then for a moment could be seen running toward the fire in a long straight line the one hundred lads, and sixty brave girls each one having some sort of weapon. Radcliffe running at some distance in front. At his word the straight line took a southern slant so as to draw parallel with the line of fire which barred their way along the stream toward the direction of the christian camps. The barefoot were almost noiseless in these still woods, and there was no metal to clink thus it was a line of human child ghosts as it seemed running toward the brush fire. Releasing a general shout they all flung themselves upon the fire as best as they knew how and as safe as possible. Those who had wet cloths or wetbaths which they usually carried struck blindly at the flames there were moments of fire conflicts but the flames were gaining the mastery, they rose up, and burned forward in the face of its antagonist almost catching them in its hot tongues, making them fight in a grapple more deadly than that with a human enemy, mingled with the cries of those who had been slightly burned, and the crash of falling brush. Outside of the fire line some of them were rushing back in despair for they had lost control of the fire and all fled in the darkness. The flames went burning on lighting up the darkness.

If Penrod had been able to keep control of some of his troop the final battle against these flames would have been won in the first ten minutes, but Radcliffe and his lads in their madness were engaged with their part of the fire in a fight that lasted a long time, a fight where small pick axes and blows of wet rags and the like fell upon the burning brush without seeming to daunt so great a ferocity as that of the leaping flames.

There in the midst of the strife the lads had almost lost their heads and given way to instinct. Instead of fighting they were now withdrawing in panic and as Penrod and his gang of fugitive scouts drew near the scene of conflict, a long burning brush confronted them while screaming and half burned girls were being dragged away before they were burned too badly each boy conducting one by her naked arm. Radcliffe had lost only one boy who had been overcome by the flames and all had to retreat before the flames unable to resist it any further. The eyes of Radcliffe were full of shame, while Penrod raging at his side could only withdraw his own. If the flames had advanced any faster than they really did they would have overtaken the whole party and burned them burned them all to death. But the lads and girls were full of lively strength, they were not scared but amused and laughed as they withdrew, telling themselves that they had cut the fire in two nevertheless. So at last when they had cut the flames Penrod and his followers stopped to regain their breath, where the wailing of the injured girls and the angry cries of some of the boys arose. Five girls all under the age of ten had been snatched away from death in the nick of time. One boy was a dying having been fatally burned, wounds too from briars appeared upon the heads and bodies of both boys and girls one girl of whom had been killed by a falling tree which she had not escaped on time.

Then came the final humiliation of the lost boy and girl scouts. While they were grouped about attending the wounded, some one lay hidden behind some big tree and then it rone, with the supreme insolence of the strong a lone Gandelinian scout had stayed hidden behind this tree listening with amusement to the cries and tears, and then he walked past the group of scouts who were too paralyzed by surprise to cry out until he had drawn away. Penrod collected a few boys and bid them to come with him and make a prisoner of the rebel but they could not attack him for he withdrew slowly turning round every few paces and steady with his hand a long knife which he had drawn, from his side.

He had long flowing red hair there was blood upon his uniform and a smile upon his lips which caused the little party though armed themselves to follow him full of desire to either make him their captive or shoot him down, yet not daring to. They followed him until they reached a group of slowly burning pine trees. There he suddenly picked up a stone and flung it so that it struck one of the boys upon the jaw knocking him unconscious to the ground. Then defiantly shouting one of the Glandelinian war songs he disappeared among the trees.

A heavy sadness brooded through all that night of disaster upon the boy and girl scouts lost so long and fugitives amid a burning wood, tormented by fire and enemy and facing hunger and privations. There were complaints of the wounded and slightly burned and foolish efforts to make clothing out of leaves. The boys and girls also feared that a large force of the enemy could have overtaken them and catch them in the flank or in the rear and destroying them all. They were suffering amid one of the greatest disasters of the war, having no sense of direction, the greatest sign of chaos reigning and the flight only continued. The main trouble for the child scouts in the attempt of fighting through the flames was they now were devoid of clothing and if the flames rushing on victorious had not changed course and spread in another direction, it would have driven the boy and girl scouts clear out of their way entirely and probably all would have perished.

Two hours later Radcliffe and Penrod, exhausted by so much running halted for a time and Radcliffe said:

"Whatever has happened to us now must never happen again."

"It must not indeed" said Penrod.

"But how can we get out of these miserable woods?" said Radcliffe. "We cannot now rest and tell ourselves that the pursuing or shadowing Glandelinians are content with all the evil they have done. They will come at us again when they see the chance."

They planned together as they continued on for nearly three hours and decided that all the boys besides carrying their pistols and cartridge belts must also carry other long weapons and so most of the onward trip for them, hardly stopped while they worked was spent in making crude long weapons out of branches of trees by means of cutting with their hunting knives girls and boys likewise arming themselves and making axes with pieces of stone which they picked up somewhat sharp. Thus the two hundred and forty remaining child scouts had somehow been extra way armed in case of hand to hand fight with the foe. Jennie alone had not armed herself for she looked upon all fighting with horror, but she was warned that she needed a weapon also or no one could save her, and Penrod made her a long spear.

Yet Jennie for a time refused to bear arms though she was strong for her eight years and Penrod who spoke with her thoughtfully held his chin for it did not occur to him that she might give in.

Finally three days and nights more had passed and this mob of boys and girls armed as they themselves fancied advanced northward boys and girls being mixed making a moving throng of half naked children shouldering each other, laughing sometimes, realizing not at all the dreadful times they still were to have, but anxious to find their way back to the Christian camps. Some carried axes, or wet boughs will filled with stones others had improvised spears, and there were no leaders except Penrod and his friend. Suddenly they saw bushes moving and Penrod tried to persuade the boys and girls to spread somewhat not to march or run in untidy clumps which the trees broke up. They obeyed, some going in single file as others ordered some two by two, some in groups and already many scattered upon the wings walking on, or stopping to pick berries on the way side or to shoot game.

Meanwhile the fugitives were still followed by wary Glandelinians maintaining a constant watch upon the movements and doings of the child scouts. Also Glandelinian scouts had reported much and so when it was the plan of the scouts to go through the safest part of the forest fire it was in fact according to the plan of the shadowing Glandelinians. That morning of the next day runners had brought to the leaders of the pursuers an exact account of their number and direction, also about the flanks of the retreating scout column, scouts who knew the best thing, but Penrod knew all the time the exact line of the rebel advance and from time to time had detached boys to watch what comes and come back and report. Thus as the sun rose higher, Radcliffe was able to determine the movement and disposed of twenty nine boys against a force of thirty, also among the twenty nine were eleven girls not too well assured of their courage. Again there was arrayed against the Glandelinians the righteous wrath of girl and boy scouts thus the odds which the young boy scout generals encountered were high enough, and to these was added the disposition of the rebel commander.

As Penrod considered Radcliffe as he experienced the delight of his ways which caused him to be called "The Battlesnake" he felt rather than thought that the enemy was less dangerous than his scouts. So he said:

"What shall we do Rad since the enemy is so near."

"Let the Glandelinians be near" said Radcliffe sulkily. "If they come nearer and we get the best of them we'll slay them all."

"But Radcliffe you must not remain here long. It is dangerous. Come now, you know your part. Time is pressing!"

"Dangerous" said the lad. "That's a foolish speech. None of the Glandelinians are dangerous to me. Let them come, I will not waste time going to them. I'm waiting the chance chance to prove my nickname. I know the situation is desperate and that within an hour the enemy will arrive within sight, but how do you know whether we can even then avail against their numbers and ferocity. Only order could do that. But then it won't do for me to sit where I am or every one will think I am a coward. We are only kids but we have to be brave, we must not let the enemy find us unprepared in their path."

The force of boy and girl scouts was now divided. Seventy were placed under Radcliffe and remained hidden behind trees and stumps but in the path of the pursuers. Its instructions were to maintain its position, to give way if required, to a small extent, but in no circumstances to advance. Penrod's object was to engage with the rest the whole force of the pursuers in the rear. Meanwhile while the skirmish developed upon his own chosen front the remaining girl scouts would have marched a short distance to the west then silently descend a hill, then when they were assured the forces of the relentless pursuers were completely engaged with the "Battlesnake" they would fall upon the enemy's flank and rear and thus cast the Glandelinians into such a disarray, that the survivors would flee or be destroyed.

Only one thing did Penrod have some fear about and that was the persistence of Radcliffe. For he feared that instead of standing ground he would advance, and counter attack so swiftly and gallantly that the Glandelinians would be repulsed, and that when at last the moment came for the flanking force of girl and boy scouts to deliver their attack the they would fall upon the empty air, while the rebels retired hardly with a single loss and then they would prove too strong in my numbers to be driven back.

"You will promise to remember please had not to advance" he said again and again. "You promised me. You said you will not advance? Radcliffe promise me. You are so reckless at times that I fear for your bravery. Promise me that in the heart of the battle you will be careful!"

For Penrod feared Radcliffe too much to abandon him to his passions and he intended to command the forces of scouts as well as he could, keeping touch with James forces as well as call by means of two girls who would serve as messengers. He hoped to be able to control Radcliffe and to prevent his onslaught, while fixing the moment of the attack by those under James. Thus every moment the forest battle was expected to develop and one after another the flanking sentries ran panting up to Penrod announcing that the enemy lay now about a quarter of a mile distant. Quick as Penrod passed among his boys detailing those whom he had chosen to advance, and ordering James to march westward.

"When you have gone as far that the enemy cannot see you then James you will surely be far enough. Then wait until one of my messengers comes and bid you strike."

James party left, carrying no spears, but only their pistols since their rush must be swift and their conflict at close quarters. Meanwhile the central force under Radcliffe was lined up elbows touching each girl or boy with a long lance ready, and having also a wooden spear, but these were to be used in a hand to hand fight. The first conflict would be with pistol firing. With a beating heart, penrod as he paced up and down behind his line heard the breaking of branches and the voices of the enemy. He could still see the red hair of Radcliffe taller than any of his boy or girl scouts moving from side to side as he half lay in the front of the line behind a high stump with pistol drawn, and Penrod prayed:

"Oh Dear Blessed Lord Thou who art the Father and God of us all, stand with us your suffering children now, pursued by fire, suffering privations and in the bargain persecuted by ruthless enemies. It is they who cause the blood of so many helpless children to flow into the earth. And send if Thou wilt your plagues of fear into the hearts of the wicked enemy making them as flying deer. Oh" said by Thy faithful child scouts and their love shall continue to rise up to Thee as the smoke of the camp fires of the National armies whom we are so long seeking. Oh God Lord of battle, stand by us poor kids now."

His voice was strangled in his throat for he was afraid, he the general of all boy and girl scouts that a disaster might occur and now through the trees he could see the faces of the Glandelinians and their uniforms. They came closer not perceiving the boy or girl scouts, closer still, white faces and gray uniforms and back hats, groups lined up, and single soldiers. Radcliffe in his excitement raised the arm which had the pistol in hand and only just in time did Penrod catch it.

"W! Wait Radcliffe. Wait do not waste your shots. We are short enough in ammunition already as it is."

At that moment the Glandelinians had come into the clearing and suddenly perceived the waiting scouts. There was a moment of confusion, followed by utter silence, and hesitation could be observed in their ranks. The line of boy and girl scouts in their regular formation blocking the way with pistols drawn, motionless and forbidding made a picture which by its immobility would have daunted practiced troops. Troops.

But the Glandelinians started forward firing as they did so.

"Give them a volley," shouted Penrod. "Aim good and do not miss a single shot."

And at this command the pistols were opened on the enemy, and as many were struck as there were boys or girls and screams arose from the wounded, a second a third volley was delivered causing the rebels confusion still more. Then Radcliffe sank upon one knee and the doubtfully advancing line of the enemy paused, daunted by the phalanx of spearmen as they were who silently awaited their onrush while reloading their pistols. Then there was a pause at which the child force and the enemy soldiery considered each other.

On " shouted the glandelinian leader, leaping from the front rank and waving his sabre. " Are ye afraid of young kids?"

" Wait of wait do not counter attack" whispered Penrod in Radcliffe's ear. At once the glandelinians rushed furiously across the clearing toward the line of scouts who poured in a fire of pistolry that mowed a number down but the rest rushed up and strove to break their way in, while Penrod behind the line spoke to each boy, and girl bidding them be firm and steady, neither to advance or retreat. There was much noise, shouting of the enemy and screaming of the girls some of whom affrighted by the sight of long bayonets had already run away. But the others among them the notable dark haired little jannie were animated with a fury greater than that of the boys. The struggle was one of individual conflict for the boy and girl scout - scouts held their line together, and the glandelinians surging about them struck at the spears and branches with the butts of their rifles striving to break them in two and to find before them defenseless child enemies but those being handier shot the nearest rebels with their pistols.

It was rather dark under the trees however and in this twilight a long grapple took place. Cries went up as a spear suddenly found a mark, or a bayonet went through a boy or girl scout or cries as three or four glandelinians flung themselves upon a boy or girl scout tore away his or her lance and suddenly crushed the scout under the blow of their musket butts. The ground received a dozen bleeding bodies trampled under the trampled under the feet of the combatants. Time was passing time enough to give James and his boy scouts the opportunity which the messengers had just told him to take. But the struggle indeed was not going at Penrod had expected, for the soldiers well experienced were brave. Six of the boys had fallen, and ten of the girls, though death was harrying the rebels rather than the scouts but yet the line of scouts was bending, while Penrod hurriedly caused them to take on a more regular shape for he had a sudden fear that they might be overwhelmed by numbers and destroyed.

" Radcliffe" said he marshalling his reserves, " Now advance slowly and attack them." Radcliffe gave a cry of joy as the mental strain was lifted from his mind and firing his pistol, he advanced followed by his lads, and other girl scouts. Trembling Penrod followed the slowly moving line and now the confusion was complete. Radcliffe shouting words of encouragement to his boys whirled above his head a heavy branch which crashed down again and again upon the heads of the men. But the line of boy and girl scouts were now underfired, for they had thrown their long weapons from them smiting only with the pistol shots. They were near the smoke of another coming brush fire and this kept in with green branches blew back across the sky veiled the conflict in acrid vapor. Blood was flowing upon the faces of a half of the combatants who now strove to gain access to each other across the fallen bodies which they trampled. And still the line of boys and girls retired, being reduced every minute by tens and twenties. They were in spite of Radcliffe or Penrod who created an emptiness about them with their pistol shots being beaten back.

Then came the diversion. There was a crackling up on the earth, a breaking of branches and the line of James' boys and girls came running behind the row of advancing rebels. Their appearance caused among the glandelinians a disarray which like a swift contagion passed to nearly all for as James and his scout rushed upon them, striking at them and shooting at them widely and making them realized that they were hemmed in by these wild fighting kids shots arose, the mobs in gray broke ranks, and flinging their arms away the majority of the glandelinians ran hurriedly to the right and left, seeking safety behind safety behind trees and rocks. But they quickly rallied and then did overwhelm the scouts and started to disperse them and for a moment the two leading boy scouts withstood the onslaught of the glandelinians but seeing the helplessness of the battle they too tears in their eyes and blood upon their faces broke away to the sheltering woods.

" On" shouted the glandelinian leader " Pursue the daring little " Christian dogs", annihilate them. Never let them ever return to their camp. Give them no quarter. It was too late the rally the force of boy and girl scouts. Already a half circle of the glandelinians was drawing about the small force of the boy scouts. A pistol bullet struck one of the boys it was James in the breast, and he fell upon his hands and knees heaving a hoarse cry. Instinctively Penrod, Radcliffe, and a number of others followed by the girls ran under a shower of bullets which did not however hit them. They ran for the protection of some pine trees where at last there would be some shelter, and as they entered the welcome shade a bullet struck another boy scout in the shoulder. He groaned and paused, holding a tree trunk with his other hand.

" On" shouted the glandelinian leader " Pursue the daring little " Christian dogs", annihilate them. Never let them ever return to their camp. Give them no quarter. It was too late the rally the force of boy and girl scouts. Already a half circle of the glandelinians was drawing about the small force of the boy scouts. A pistol bullet struck one of the boys it was James in the breast, and he fell upon his hands and knees heaving a hoarse cry. Instinctively Penrod, Radcliffe, and a number of others followed by the girls ran under a shower of bullets which did not however hit them. They ran for the protection of some pine trees where at last there would be some shelter, and as they entered the welcome shade a bullet struck another boy scout in the shoulder. He groaned and paused, holding a tree trunk with his other hand.

" Come" shouted Penrod " It is nothing."

" I can't walk " said the boy."

" Come" said Radcliffe Radcliffe. " We cannot leave you for they will slay you. You are only hit in the arm you can walk."

Fortunately the Glandelinians had scattered widely in pursuit of the boy and girl scouts and only the sounds of the running conflict and the screams of the fallen penetrated into the dark wood. The others were alone, the rest of their party were breaking their way after them a little to the right so they went up and down hill for some distance, Radcliffe walking between them.

" Courage" he said to the wounded boy holding him close. A little further and we are safe."

" Courage" said Penrod also supporting him. " So they went on the lad in their grasp growing every moment more heavier. Another bullet hit him, his feet faltered, then dragged and suddenly he collapsed in their arms.

" Oh Frank, Frank" cried Radcliffe falling to his knees. He held in his arms the blood stained form of the boy scout who had been his companion for years and despaired desperately he clasped him in his arms. " Oh Frank he" he wailed " do not die here. It is Radcliffe. Look at me Frank. Frank please open your eyes."

Penrod stood above them helpless. He too suffered for this had also had been his friend but he did not suffer as did Radcliffe. The hard silent boy scout had never until then ever known how much he had loved Frank, how close he with little Jannie and Penrod he had lived.

" Oh Frank" he wailed. " Frank please do not die."

There was silence about them not even the cry of a bird broke through the clearing. The merciless heat of the near approach of the main forest fire was felt easily through the trees stained with the crimson blood of the conflict. It came to Radcliffe with horror that they were beset by rebels in the path of fire and that now he was losing one of his best boy scouts. So he held him in a grip so passionate that the dying lad opened his eyes. They looked into each others eyes, those two so alike in their olive skin, their dark red hair, their fair cheeks. Frank tried to speak, coughed, again and again but the gasp in his friends eyes animated him so that he tried to smile. His trembling hand weakly closed upon that of Radcliffe.

" Radcliffe" He whispered. Then his eyes closed, and his head sank to his shoulder, he was dead. The sounds on the right grew more pronounced, branches broke suddenly and the small party which had escaped, numbering James and a few there came close.

" Oh he is dead" cried Jannie and there was tears in her eyes. For a moment all in silence considered the lad who lay still and then as the sounds of conflict were carried to them upon the wind the wind, Jannie laid her hand upon Radcliffe's shoulder.

" Rad" she whispered " come. the pursuers are still near. come we cannot stay here."

But Radcliffe did not hear. Still he knelt upon the ground his arms about his friend his hand held in the dead boys grasp. At last he said -

" Dear" then with an effect of suddenness which made the others start he raised his head toward the sky and began to pray for his soul. Lost in a burning woods, Radcliffe was discolored and now Penrod seized him by forced upon the shi shield shoulder and demanded of him to rise.

" Come" he said taking him by the arm, while Jannie stood on the other side " come the enemy pursue us."

And so they finally led him away, while they were retreating there arose from somewhere a long modulated wail a wail without pain, a wail without words, yes something like a long invocation of pain a cry of pain a lament. It seemed to last a long long time like that of a mad dog and it affected the nerves of the remaining boy and girl scouts. And from where ever it came the long modulated cry rose and fell as they continued on. The rout was completed, and all the rest of the day the glandelinians were roving through the woods discovering here a boy whom they slew, there even a girl scout scout who was wounded and hand been forced to remain behind, and around her as helpless as she was the rascals started up a fierce brush fire. In a hollow they found one little wounded girl scout who was dragged out by the hair and then tied to the a small tree by the hair, a big pile of rubbish was stacked about her and it was set on fire and she too was burned to death.

Meanwhile in all this darkness of coming night the small party continued to flee, a small party of unfortunate boy and girl scouts all that was left of them, a very pathetic group comprising of only twenty boys, and four girls one of them half stupified by the bullet wound he had also recovered from which he had no hope of recovering from. And that there was Penrod and Radcliffe and all the survivors in their despair were now quickly racing toward the east over some of the scorched portions of the woods where perhaps there would be no foot or water but where at least for the time being there was safety. As they went Penrod walked on ahead finding his way by the light of distant fires behind came the rest and followed by Jannie who still watched Radcliffe who from time to time looking into his face appalled by its rigidity. At times she would fondle his arm making a sound designed to comfort him. Indeed Penrod was very conscious of this struggling procession all that was left of what he have called a regiment and he thought to himself; "This is the enemy a glandelinian enemy who will massacre any body. Nearly all of my boy and girl scouts are dead, James is dead, good James who loved us so well he too is dead. Many more have died in the fire and in the river and the hand of the glandelinian lies heavy upon our heads. Indeed it seems as if even God himself has deserted us." For a moment as he walked on he raised his hand toward heaven and asked God why he and his band of boy and girl scouts had been so smitten for.

"Oh God" said Penrod within his heart "Why have we failed, why have we been thus in these woods for so many unknown days. Have we not loved you, though you speak not to us. Have we not worshipped you, though you gave us no hope of safety or refuge. Have we not feared you, feared your wrath. I speak Lord and tell me why we have been thus deserted."

He looked about him into the thickening forest looked up toward the starlit sky; "Speak Lord, oh God make your self visible to us. Do so refuge us God, refuge us." There of course was no reply, no hope. They continued on into the forest passing over stretches of already burned forests passing through it until they came out into another denser part of the wood after a flight of another day and reached a spot where a creek poured into a long thin stream.

They could not stop now in their advance or flight they must continue on until they find the christian lines at last. But the few soon found themselves hard pressed by the pursuing enemy and they had to finally make another stand behind a wall of rocks above a steep ravine.

"It surely is strange" said Penrod to Radcliffe "They will not desist in their attack upon us but here we are now in a post position which I do not believe they can easily surmount."

"It is odd" said Radcliffe "for us they try to climb the rocks as we can easily shoot them down and they cannot even reach us. Besides they must also swim the stream close by and many would drown there as it looks as if it is infested with quicksands."

Over the new battle was not to go as Penrod or even Radcliffe expected. When the pursuing glandelinian soldiers reached the banks of this river they spent some two hours in keeping up a heavy, heavy musketry upon the defender a all of the shots however spattering against the stone wall and doing no harm. In the middle of the night an attempt was made to build a sort of quick improvised bridge by means of tree trunks an attempt apparently so half hearted, that a sortie headed by Radcliffe resulted in a quick brief flight half in the water and half in the quicksands and half on the trunks where the glandelinians retired after a few minutes firing as they did so having lost only those who had been caught in the bogs.

Surprise however grew among the defenders for they could not understand why so weak an attack was being delivered on their defense and yet they had to be watchful careful being so few now and pressed by so many. It was not however until the next morning that they really realized that the rebels had amused and lured them by a real sham attack. They realized it only when over some hills that overhung the stream somewhat in their rear they heard the breaking of branches and the sound of men's voices. Now came a true shower of bullets, and a prepared tree trunk was brought into position and thrown across it and the glandelinians came swarming toward the position. What had happened during the night of sham fighting the glandelinian leader had sent a portion of his cool command around about a mile further west taking some hours in doing this, and now the two forces were closing about the defenders.

In a moment there was confusion and disarray, the defenders deserted their position at once and while the soldiers came racing from the rear to meet those who were passing over the bridge the child fugitives fled.

"Courage" said Penrod to a boy he was helping "soon we shall reach another ravine and then we'll make a better stand."

As they continued the flight no one pursued them so they ran down a sloping hill toward a place near a creek where they hoped to escape from the enemy altogether. Here upon the creek they came upon the body of one of the boy scouts. A bayonet was still fixed in his heart, his gun still in his hand.

"He is gone now also" said Penrod. "After awhile as it seems we will all be gone." Indeed the discovery of the real peril of this forest had meant complete sorrow and misery for the remaining scouts. Thus elapsed two more days of intense misery during which Penrod or others did not speak his mind entirely now occupied by the thought of the Vivian girls. At one moment of his madness he turned to rush right into the worse of dangers but they restrained him. None of them had hardly less than four hours sleep at night and one night when he had laid down and as he and the rest lay in fitful sleep he felt a little hand upon his shoulder. Before his opened eyes it was the face of Jennie Turner herself and a large number of soldiers were around wearing Scarlet uniforms.

"Why it's Jennie Turner" he said feebly "You have saved us. We are still in the woods are we not?"

A small brown hand gripped his arm tighter.

"Wake Penrod" she whispered. "It is Jennie Turner. Yes we are in the woods yet but you are near general Vivian's lines."

The touch her hand her near dear nearness made Penrod understand that by a miracle he and his few followers had reached general Vivian's lines which were somewhere close at hand. Uttering an uncouth sound he rose to his feet and took her to his arms where for a while she lay weeping with joy. But at last she drew back her worn tear stained face and looking into his face said;

"Penrod I have much to tell you, and see I have brought something for you as a gift! The Vivian girls sent me with it."

She held out to him a long curl of golden hair.

"Jennie" He said "What is that?"

In a louder voice Jennie replied;

"Jennie Vivian gave it to you to remember her with while you are gone so long."

She could not explain explain as she would have desired to the scenes of the last few days for she lacked the words, she lacked the ready made phrases which emotion is expressed but at intervals she succeeded in expressing the splendor of the scene, which she told.

For a long time she had been in the woods with the party of soldiers hunting for the lost scouts during which she was not sheltered from the heat of forest fires and that the searching parties strong in numbers had spread out to a wide extent. Thus when Jennie Turner marched up to the river she said she discovered the scouts lying under trees and that she cried to her men;

"Penrod, it's Penrod and his scouts."

The soldiers had come to the spot at once. Now Jennie's eyes met those of little Jennie.

"Oh Jennie" said Miss Turner in a low voice "I'm glad to see you safe."

Jennie could say nothing for she was choked with sobs.

"Oh Jennie" said Miss Turner walking beside her "How have you managed to stand it all like this?"

"Penrod helped me" said Jennie in a low voice her dark eyes so blinded with tears that she could not see.

"Yes we came to the aid at last. We have conquered this gloomy forest. We are close

We are close to the christian lines now. So dear Jennie weep not. Why should you weep when you are rescued. Soon we'll all be within the christian lines once more and then we'll be free from this peril."

Indeed Jennie did not understand at all why Jennie should be weeping but it came to her simply that it might have been from the sudden relief at seeing old time friends after so much peril and so profiting by that fact she gripped Jennie's hand and left her toward the soldiers.

"You'll be safe with us all now" she whispered.

Jennie silently gripped her hand and her voice was no longer choked with sobs as she said;

"Thank you Jennie for I do not think we'll have to do this again."

"What do you mean?" said Jennie "I do not understand you."

"I don't know but I think of it," she answered.

Now they reached the big group of christian soldiers all who were on horseback and all the children who had been roused were placed on extra horses. At the head of the column was Ned Perkins

"Come in" cried the general, surprised at the interruption, while his officers looked surprised, as general plover had given orders to his guards that just now he was not to be disturbed.

"Please your Excellency, I nor my sisters didn't go to fulfill our plans yet." and Violet looked as if she was in sore distress.

"Because your Excellency, we just made another special trip to the disaster scenes last week for a final inspection, and did not get here until this morning, and was pursued by the enemy sixty times. We were too far from the army to get here on time, and were almost frustrated on our attempts. But we decide to go to Jay, and we want your help, and we want members of the Gemini and others to shadow us, so to come to our aid if something goes wrong."

Very good plan Violet, but unusually dangerous to attempt, remembering your capture by the glandelinians only early last August, and your difficult rescue, with Jennie's experience with that racial class slave holder Augustinia St Clair, alias really James Deldon in disguise!" he said "You seldom attempt-----" and we are going to find out more about it. I suppose that through their whole career so far as it is known, Violet and her sisters had not gone on any mission, spying, scouting or otherwise, in which they had not been successful. They were hornets to the enemy. In communion with their boy and girl scouts, and other able friends they had gone out on every military mission possible and never failed. Great help to Abba-Imania in the matter of saving christian armies from defeat, but a terror to the foe. Many of the readers I suppose would have said why did not the generals go instead? The answer to the question is simple. Being small violet and her sisters could do it best. Generals have tried, and failed. Goldiers have tried and never returned. Other officers have tried and never returned. The child scouts tried and succeeded every time. So they choosed to do so and let the officers take care of the armies.

"Well Violet Violet" the general resumed "Your record is good. But though you are a princess I'm sure cannot help disapproving of it. It's too dangerous. If you discovered while pretending to serve the Gladiolusian women I shudder to think of the result. Let the matter drop and sent the Gemini instead. They'll do anything for you, and so will the rest."

2 "I'm going with my sisters into Manlaye lines."

"What again?" demanded general Vivian looking astonished while his officers all looked serious and sober.

"Yes."

"Better change your mind."

"Your Excellency we didn't say anything else. We are surely going."

"Who told you to arrange the trip?"

"The seven of us."

"But it seems almost a suicide intention princess."

"D So sir it is not. We do not intend to allow ourselves to be observed or suspected by any one. We'll watch out for that and not our part. My we have actually played stage and acted, and rehearsed this all over again as if preparing for a show so the we could do our part as well as the best of actors."

"Does Cardinal Pedro George approve of it. Did you consult of it?"

"He believes I'm taking a great risk, but he says we should do it nevertheless as it is our duty seeing others fail. The Saints of God risked a lot for Our Blessed Lord, and we are doing this more for Him, so why not try it. God surely will aid us well in the adventure."

"Do you intend to have Pedro accompany you?"

"Your Excellency the mission is not for him, even though if he desires to go we won't stop him. Yet its too risky as he is not experienced."

"How do you know?"

"He proved it."

"But you, and your sisters, and even Angelina Aronburg, and general Breachart seem to have trained him well Violet."

"I mean your Excellency he is not trained for this line of work."

"Why not?"

"Your Excellency you are full of questions to day---you other generals" she continued "may be asked. Your Excellency we have so much to do we did not have time to give him sufficient time to learn. But we prevent no one if they wish to go. But we do not ask."

"Who are you going with you?"

"I've asked Gertrude, Angelina, Je Annis, Armer, Angelina Riches and others. They did not leave general Hanson Vivian's army till ever so late, and Gertrude was no tired out from her long travelling and exciting experiences with the enemy, she just didn't wake up this morning, for six o'clock army mass and had to go to the seven thirty. She got up ten after seven."

"But what interest have you in the originator of the disasters? It was caused by the enemy wasn't it?"

"Please Your Excellency.. it is most important to us and the nation that we should find out who ordered the making of the disasters, and to capture him if possible. I sent Pedro yesterday to notify Gertrude of my plans and though she too thinks it unusual she'll accompany me, though Jennie, and Riches are disapproving of it."

"Oh."

Making these plans had but one meaning in the matter under discussion. Violet and her sisters had succeeded in everything they set their minds on. They had spent whole minds or whole nights even in setting out on spying missions, and returning with all the information they wished to know, suffered anything for the success of their purpose and were more than living Marys. But of course this plan meant much more greater peril than usual, grave danger and record breaking difficulty in the undertaking, and some prodigious difficulty even in entering the foe lines to begin with. But general Vivian had known of everything they did before. Never had they failed. But such are the perils of all such undertakings, that in the general though he could not prevent them from going desired to advise against it, or what was better still go himself. Such are the horrors nowadays encountered in the many clandestine camps that general Vivian was really afraid for their safety. On making such a mission he hoped to send some one precisely to the foe camp in their stead.

The trip was sure to be so full of such danger that all those who persevere in it regularly never go forward, as to going backward that is impossible.

"Why my dear little princesses you are getting to be more like little dare devils every day. I don't believe you've missed fifteen trips to the enemy's camp since your rescue from the enemy last month," said the general.

"Please your Excellency we can do anything possible, and nothing can prevent us."

"Now girls, please listen to reason. I want you to do me a favor a bring me a written note, signed by all seven of you stating that I can go on that mission myself."

This was a terrible surprise to Violet, and her sisters for they did not expect this nor comprehend it. But Violet and her sisters have an intense repugnance to sending the best generals to such missions when the army needs them.

"No we'll not do that" they said together shaking their heads.

"Can you state to me why you do not wish to sent me?"

"Because the army needs you, and father relies on your ability as a good and able commander."

"As the general said 'Oh I see' there came into the tent ushered by the guard an apparition which caused the general to straighten up and fairly gasp. The other generals, and even Violet, and her sisters stared in blank amazement.

This little girl who had been ushered into the tent tripped in so lightly trotting all the way to them with such grace of motion and looking up out of deep blue eyes so smilingly into theirs that--- coupled with the circumstance of her being attired in tiny black slippers, brown ragged stockings, and covered with shreds and patches like a beggar mite that the generals felt as though a visit from a ragged golden haired haired fairy had somehow slipped into his tent to appear before the Vivian girls. It of course was Angelina Riches herself in disguise, and not even Violet and her sisters just then recognised her.

On account of her clever disguise her features were regular, her face a delicate oval and though her expression was under itself, there was a sign about her mouth and appearance about her eyes that showed she was shrewd, quick in motion, dangerous when aroused, and active and alert like a cat. And then in the least possible fraction of a moment in the face of a warm September day, and the dull thud of shovels without from so many soldiers at work there flashed through general Vivian's mind, Francis Thompson's exquisite poem:

"The hills look over the south,
And southward dreams the sea.
And with the sea breeze hand in hand,
Come innocence and she."

The little girl, slipped, and all in rags brought sunshine with her, and the smile upon her face with the light of bravery and confidence in her eyes a hint of spring. General Vivian at first believed a celestial child from heaven in disguise had come to aid Violet, and her sisters. Indeed it seemed that flowers invisible were blooming all about the general and the Vivian girls.

"Who are you little girl?"

"My general don't you remember me?"

"No I don't believe I ever saw you before."

"Why I'm Evangelina Riches. You gave me a gold medal in October for aiding Violet and her sisters so grandly in their expeditions of the months before, and for being the first in bringing them out of great dangers. I've got it yet. It's a large gold badge with the engravings of the Sacred Heart on it, and its got all the promises on the back. I know them all by heart and I'm teaching them to my girl scouts. I've got it yet, and keep it hanging over my chest as I can know it is always with me. Am I so disguised that even you princesses too do not know me?"

Yet I the author may regret to say that in the complicated work of attending to the movements of the army, superintending the investigations of the floods, refugee the homeless, directing the diversions during battles, fighting forest fires himself, making plans and attending to the work of all his staff officers, general Vivian though he did know her had completely lost all sight of his friend Angelina Riches aged eleven, and as he knew from the records, the second chief girl scout under the Abbess-eminence princesses so well known as the darlings of the nation. He had not even then known her because he had failed to read her through her disguise."

"Oh so its you Evangelina Riches. I failed to recognise you. I'm heartily glad to meet you again but you come around so seldom that you can hardly blame me for forgetting you so soon."

"Oh I don't blame you general, not at all. You have got such a lot to remember. You know I cannot remember so many things myself because I'm so busy. Angelina Aronburg gave me this note to give to you Violet, for you and your sisters to read. She says it is verily very very important."

She had been holding an envelope in her hand. Violet took it and while she tore open the envelope the girls took another look at Angelina Riches who stood at attention before them. The fine lines of her face, the Madonna like oval the long luxuriant real golden colored hair shining with dazzling brilliancy in the sunlight were the first things that could strike one. But there was one detail in which her beauty left something to be desired. Looking closely one could not but help see that the young girl was most cleverly disguised.

She had even disguised her natural complexion herself like a beggar wretch, and made it appear as if the rose color of her cheeks would soon be the rose of yesteryear just as if they were fading fast away. She was near as beautiful as violet and her sisters themselves, but taller all slightly than the eldest, juicier, and appearing more prim and dignified, and cautious and yet active. While Violet read the letter to her sisters, Angelina Richee flitted and hopped about the tent floor like a little bird in the trenches, or branches on the tree top as she always did. She was never quiet, never it seemed could stand still, and only then when she still when she happened to be seated. She was offered a chair by a general but declined. The letter read: []

"DEAR VIOLET, AND YOUR SISTERS."

"I've sent Angelina Richee to help you as you suggested, and I will be on my way as soon as possible. Kindly take a good look at her, and tell me when we meet, if she is not dignified to the point of perfection and cleverness. As she is the brightest and the sunniest girl scout leader of our set we can depend on her as we always did in the past."

She attended Mass this morning and received Holy Communion before donning the disguise, not a general guess as is always on every day and Sunday but a Special Mass for herself, to bless her work with you and your sisters. No adventure no matter how serious appears to have any terrors for our assistant girl scout leader as you well know. Tell me if you recognize her the first moment she came."

Respectfully
Angelina Aronburg.
N.D.C.
General Munroe's Army.... "

General Vivian while the princesses read the letter called:

"Come here my dear Richee."
"She was trotting toward him at the word as though she intended running him down nor did she slacken her pace until she was quite upon him, when she caught a sudden halt in a manner quite beyond any creature of a large growth."

"Angelina do you intend to go with them too?"
"Oh yes Your Excellency. I and Gertrude, and Miss Turner intend to go when they start."

"What else do you intend to do?"
"That's all Your Excellency."
"Don't you think it's very dangerous?"
"Yes sir but I am not a bit afraid."
"Angelina did you have yourself well prepared? []"
"Oh yes sir. I'll have all of my scouts shadow me wherever I may go."

"What else?"
"I prepared for Holy Communion."
"Did you not conceal weapons and ammunition about you?"
"Yes sir, I have all I'll be able to carry."
"Didn't you plan to have a strong body guard?"
"We have good reliable men ready at a moment's notice. And cavalier also and the powerful Gemini."

"Good Gracious," the general exclaimed. "And to what use are you going to the body of retainers?"

"To shadow us also."
"And within the glandelinian camp?"
"Maybe we'll not need them there, and then maybe we will. So you see we do not know what to decide on that. Violet, and her sisters do not know whether the retainers will be needed that far, or whether they will last that long."

Retainers as a regular purpose for scouting parties outside the Christian lines where a popular column needs protection from an attacking scouting party of the enemy had always been general Vivian's work. But to have the retainers shadow their charges through and within the foe camps had never before occurred to him and seemed very unusual indeed. It was only later he learned that when everything else in the way of secret protection fails, and there is no other way for the purpose the simplest manner of securing protection on a dangerous adventure is to have bodies of men and boy and girl scouts also armed to the teeth shadow you wherever you go, especially when out on a perilous scouting expedition for discovering of the enemy's movements or entering the camps of the foe. The quest cost nothing to those experienced, and though the general had not yet learned how it is accomplished it brings results. Nevertheless although the general did not realize then, that Angelina Richee had spent the greater part of the day in selecting the proper men all powerful in strength and quick on the action and trigger, he felt sure there was dire peril in the whole undertaking and to tell the truth he was almost scared to death for their safety.

"Do you like thrilling adventures, Angelina Richee?"
"Oh yes, for the sake of our holy cause. Why I don't even get enough---at least I think so, but Gertrude Angelina says that more people in this country die of great disasters in this war because there are not enough successful spies to learn the plans of such an enemy to have them frustrated. Or from cowardice on the part of scouting parties near such scenes. And then Your Excellency when I start out on an adventure I put more spirit in the undertaking. [] Do you like thrilling adventures sir?"
Not feeling quite equal to answering this question to the young girl's satisfaction the general went on:--

"Is that your best disguise?"
"General how can you ask that? Angelina Aronburg gave me these to put on. But they are real perfect and will help me to accomplish the purpose you know. And when I enter the enemy's camp I pick out the places where the enemy is not so thickly gathered or where there are no soldiers at all and I can ride and dash from one place to another. It is as good as playing."
"You dash from one part of the Glandelinian camp to the other as if you were a little bird eh?"

"That's just it general, how did you happen to guess it? Sometimes I can go through a whole Glandelinian camp without even being discovered by the enemy. I can make the calls of many little birds, and croak like a frog which signals my followers and even Violet and her sisters understand."

"What part of Munroe's army are you and the rest going to enter?"
"At Ambrose Fuller's camp is the one we call 'Fulla Prunes' Here's the way we are going to get there. When we come to the right part of Ambrose Fuller's camp, we are going through by night, through or by way of the thinnest sentinel line, and sneak into the Glandelinian camp from the rear. But don't you believe we are going all the way through there. No indeed. We know better. That part of the Glandelinian army is said to be the most dangerous, the officers unacquainted that is just awful, and Ambrose Fuller has a general under him who'd give a fortune to capture any one of us dead or alive. Angelina Aronburg says they are very dangerous. Now from there we go through another portion of the Glandelinian camp until we get to Munroe's lines. Then we come to our destination and Munroe's headquarters. If we had the chance to go to day it would be better. But we are too late and will have to wait until tomorrow. Then we start for 'Fulla Prunes' camp."

"How many of you girls are going to accomplish or try to accomplish this most dangerous and record breaking stunt?"

"There's three hundred (300) boys, there's I, Violet, and her sisters, who make three hundred eight, and Angelina Aronburg and the retainers. Angelina Aronburg is to be the guide and she can work fast. Penrod and Radcliff wish to join and we thought not approving of it as he is not used to such an adventure do not nevertheless hinder, and he and his friend follows us several days later. This is the best plan we ever formed."

"Why do you wish to take so many?"
"For safety. But it's their plan not mine. I made no plan as I must say. It is all theirs. We are also taking five hundred (500) girls. Last night I and Gertrude planned to find out what Glandelinian general ordered the floods to be made, the reason why the disasters were created, and where the Glandelinian miners secured all the explosive explosives. I forgot what we intended to do next but I think it is a plan to capture or shoot the originator to death. We might as well as the guilty ones, or party would be put to death anyhow. Our plans have been made a lot better."

"Sit down Angelina until Gertrude comes 'Bald Violet' she is trotting down the road already and means to go in a great hurry."
"Colonel Michael the general called to his side-de-camp without." "Come in here and fix for these beautiful heroines a good breakfast, and see if you can get it done quickly."

"You say you want what to be fast sir?"
"I BAI fix these heroines a GOOD BREAKFAST and don't go to sleep about it."
The side-de-camp had long been accustomed to such stern harsh orders, received especially after making a mistake, and he came in as asked, and while he prepared the breakfast for the eight little girls who kindly helped him and simultaneously gave him a number of autobiographical details, Richee called up by telephone one of the leaders of Penrod's boy scouts and girl scout regiment and coworkers in clever spying work Jennie Turner as directed by Violet.

"Is this you Jennie Turner?"
"No this is the telegraph operator. I've tried to get her and have line trouble. Try another line. The line must be interrupted suddenly and I heard something strange."

450
 were as chasing a devil around a stump. Thereupon one of his staff generals with a foolish smile remarked that ever since the first three disasters and all the other forest fires raging then, scores of thousands of expert spies and agents entered the enemy's lines to find out what general or person ordered the causing of these disasters, and they even never came back, though some went to the glendelinian capital to find out. If you girl heroines live up to any common sense even to keeping your word to that admission, I'll call you miracle workers before the whole nation."

"Well Jennie I must say, that all this purpose of ours is very unusual, and we'll have to do unpleasant things, and make tremendous sacrifices, and apparently ride in with the glendelinian cause to obtain our end, but nothing will change our minds now. Tell me and there are, council held by the generals over this!" asked Violet.

"They debated over it"--- and there was a twinkle in Jennie's eye--- "and it came to an end with some of them, quite in favor of going in our places. There was not a thing in the way of changing their minds, and they said 'they might as well have the Masses of the Dead' said for us right now."

"I must say, this case strikes me as the most serious and the most astonishing I have ever come across in all my life" said Violet. "None of the generals ever felt worried over our other expeditions and they too were dangerous."

"And you might add, the most extraordinary," put in Jennie.

"Yes" exclaimed Jennie. "A general Hanson said that since being in charge of armies he had not been hounded with all kinds of christian and glendelinian spies---with all sorts of agents and investigating spies and scouts from spies that form the Gemini income from the spies and agents that visits a rebel or other glendelinian camp far, near on or in the interior, but I've never in all my experience known of any spies that would go through anything you girl scouts have or of any case where there was an any manner of slightest any number of spies in the camp but also there has been as much success as you girls made despite too much peril."

"That's a fact Jennie, excessive peril and great christian spies would appear to go hand in hand," said Catherine.

"If by object danger you mean mean nothing to mentioning of success in the great adventure---yes especially, if it is a sort of do-or-die performance, something like an act on the stage where you are liable you get the 'hook'. It does happen to spies with little or no experience even in time of calamity to desecrating christian spies, but we are experience and we mean to show our generals something. Other spies need only to be put on their feet. Well what have you done to prepare for the self adventure?"

"I send orders to have members of the Gemini keep us secretly shadowed as you proposed, and a supply of provisions to last us until we enter the foe's lines which we got to do through some shrewd trick only, as slipping past sentinels will be a thing of the 'we say a past for do holler' and we need flour, eggs, sugar coffee, a string of sausages and plenty of ammunition to rely on for emergencies. Then my girl scouts are going to do what they can to give us all the assistance there is in their power. All of us will be well provided for. As for the boyscouts who are to accompany us we've prepared plenty for them to do on their own line. Also there's a matter of reliable automatics for the chief boys---"

"Allow me to take care of that," Gertrude broke in. "Just a few minutes ago an officer went by and it may be---rude up to my tent this morning and handed me this note saying 'Gertrude I have heard about the expedition, you and Violet, and her sisters are going to make, so use that as a pass and a countersign into the enemy's line if you cannot get in any other way. General Hanson says get the best weapon you can rely on. I'll have many Hannos and pummas and gosses said for your safe return. He remounted his horse and rode away, before I could even thank him. I never saw him before, but nevertheless he was a priest!"

"Thank you Gertrude. I'll attend to the rest at once. Only one thing, forget to tell you," said Jennie, "remember looking at her closely."

"And what's that Jennie?"

"Walter Starring says he will also have us covered or shadowed so to be ready in case of need. He'll start a large body of clever scout's as soon as you are ready. If you say so we'll start to work to-morrow. I'll send our scouts everything that is necessary so that if anything happens to us we can at least be on our feet again. And our success will be the grandest achievement of the war."

"For all of which thanks be to god."

The sound of a galloping horse cut short what further reflections Gertrude was about to make and in general Vivian's answer to come in "come in" the tent door was pushed aside, and there in the entrance curtsying beautifully and smiling expansively stood Angelina Jennings herself looking now by reason of her new uniform rather more like a new Abbianni-princess than a girl scout.

"Oh Angelina Gronburg is that you?---Good morning general, I did not know that the princess had you for company. I just came to tell Angelina Gronburg that general Hanson says everything is ready for the expedition to-morrow. Be he sends you to take a kind of circuitous route toward glendelinian Road as to keep sheer of wildly advancing forest fires that's burning all before it. He says it is terribly dangerous which ever way you turn, if not from the glendelinians the fire, and the latter is far worse. General Hanson wishes to have me go along, and says that if I do would it not be a surprise if all the boy and girl scouts will be jealous of me. General Hanson says to have me accompany you to-morrow."

"You are quite welcome to come my dear friend" said Violet.

"And we have such a fine time making ready and eating our breakfast this morning while general Hanson sent fifty thousand soldiers out to battle the fire and head it off while he prepared his retreat. Before we were through and our breakfast was over, I had to ride down and make a report to my scouts, and think girls, run plump into that 'bad plague.' I turned sheer of it after watching it progress for a time and, tell you girls it was a perfect fire sea and the heat from that distance was parching and the flames made a noise like a tornado and the smoke rolled upward like a volcano. We then had to loosen up on most of our provisions, and when I told them what I was going to do while watching the fire, they almost choked with astonishment and looked at me as if they thought I had gone mad. Yet they consented and when we said our prayers, and put in 'God Bless our Expedition' and make it successful' as headed for our camp keeping to the side of the forest fire. I'm going to say that prayer even while we are out on the adventure. Oh Miss Aronburg did you take a look at my uniform a new one." "One."

"The uniform is excellent, your shoes are strong and look well" said Gertrude. "But for goodness sakes girls if you go with us you'll be risking too much danger."

"No we won't Miss Aronburg, I can do real dangerous stunts if I want to," replied Angelina Jennings recovering her moral gravity. "But I just came in to report that everything is ready for the adventure. So I guess I'll go now. Good bye, princess, good bye Miss Aronburg, good-bye general Vivian. I'll have to go now, but see you girls to-morrow. My company is awaiting me impatiently."

"She made for the entrance---also fairly like in her glide---and then she astonished them all. She turned in the threshold of the big tent, faced them all and with the sudden movement that Violet and her sisters are so accustomed in observing in Angelina piches made a profound curtsy--- more profound than that which they had observed on her entrance, but to the Vivian girls alone. She sank and rose like the crest of a wave, and then saluted the generals."

"Jenny Jennings," General Vivian called as she was turning to go. "Where on earth did you learn that curtsy?"

"I've learned it from Angelina piches. She showed me how to do it whenever the general came to review the army, and when he came to speak to me. I also do it every time I enter and leave the church before the blessed sacrament."

"It was I who learned her" confessed Angelina piches. "Shee Riches as the girl scout disappeared. There was a man in Angelina's path whom I knew, your Excellency, Sister Mary Angelina, and when I went to school, she showed me how they used it, when the bishop or the cardinal came."

And then general Vivian recalled the days of his own bitter practice, and how long it took him to limber his stiff little heels for those curtsies. Ease of action does not come handily to all of us. But these two girl scouts Angelina piches, and Jennings could never--- supposing her to have general Vivian's expression--- could have penned his comment to save her life.

"They are fine girls both she and Riches" commented the Vivian girls together. "but if I were glendelinians and their enemies why I'd hide in a deep woods and never come out. They even beat gadcliffe who is called the 'Rattle-snake'."

"Thanks for the recommendation" said Angelina piches with a bow.

"Your Excellency do you know that Angelina piches and Jennings has everything that was in the making of good spies in the near future" said Angelina Gronburg.

"Indeed," the general answered, and being busy with something on his mind presently he forgot her observation. But it was to be recalled in the light of later events to see, it must be said that general Vivian did not know these two girls very well yet having seen so little of them. But he felt sure of them nevertheless and therefore therefore trusted they would make good in the adventure with Violet and her sisters.

INTRODUCING THEIR CLOSENESS TO THE GLANDELINIAN CAMP, AND SHOW-ANGELINE RICHES IN HER FIRST KNOWN STUNT.

"Easy violet" said Angelina Aronburg her faithful companion toward evening with the glandelinian camp in full view. "Angeline riches says to be careful what move we make now. She says she is very fond of reading of adventures, but not a too sudden nearness to a glandelinian camp."

"Indeed,"
"Yes violet, she is suspicious that we are being watched, and shadowed by persons not our friends of our side. If we be careful entering the foe camp, it will be like like listening to a fairy story."

"It's quite a natural thing for me to enter a glandelinian camp," said violet saying it with her field glass. "But one of us yet has never been afraid to enter a glandelinian camp. Don't you think we ought to go forward now?"

"Yes violet, but if we are not careful we won't have much of a chance to enter. It ain't like past times violet. See as far as the camps extend there are so many soldiers on guard duty, and even the roads are sentinelled. And they have no large open spaces between them though they peaceup and down."

"Well Gertrude what are you driving at?"

The surprising part is that they had after skirted the forest fires niftily approached as near as possible to the glandelinian camp under general Ambrose Edwin fuller, and after scouting and making observations carefully and anxiously nearly all day long saw no chance whatever of slipping into the glandelinian camp and ran the chances nearly thirty times of being caught. There were too many sentinels on watch and not far off from where the girls were hiding was a large group of pickets well armed. These glandelinians too were a combination of zimmsmannians, growlowses, broodlers and gossens very dangerous indeed and very alert. There were only two roads leading into the enemy's camp and a long line of well armed guards were on either side. It seemed even impossible to approach the camp.

"The fact that this made Angeline riches somewhat uneasy, and have her hint to Angelina Aronburg that she was suspicious they were seen made them all very cautious. They had advised all their followers to scatter out a great distance, but also always keep the girls in view."

"The fact is Angeline riches has already hinted to me several times that she'd she would like to go on ahead and see if she can discover some opening in the enemy lines."

"Oh that's it, is it?"

"And she said you an awful high compliment."

"She did. Let's have it."

"She said that anything you would suggest, or any duty you would recommend or pick out for her would be just three times as exciting because you picked it out."

"What an inspiration for excitement the girl must have."

"She considers this a very dangerous undertaking violet."

"She didn't use that expression Gertrude."

"No but that's what it came to. She wants to know whether there's any chance of any of us entering the enemy's lines by a sort of trick."

"Did you undecieve her?"

"Sure I did! I told her we won't fail under any conditions. And that no one is asked to go where we won't go."

"A very nice way of putting it!" Joice commented.

Angelina Aronburg be it said was just eleven and yet despite her early years thought that Violet, and her sisters were taking an awful chance in making this expedition, and therefore decided to accompany them to watch that nothing happens to them. She was or is just the same age as Joice Vivian, but slightly taller, and having had experience with the enemy even in her most earlier years, knew more than the princesses did what to do.

"I told her we were going to--"

"What's that?" Joice interrupted.

"I beg pardon I told her you'd intend us to do a--"

"I thank you Gertrude."

"We were going to find out if possible which general made the order, or gave the order or made out the plans for these disasters, and that to capture him if possible and that you would not accept any backing, or that ever you may call it."

"Quite clear, Gertrude."

"Well I did make it clear. I said you or your sisters would not attempt anything that you couldn't do, or anything of the kind that was more dangerous than usual, and that you or your sisters couldn't be such famous spies, or army phantoms if you were not successful, and she said you and your sisters ought to lead armies against the foe then."

"Gertrude are you and Angeline riches trying to make our vocation seem greater than it is."

"Not at all violet, but we share would want to see you in a higher vocation than a princess, as well as your sisters. But just now I wouldn't want you and your sisters to give up your present vocation on any account. Who would run the boy and girl scouts then?"

All the boy and girl scouts in the christian armies no matter what their rank fairly worshipped, violet and her sisters. If they don't find heroines in the Vivian Girls then they can't find any anywhere else; children are hero worshippers. If they don't find heroes in their daily round, they create them out of the common clay.

"Well Gertrude to return to Angeline riches. I am glad you told me she wanted to scout for an opening for us to enter the foe lines. The girls scout seems to have the eye of a cat, and though she seems to walk in fairyland she's as brave as a lion. What a pity so many boy and girl scouts with their quality have not the means to do what we can. But that Angeline riches comes to interview me and my sisters as soon as she can."

Accordingly while the girls who had edged themselves forward closer to the enemy's lines to get a better view of the dangerous locality, Angeline riches duly tripped among them. She was all quiet and grave, though about her tiny person radiated, youth, hope, and spring and the pyre of a puna.

"Well Princesses we are as close to the foe lines as we dare to go. I'm awfully glad you have sent for me. I have not had a chance to see an opening in the enemy's lines so far. I've counted the guards, and there's a thousand of them. You know the way things look now we do not have any chance to enter the enemy's lines unless there's an opening somewhere. Angelina Aronburg says that you alone know what to tell me to do."

"I suppose riches you'd like me to send you to scout ahead for a short distance and go to send you occasionally?"

"Oh yes violet, I should like it very much."

"How often about?"

"As often as it is necessary."

"Would you like to go and do it now?"

"Oh," cried Angeline riches rising on her toes, telling her eyes upward, and remaining thus ecstatically while she spoke "I should say, would I'd just love to go and about right now, as I dearly love a thrilling adventure. I'm not afraid of the enemy."

Saying which Angeline riches settled her feet once more on the rice ground. In avowing that she dearly loved to go out on a scouting tour, she had thrown out her hands in such wise that she gave one the impression that she had wings and was about to fly away. One of the nearest boy scouts giggled. He was standing behind a tree with his face in profile. Violet, looked hard at the boy who at once changed his smile into a frown.

"Have you discovered anything that will admit us easily past those guards Michael?"

"The princesses Violet, I could not see anything yet."

"To know I'm waiting for an opportunity to enter the enemy's lines so do it and don't pay so much attention to riches." Violet said dryly thus extinguishing Michael.

"Now Angeline I'm going to send you off to scout some distance ahead, and you have to be so much as you like but be sure to come back as quickly as possible when you are ready to bring me the information. Then we'll all slip into the glandelinian camp. Then when we can I'll have you to get some one to waylay a glandelinian general and force him to tell what he knows. Bribe him is necessary Angeline!" Michael she continued seeing him still at the same spot.

"Yes princesses!"

"Are you a clown?"

"No princesses."

"Then what in the world are you laughing at?"

"I'm laughing at something funny."

"At riches actions no doubt? I hate to lure you from your hiding place, Michael but since you are so interested in her, would you kindly accompany Miss riches on her scouting tour. If so she may give you something real funny to laugh about. Get a number of the boys together. It'll only take you a minute or so you know."

This sounded like sarcasm but Michael knew violet was mighty angry at him for giggling at Angeline riches, and therefore believed she was "rubbing it in" that he giving him an adventure probably not to his taste, but on the whole he was a sprightly toy, and enjoyed it all. He giggled again.

"Michael stop acting so silly and do as I tell you," cried Joice. "This is serious. We need something done you know."

"Don't you like lieutenant Michael violet?" inquired Angeline riches, when the boy scout had gone to gather together some of his most worthy comrades.

"I certainly do."
 "Why did you talk that way to him then?"
 "Because he deserved it."
 "If you had talked that way to me I'd feel just terrible."
 "I hope then that I will never have to talk that way to you Angelina. As for Michael he was laughing at your motions and I'm a little more at him for it. I did at like it. I did not scold him but gave him a sort of a hint."
 "Oh! see. Say ain't boys funny?"
 Michael saved Violet the trouble of pursuing this rather vast subject by suddenly focusing with this vast number of boys. boys—
 "Oh thank you for the permission, thank you ever so much Violet." cried Angelina
 "I don't care now whether I meet with some of the enemy or not."
 "What's that? you are not going that close to the enemy's lines?"
 "No."

Violet looked closely at her friends face. The roses of her cheeks were in full bloom despite her disguise. Her complexion always fine, was evidently clearer than before. She now went off with the boys. During the time they were waiting for her return, all had gone well so far with the girl spies. They had not been seen by the enemy as close as they were to his lines. For they had carefully hidden themselves, and from their point of observation on they had a steady view of the camp, and all the other boy and girl scouts had accomplished much, thanks to Violet and her sisters. In a word as any one might observe all that was needed now was to enter the enemy's lines. All the scouts were well supplied with weapons, ammunition and as Michael had observed, "The Vivian girls had put them on their feet, and they had stayed put. There might be quite a lot of so called romance in dealing with desperate spying expeditions, expeditions not heard of in any story book of course as much romance is probable in this volume and yet less gratitude from those for whom you do it for."

If the spy or so was working for earthly appreciation it would be in about nine-teen or twenty cases out of forty or be time absolutely wasted, but when one is working in a war fought only in all probabilities in a game like Abbeism's and her States, or in Gods holy games as it is here, and besides the saving grace of it all humbly speaking as that there is always hope for the successful spy, providing he is professional and a not an amateur. The leaders and others are too often mightily afraid and would not go through any dangers, that Violet and her sisters would risk. But in the Abbeismian armies, brave spies, all experienced and professional seem like been, and their are instructed and lead, and conducted by leaders and members of the Supreme Gemini, organized by Rodney Graves, and led by Hendre Durgar. However as regards to the boy and girl scout scouts in the Christian armies the reader may be dealing, it would seem with the bravest of the spies, child spies, and head organizers of the Gemini in person through their Emperor and Father.

And all those whom they worked for, and officered were grateful loyal and devoted, they did all they could to insure the safety of the under child spies boys and girls of Violet and her sisters during their own expeditions, kept them well supplied, and they gave a promise of being able to keep without any outside help their ability to do what they were able. Only when Violet and her sisters would be captured and held for a certain time by the enemy as had been the occasion then their followers would either be disheartened thrown into degradation or disorganization or go hunting for them in secret. Angelina Angelina pines favored Violet and her sisters as she departed with her famous courtesy on seeing in which Michael also imitated, and even then at his attempt Violet and her sisters checked desperately had in a vain endeavor to keep from laughing.

The boy nevertheless thanked God had a sense of humor. He was a very good pious boy scout with only trifling trifling mistakes now and then, very reliable for them as regarded to such matters. His mistakes was giggling too much when he thought he observed something funny, but no one was as yet like the boy scout period. And as for Radcliffe, Violet and her sisters were suspicious of him so often though they said nothing. They no matter how often they saw him watched him every move carefully, had him secretly shadowed and so on. Not that they distrusted him—no, not they could not believe for their very lives that Radcliffe really was a boy, and the noticed actions between him and June several times made them more suspicious. Violet once said to Gertrude herself "Looking at Radcliffe, do you think some day you'll ever see your missing sister?"

Gertrude following the eyes of Violet, would have immediately started questioned Radcliffe, but as sick as his sickness he was, none.

But now to tell the truth the expedition seemed so risky that Violet and her sisters did not want to make him or Radcliffe share the dangers with them, though of course accordingly to the military rules, if they wished to follow they could follow or object, but could stop them from going into places too dangerous. But just now if the boys had not really followed, the Vivian girls would have said later—

